

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

"A Sure Stronghold is our God."

From ELIAS POLKO'S "Musikalische Märchen, Phantasien und Skizzen;" translated by FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

An autumn evening, filled with presentiments of winter, was followed by a dull, cold October day; cloudy shadows darkened the fields; an icy wind arose, and pitilessly tearing the fairest leaves from the branches where they clung, half wearied out, strewed them under the hasty foot of the wanderer. An anxious, expectant sorrow seemed to possess all nature, as though the voice of winter threatened from a distance, and in husky whispers told of the gloomy days to come, the long, dark nights, the ice and snow-flakes. But in the city, where the houses lay huddled together so comfortably in the midst of the vast plain, things looked much more cheerful; defying autumn weather, people had withdrawn to their warm houses; from many windows bright lights shone forth, tokens of social comfort. It was about the year 1732, and the city of which we speak, was called Leipzig. Surrounded by deep moats, high walls, and stately lindens, it was a safe and pleasant city to look on. The houses were almost all narrow and high, with pointed, square, projecting balconies; here and there a little tower arose from the roofs; of church steeples not many were to be seen. In the Cantor-house of the excellent Thomas-school, near the handsomest church in Leipzig, the lights glimmered particularly clear on the above mentioned October evening; happy voices sounded there, for there was a very united family assembled.

At the heavy oaken table, that stood in the midst of the small room, furnished with large, dark cabinets and curiously carved chairs, sat a man in a smooth suit of black and a large curled wig. His face was round and ruddy; a grave geniality played round the corners of his firm mouth; his forehead was fine and clear; and his fiery black eyes looked out from beneath it with an expression of concentrated power, whose influence it would be difficult to withstand. The heart would beat high in any breast which those dark eyes attracted to themselves; and one might fancy that they had drawn a black veil over the fathomless sea of light that swelled and shone within them. This man, the Herr Cantor JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH, was celebrated throughout the city for his fine organ playing. Good people said of him, however, that he was a strange fellow, and often shook their wise heads over his extraordinary, involved figuration, and impossible-to-be-understood fantasias on the organ. But rarely did any one leave the church while the Cantor was playing, and a shudder of awe would pass over his hearers, when the sublime tones rushed forth in full force, as though they would burst the church walls, and bury the listening multitude beneath the falling ruins. At the right side of the Cantor sat his wife, a fine looking woman with well cut features and gentle eyes, in a snow-white cap and dazzling neckhandkerchief. She held her youngest born, Christopher, a stout baby of about three months old, on her knees.

Other boys of different ages lay round their mother, comfortably eating roasted apples, and playing with their little brother. Bach's oldest son, Friedemann, a tall youth, resembling his father, but without his mild friendliness, stood near the immense earthen stove, and looked thoughtfully on the noisy group of boys. On the Cantor's left, a slender young man had taken his place, whose fine features, thick, black hair, and mild, kindly, brownish face bore the strongest possible resemblance to the head of the family. This was Bach's second son, Philip Emanuel, arrived on an unexpected visit from Frankfort on the Oder, after a long and tiresome journey. He had just been telling his father of the new musical academy, which he had founded, and now directed in Frankfort; he praised the talent and industry of his scholars, and timidly took some leaves of music paper from his pocket. Blushing, he pushed them towards the Cantor with these words: "Dear father, look if there is anything in it."

It was a fine Sonata, that old Bach ran through with joy-bedewed eyes and light movements of the finger, then rolled it up again, and said: "Time will make something of thee, my boy! only get on with the help of God the Lord! Friedemann also moves forward bravely, and does not play badly; good luck go with you both!" Both his eldest sons listened, smiling like children, to their honored father, and gratefully pressed his hands. The conversation was suddenly interrupted by a horse's hasty gallop, and a quick knocking at the little house door. Astonished, both the eldest sons sprang to the door; the children forgot their noise, the mother turned pale, and Sebastian Bach looked calmly on and said: "How can you all behave so? not one of us has a bad conscience; then let him come who will. In a few minutes, a postillion, tired out, covered with mud, appeared; he came direct from the electoral residence, Dresden, desired to speak with the Cantor Sebastian Bach, and handed him a letter from the powerful minister, the much dreaded Count Brühl. The Cantor drew the large oil lamp nearer, shaded his eyes with his hand, and read, while Philip Emanuel politely handed a chair to the messenger.

"My Dear Cantor!—Our gracious elector and lord, Augustus of Saxony and Poland, wishes to hear you, the celebrated organist, Sebastian Bach, at his residence. You must play in the church at Dresden, on Sunday, the 24th of October. Two days after the receipt of this letter, a royal carriage will convey you from Leipzig to the residence, when we expect you with great impatience. Therefore prepare yourself for this distinguished honor, my dear Cantor. I am commissioned by our gracious lord to greet you.

Signed, COUNT BRUEHL.

Bach stood thoughtfully for a little while; irony and unwillingness spoke in his expression; his eyes glanced from one to the other of his dear ones. Friedemann and Philip were modestly silent. "Herr Courier," said the Cantor at length, slowly but firmly, "inform my lord the minister, that I, Sebastian Bach, Cantor of the Thomas school at Leipzig, will fulfil the command of my prince, and come to Dresden." "I beg you to give me a written document," asked the courier. "Man," thundered Sebastian Bach, drawing himself up to his full height, "what are you asking for? Did you not understand me? Have not I, Sebastian Bach, just given you my word? Do you take me for one of those dishonorable knaves that flourish in the air of the court, and whom a rag of paper will bind closer than a manly word, spoken in the face of God?" "Dear father," began Philip Emanuel soothingly. "Silence, young man, you don't understand any thing about it!" answered his father hastily; then turning to the courier, he said more calmly: "Now you have your answer! tell all you have heard to my lord the count; it will not trouble me." The messenger had retired a few steps, pale with fear. Bach seized him by the collar, drew him towards himself and said friendly: "Now is not this a wholesome lesson for you? Do not forget it as soon as you have left my house. The residence is not every thing. And now, basta! if you will help us to despatch the evening soup and a pitcher of beer, it will please me well!" But the courier preferred to take a hasty leave, and the Cantor took his place at the table cheerfully. Then his children crowded anxiously round him, and Frau Gertrude exclaimed: "Ah, my Bastian, would you venture into the wide world, the splendor of Dresden, the city of sin! and oh, the long bitter journey! No, you will not do such a thing for your wife and children's sake!" And then she broke into a passion of tears, and fell sobbing on the neck of her husband.

The children, as soon as they saw their mother crying, began to cry also, clinging to their father's coat; the two sons conversed loudly and hastily about the Count's missive; in short, there was a terrific noise in the little room. At last the full voice of the head of the family overcame the noise; the Cantor cried out: "Wife, take the crazy boys into the nursery! let none but Friedemann and Emanuel remain behind." Then, like a strong-shouldered lion, he shook off the screaming children, and their mother took the little flock to the old nurse. The Cantor began to measure the chamber with long steps, as his faithful wife returned, and took her place at the table with moist eyes. "You must not grieve over the long journey, Gertrude," he said mildly to her, "for if the Lord God does not decree otherwise, I shall be back in my old nest in fourteen days; and, besides, I propose to take these boys with me to the residence. They shall see all the finery, and, above all things, take care of their father." Friedemann and Emanuel thanked him with sparkling eyes. "Yes, my children, we will knock at the hearts of the worldlings with the strong voice of the Lord God"—so he sometimes called his beloved organ,—“and they shall stretch out their hands in surprise and anguish, and cry Pater, peccavi! and master Hasse shall acknowledge that there may be higher, more godly strains than his sweet, wanton Italian melodies.” He looked so glorious as he said this, that his family looked towards him with the deep reverence. But then he cried out heartily: “Now, mother, let the little squallers in, and fetch us the soup!” The table was covered, a large stone pitcher filled with foaming beer was placed beside the master of the house, an immense loaf of bread was laid near it, and now Father Bach, after he had pronounced a short grace, served carefully out to all, eldest first, of course, while, with ladle and knife, in the meantime, Frau Gertrude helped to the smoking soup; all ate, chattered, joked.

Next day the Cantor visited the rector, in order to obtain the necessary permission to make a journey. This was a difficult step for him, for he avoided, as much as possible, any contact with this person. Rector and Cantor were certainly not friends. The first complained bitterly of his inferior's obstinate disposition and unyielding demeanor, and Bach scolded the rector for a stupid, God-forsaken pedant. There was no fresh branch on this old tree, indeed, with its promise or fulfilment of green leaves; the rector was winter-like, within and without.

Dry and circumscribed in body and soul, he was deeply buried in the thick dust of mouldy pedantry. Fresh flowers never rejoiced him; he counted their stamina, examined their cups, and then threw them from him. Mankind was indifferent to him; he loved no living soul. He called the organ-playing of his refractory Cantor devilish; he withdrew from its influence, and never visited the early service; he had even spread it abroad, that Bach had made a compact with the devil, to blow the bellows for him, when he played the organ. He laid obstacles in the way of his Cantor as often as possible, and rejoiced like a kobold at any sudden outbreak of anger from this giant nature. Willingly would he have overthrown him entirely; but to shake such a rock, needed greater force than his, and he stood alone in his hate; for teachers and scholars looked on the powerful lord of the rolling organ, in silent love and admiration. As Sebastian Bach, very much excited, entered the study of the school-tyrant,—for he had just held a choral rehearsal with the scholars, had been a little impatient over it, and his peruke, as was the custom on such occasions, was in a desolate condition,—the rector rose up in his leathern arm chair, fixed his gray eyes on the visitor, and said majestically: “Now what complaint brings the Herr Cantor?” “No complaint, Herr Rector,” answered Bach, “I only came to inform you that I must take a long journey to-morrow, by command of the Elector, and therefore request fourteen days leave of absence.” “What is this I hear?” asked the rector, breathless with surprise and anger,—“long journey?—must?—Elector?—and I have not been advised about it? Herr Cantor, this is another cunning plan of your genial artist brain? how should the Elector Augustus?”—“I am to play the organ at Dresden,” answered the Cantor calmly, “the Elector has commanded it.” “It sounds very improbable to me,” sneered the rector. “No particular time seems to have been allotted to the journey, and I must tell you without any ceremony, that I cannot spare you for the next four weeks. After that, I will not oppose your wishes.” Bach's ingenuous face did not give any symptom of anger during this malicious announcement; his eyes rested quietly on the face of his dwarfish opponent, and a compassionate smile played round his lips. At last he said firmly: “Herr Rector, give me, if you please, a decided answer! Will you give me fourteen days vacation?” “No! no! once more, no!” answered the enraged rector. “Very well, then I beg to inform you that I shall go without permission!” said the Cantor; and turning away, with hasty step he left the chamber of his enraged tormentor, without once looking back.

Süssmayr and Mozart's Requiem.

The London Musical World, of Feb. 11, says:

The widow of Mozart, for her own gain and profit, permitted the contemptible swindler, Süssmayr, to claim a share in the composition of the whole of her husband's greatest work, and to declare himself the sole author of some of the most beautiful portions of that transcendent masterpiece; having sold the right to print the Requiem, she, at a later period, repudiating the first transaction, made a second market of the work, and sold, for a second honorarium, the right to print (from Mozart's incomplete sketch, which had been filled up, according to the finished manuscript, by the execrable impostor, who impudently pretended to have co-composed the whole with Mozart) an edition of the Mass for the Dead, in which the portions respectively attributed to the true and the pseudo-composer are indicated. The consequence of this course of lawful exercise of right in property was, not only that great doubt arose in the minds of even studied musicians, as to Mozart's authorship of the work—this was of small comparative importance, since as the world possessed a composition, which no man, save one, that ever lived, could have produced, it mattered little whether or not that one was accredited with it—but that a man, whose only claim to notice was his insolent effrontery in putting on the lion's skin, which did not fit him, was allowed the too respectable position of having it doubted that he could have contributed to the chef d'œuvre.

Please read that again, so as to get fully the force of the invective against the unfortunate—but for his peace of mind now happily deceased—Süssmayr.

The catalogue of musical works sent by me to the Boston Library last year shows a collection of nearly all the literature, which can bear upon the history of Mozart's Requiem. The Cæcilia, containing the Gottfried Weber controversy, the resumé of this under the title of “Ergebnisse, &c.” the “Vertheidigung der Aechtheit,” by Abbo Stadler, with all the Nachtrags, Nissen's Biographie, a complete set of the Leipziger Allg. Musik Zeitung, &c., &c. I for several years contemplated contributing to the Journal a pretty full history of the controversy and the results to which it led. Some doubts as to the correctness of the views which I had drawn from a repeated perusal of the entire controversy, led me to defer writing until I could have the aids which I expected to find in Vienna; and then the expected appearance of Jahn's third volume occasioned another delay. That volume did not reach this part of Mozart's history; but at length the fourth volume too appeared; and his statements, with his discussions of the various points raised, are conclusive. In some points the article which I should have written would have been faulty, though I hardly think that upon the main question any doubts, after reading the controversy above mentioned, could remain. The only difficulty remaining was caused by that score of the Requiem found in Count Walsegg's musical collection, which which was alleged to be in Mozart's hand throughout. This difficulty is now removed entirely. To clear up the entire matter—which through Pierpont's American First Class Book has a romance about it which has become history to millions in our country—I now translate pretty fully those pages of Jahn's work which bear upon the history of the Requiem, and which place the zeal of the writer in the London Musical World in a rather ridiculous light.

Mozart is now at work upon the Zauberflöte, and here the translation begins.

“At this time (July, 1791) Mozart received an unexpected order and in an uncommon manner. A messenger,* a stranger to him—a tall, lean man, clad in gray, with a serious, solemn face,—a striking looking personage, just of the sort to make a strange impression—brought to him an anonymous letter, in which, amid the most flattering recognition of his artistic genius, it was asked at what price he would undertake to write a Mass for the dead, and how soon he could finish it.

“Mozart informed his wife of the affair, telling her that this order was a very welcome one, that he had a great desire to try his powers in that style of composition and to compose with all diligence a work which friends and foes should study after his death. By her advice he declared himself ready to undertake the work, although he was unable to set any time for its completion, and demanded as compensation fifty, according to others, one hundred, ducats. The terms proving acceptable, the messenger came a second time and paid the price agreed upon, adding a promise of something more when the work should be completed. He brought him directions to write entirely after his own mood and humor; moreover he should give himself no trouble to find out from whom the order came, since his pains would certainly be vain. Before Mozart could set himself earnestly at work, about the middle of August, he received a new order, which must be executed at once. At the approaching coronation of Leopold II. as King of Bavaria, at Prague, a new festival opera was to be given. Metastasio's Clemenza di Tito was chosen, and it was again the people of Prague who determined to make good what the Viennese failed in; the Assembly called upon Mozart to compose the work. For now unknown reasons this decision had been long delayed; there was now no time to be lost; but a few weeks were left during which Mozart had to compose and rehearse the work. After making but the most necessary preparations, he started for Prague. Just as he was entering his carriage with his wife, the unknown messenger appeared unexpectedly, gently pulled Madame Mozart by the gown, and asked: ‘What was now the prospect as to the Requiem?’ Mozart gave the absolute necessity of the journey as his excuse, and the impossibility of giving the unknown any notice of it, but promised that this should be his first labor after his return, if leave of absence could only now be granted; with which the messenger declared himself satisfied.”

[I pass over the account of the production and ill success of the Titus, with the aid afforded Mozart by Süssmayr in its composition; the ill effects upon his health of such continued exertion; Jahn's long criticism upon the opera; and the eighty-seven pages devoted to the Zauberflöte; and go on with the translation, where the Requiem again comes up.]

“After the Zauberflöte had been brought upon the stage, Mozart devoted himself zealously to finishing the Requiem. His friend, Joseph von Jacquin, came to him with a request to give lessons to a young lady, already an excellent pianiste, and found him at his writing table busy upon the Requiem. Mozart declared himself ready to take the pupil, if the lessons could be deferred a short time, as he had a work upon his hands, which was pressing and lay very near his heart; until this should be finished, he could think of nothing else. Other friends afterwards remembered having found Mozart at this work, which occupied him exclusively until a short time before his death. The constancy with which he devoted himself to this labor, night and day, increased the illness which he had brought with him from Prague. Already, while perfecting the Zauberflöte, he had had fainting fits, and now this physical prostration grew greater continually, and with it came a melancholy, which acquired even more complete command of him. His wife, grown anxious upon his account, in vain sought to draw him from his labors and take him into society; he remained sunk in his own thoughts and sad. One day when she rode out with him into the Prater, and they sat there together, he began to talk of death, and said, with tears in his eyes, that he was composing the Requiem for himself. 'I feel too sensibly,' continued he, 'that I shall not last much longer; some one has certainly given me poison, I cannot get rid of this idea.' Horrified at this remark she took all possible pains to convince him of the folly of such thoughts and reassure him. Convinced that the labor upon the Requiem but added to his morbid condition, she took the score from him and called in a physician, Dr. Closset.

"In fact he grew somewhat better, so as to be able to compose a Cantata for a Masonic festival, which he finished Nov. 15th and directed in the lodge.* Its excellent execution and the applause which it received rejoiced him and gave him new strength and desire to work; he himself now declared his idea of having been poisoned but a hallucination caused by his ill health, which was now dissipated, called for the score of the Requiem again, which his wife gave him again without hesitation, and proceeded with its composition. This improvement however was but temporary; a few days later his melancholy returned; he spoke again of having been poisoned; his strength failed more and more; his feet and hands began to swell; he was hardly able to move himself, and a sudden attack of vomiting followed. During the fourteen days that he was confined to his bed, his consciousness remained; death was always before his eyes, he looked forward to it with courage, but not without pain could he part with life. The success of the Zauberflöte opened to him the prospect of a nobler appreciation and remuneration than he had hitherto met with; for in these last days a company of Hungarian nobles had subscribed to secure him an annuity of 1000 florins, and from Amsterdam he had received the offer of a still higher sum for a contract to deliver annually a few pieces to be theirs exclusively; now, when he saw himself secure of a handsome competence, and could live for Art alone, he must away and leave his wife and his two little children to a future full of care. But still, on his sick bed, he remained as ever amiable, friendly, never exhibiting the slightest impatience.

"When he became sick," says Sophia Haibl, 'we made him night-clothes, which could be drawn on without compelling him to turn himself, which he was too much swollen to be able to do, and, as we had no idea how sick he was, we made him a wadded dressing-gown, ready against his recovery; with those he was heartily delighted. I visited him daily. One day he said to me, "Inform mamma (Madame Weber, his wife's mother), that I am getting along right well, and that I shall yet get up to the octave in time to wish her happiness on her name-day."'

"With lively sympathy he heard of the repetitions of the Zauberflöte, and evenings he would lay his watch beside him following in fancy the performance. 'Now the first act is over; now is the passage: Dir, grosse Königin der Nacht! On the day before his death he said to his wife, 'I should like to hear my

Zauberflöte once more!' and hummed, in a voice almost audible, 'der Vogelfänger bin ich ja.' Kapellmeister Roser, who was sitting by his bedside, arose, went to the pianoforte and sang the song, which enlivened Mozart much. The Requiem also continually employed his thoughts. While he was able to work upon it, he was in the habit of singing each number, as it was finished, playing the instrumentation upon the pianoforte. On the day before his death he had the score brought to his bed—it was two o'clock in the afternoon—and sang the alto himself; Shack sang as usual the soprano; Hofer, Mozart's brother-in-law, tenor; and Gerl, bass. They were in the first bars of the Lacrimosa when Mozart began to cry bitterly, and laid the score aside.†

"When the sister-in-law (Sophia Haibl) came, towards evening, her sister (Mozart's wife), who usually had such self-command, met her at the door, in despair, with the words, 'Thank God that you have come! He was so sick last night that I thought he would not live the day out; if he is so again he will die in the night.' As she drew near the bed, Mozart called to her, 'Good that you are here. You will remain with me to-night. You must see me die.' As she kept her composure and tried to talk him out of these thoughts, he answered, 'I have already the taste of death on my tongue, I smell death; and who will stand by my Constance, if you do not remain?' She asked his leave to step to her mother, to whom she had promised a report of his condition; when she came back she found Süßmayr by Mozart's bed in lively conversation about the Requiem. 'Have I not said that I am writing this Requiem for myself?' said he, as he looked it through with tearful eyes. And he was so certain of the near approach of death as to direct his wife that she should not allow it to be known farther until Albrechtsberger was informed of it, for before God and the world to him belonged his (Mozart's) appointment in St. Stephen's church.

"Late in the evening the physician came again and told Süßmayr in confidence that there was now no help possible; yet he ordered the application of cold bandages to his patient's head, which gave such a shock to his system as soon to deprive him of consciousness, which never returned. Still in the dying fantasies of the sick man the Requiem seemed to employ his thoughts; he puffed out his cheeks and endeavored to imitate the drums with his mouth. Towards midnight he raised himself; his eyes were fixed; he turned his head towards the wall, and seemed to sink into slumber; at one o'clock in the morning (Dec. 5) he had departed."

† Jahn says in a note, that Mozart not unfrequently was so affected by his own music as to cry, and gives an instance from Hogarth's "Musical Drama."

W. V. Wallace's New Opera.

"Lurline—Opera in three acts, written by Edward Fitzball, composed by William Vincent Wallace" (London, Cramer, Beale and Chappell; New York Wm. Hall and Son.)

Here we have the English text and piano-forte score of Mr. Wallace's new opera, which—as the first that has been heard from his pen since the production of Matilda of Hungary (with Mr. Bunn's memorable libretto), at Drury Lane Theatre, in 1846—presents more than ordinary interest. Lurline is said to have been in great part written as far back as twelve years ago; but it requires no such apology, bearing evidence as it does—evidence that springs from a comparison between this opera and Mr. Wallace's previous dramatic works—of having been carefully reconsidered and retouched by the composer from end to end.

The questionable feature of Lurline is its libretto, which belongs to a class of melodramatic writing happily now effete. Mr. Fitzball has treated the romantic and famous legend of the Lurlei-berg after a manner peculiar to himself. In the legend, the heroine, deceived by a false lover, invokes the spirits of the Rhine, and consents to become the bride of the river on condition of being endowed with gifts of beauty and fascination that shall render her irresistible to man, whom hereafter it is her intention to lure into destruction by every means at her command. The compact is made, and Lorelei, or Lurlei (Lurline) becomes the spirit of the whirlpool, with what mission it is unnecessary to remind our readers. Mr. Fitzball finds the lady a spirit, and restores her to earth. She sees Count Rudolph in a bark on the river, falls in love with him, and tempts him to her abode beneath the waves, not to destroy, but, like Melusina, to cherish. Her vexed father (she has a father), the River-King, burning (or rather we should say freezing) to annihilate the rash mortal who has thus intruded on his domain, is frustrated in his desire by the amorous water-spirit, and at length persuaded to let Rudolph depart, loading him with treasures in the bargain, in order that he may be consoled for the loss of his beloved. Aware that the Count's affairs are by no means in good order, and that the emptiness of his purse had led to the rejection of his hand by Ghiva, daughter of a Rhenish Baron, the River-King judges—from a view of mortality, perhaps, common to water-spirits—that no sooner gone than, "out of sight out of mind," Rudolph will forget Lurline, and cast himself and his newly-acquired riches at the feet of the disdainful Ghiva. Lurline, however, with more faith, has promised to give her earthly admirer an interview at the Lurlei-berg, in the course of three days. On Rudolph's return to terra firma (how he managed to live under water we are left to surmise), the knowledge of his being possessed of untold wealth acts in the way the River-King had suspected—at least upon one mortal, the mercenary Ghiva, though not upon Rudolph himself. He, poor wight, does nothing but sigh after his lost water-nymph, and actually snubs Ghiva, who, in despair, possesses herself of a ring which Lurline has given him as a pledge, and, in a fit of jealous rage, throws it into the Rhine. True to her appointment, Lurline makes her appearance at the end of the stipulated period, and learning from a gnome (?) that Rudolph has parted with the ring (which, as the spirit of the Rhine, one might have thought she would be the first to know), gives way to unutterable anguish. In her subsequent interview with Rudolph, however, when matters are explained to her satisfaction, she once more, and for the last time, makes use of her supernatural power, invoking the storm-spirits dependent on the Rhine to overwhelm a band of reprobates, who, recently guests of the Count, are now plotting his assassination for the sake of his gold, and ultimately persuades her watery sire, the good-natured, though somewhat illogical River-King, to approve her choice and resign her to her terrestrial lover. Fancy the old Rhine spirit with whom Heinrich Heine held converse at Cologne, expressing himself in such terms as the subjoined:—

"Yes; thy fond father
To Rudolph's hand here cometh to resign,
By love and fate decreed,
His child, Lurline,
Best treasure of the Rhine!" [Joins their hands.]

And so, amidst a heap of elaborate vocal divisions, Lurline, "best treasure of the Rhine," expresses her sense of happiness, and the curtain drops. If Lurline—which, we understand, was written many years since, may be regarded as Mr. Fitzball's last great work—his Requiem (it certainly cannot be accepted as his Transfiguration)—why, then, there might be an end of the matter, and no critic, however soured by operatic libretti, would have the heart to be severe; but if, on the contrary, farther preparations of the same description are contemplated, it is as well to warn our composers that the time has passed for the toleration of such performances.

Such a jumble of spirits and mortals, with the special elements of either made apparently common to both—all the dramatis personæ being, more or less, amphibious—could only have sprung from the brain of a Fitzball, and justifies the epigrammatic epilogue of a wag, that the mixture of earth and water in Lurline accounted for the muddiness of its libretto.

But let us pass to a more agreeable subject—the music of Mr. Wallace. Lurline is certainly this gentleman's dramatic masterpiece, and as far superior to Maritana and Matilda of Hungary as the book of Maritana (not that of Matilda) is superior to the book of Lurline. Mr. Wallace has in every respect made progress, such progress as is rarely noted, indeed, between any two successive works of a dramatic composer. We find the old vein of melody as rich as formerly, with an increased knowledge of resources that gives it a tenfold value. The overture, in the broad and open key of D major, far surpasses, in clearness of design, and vigor of treatment, the orchestral preludes of Mr. Wallace's other operas. The instrumentation, too, is extremely effective, the combination of "wind" in the opening adagio, and the introduction, by the whole body of "strings," high and low, the double basses alone excepted, of the beautiful melody which, in the third act, stands as the theme of Lurline's prayer, being equally points to admire. The quick movement, like that in the overture to Weber's Oberon, although the first subject is no more strictly akin to Weber than to the allegro in Wagner's Tannhäuser, is rather chivalrous than fairy-like. It is vigorous and brilliant from end to end, and among many new touches of fancy may be noted the passage of rhythmical recitative given to the stringed instruments, ushering in the progression which leads back to the principal theme. The second theme (afterwards an episode in the romance of the "Night winds"—Act I.) is essentially melodious, contrasts strikingly with the leading theme, and works in well with the rest. In short, Mr. Wallace in this overture has evidently written his best, and, earnestly bent upon success, has attained it. Although we have only the piano-forte adaptation before us, it may be as well to observe, once for all, that the manner in which the orchestra is handled throughout the opera of Lurline, imparting color to and heightening the dramatic sentiment of the various situations into which the chief personages are thrown, while engendering effects the occasional novelty and frequent beauty of which are sure to elicit the attention of musicians, confers infinite honor on the composer, and shows that his studies have been well directed in the long interval during which he has been condemned, in so far as the English public are concerned, to unmerited silence. The introductory symphony (in F major) at the rise of the curtain, where the accompaniment of the violoncello, to a melodious phrase for the horn, realizes what the Italian musicians designate as "ondeggando," at once suggests that we are about to be entertained with a spectacle in which some of the actors are fairies, and that the habitation of those fairies will, in all probability, turn out to be rather aquatic than terrestrial. Lurline's romance (Act I.), "When the night winds sweep the wave" (in A minor—already mentioned), a most original and beautiful piece in itself, offers, perhaps, the most remarkable example in the entire work of the fanciful treatment of the orchestra in which Mr. Wallace has shown himself so skilled an adept. The accompaniments to this are as uncommon as they are characteristic, and, at the same time, masterly.

The opening of the first scene (after the symphony to which allusion has been made) is somewhat ineffective. No one cares greatly for Rhineberg (an odd name for a king who resides underneath the water,) and no one cares a straw for Zelleck, the gnome (we thought gnomes were earth spirits), whom he wildly invokes in the bold and vigorous air, "Idle spirit, wildly dreaming" (in F minor). So that, however excellent per se, and however well given by Mr. Santley, the air and the recitatives that precede and follow it, the last being dialogue, in which Mr. Corri (the gnome) takes part, falls somewhat flat. The "other nymphs" (vide book) whom Mr. Fitzball summons "from their shells of opal" (no nymphs having yet appeared), in a pretty choral strain ("Hark, hark, hark,"—A flat) from behind, begin to awaken attention, and the graceful quasi-Weberian chorus ("King of the Rhine"—same key) with which, when before the footlights, they greet their dripping monarch, at once imparts life and interest to the scene. The apparition of Lurline, at the foot of a rock, singing to "an antique harp," the confession of her love for Rudolph, is illustrated by a brief concerted piece, in which the other personages, including Liba, a water-nymph (a part, we may here add, very prettily played and very prettily sung by Miss Fanny Cruise, a young and promising beginner), are concerned. The first romance of Lurline ("Flow on, flow on, oh silver Rhine"—E major), in which she begs the river, the flowers, and the spirits to explain her sentiments to Rudolph, is based on a melody sure from its piquant, simple, and unpretending character to become popular, and, moreover, graced with florid cadences and a florid coda, or tailpiece, precisely fitted to the peculiar talent of Miss Louisa Pyne, who warbles it exquisitely. The chorus divides the two couplets, and in the second verse the accompaniment is judiciously varied. A scene between Lurline and Rhineberg, in accompanied recitative—a form, by the way, into which Mr. Wallace (a task as difficult as it is thoroughly well accomplished) has thrown all those parts of the opera which would otherwise be spoken dialogue—leads to the delicious romance, "The Night Winds," already described, a revelation on the part of the water-nymph of the history of her love for Rudolph. The chorus that brings the first scene to an end ("Sail, sail, sail"—D flat), in which the principal characters join, though spirited and appropriate, offers no particular point for notice.

In the second scene, where we have to do with simple mortals, the music assumes an essentially different character—as in duty bound. It sets out with a very admirably written duet ("Oh! Rudolph, haughty Rudolph"—D major) for the Baron Truenfels (carefully represented by Mr. Honey, as a decrepid old man, with bent knees and crooked legs) and Ghiva (Miss Pilling) his daughter. This duet, of which, as in many of those of Auber and other French composers, the orchestra claims the lion's share, the voices being often little more than accompaniments, contains a very charming episode, in which a passage occurs on the words, "Oh, soft affection, to thy rest," equally to be admired for its melody and its harmony. The arrival of Rudolph (Mr. Harrison) brings some clever concerted music, conducting to a trio (A major):

"I see by the gray of the sky

where the composer, by showing how it is not absolutely necessary that the music and poetry in a dramatic composition should breathe the same spirit, has upset the pet theory of Herr Wagner, who, in his Kunstwerk der Zukunft, would fuse all the arts into one, and make them inseparable and dependent on each other. Although French in color and in the turn of its leading phrases (the last especially, "Good night, sir, good night," as, indeed, is frequently the case with the lighter music of Mr. Wallace—this trio may be unreservedly eulogized for spirit and scenic propriety.

The third scene (Rudolph's castle) opens with a drinking chorus, "Drain the cup of pleasure" (D major), in bolero measure, cheerful and animated, if not strikingly original, which owes no little of the favor it enjoys (it is always redemanded) to the admirable singing of the chorus (men's voices, of course). Some effective concerted music leads to a romance, with chorus for Rudolph ("Our bark, in moonlight beaming"—D minor), which embodies the legend of Lurline, the Rhine-spirit. Here the ordinary method of treating such matters at the French Opera has not been discarded, notwithstanding which the romance has both character and merit of its own. Though decidedly simple, it is imbued with a feeling of dreamy mysteriousness, entirely in keeping with the sentiment conveyed in the text. The finale (beginning in A flat, and ending in F minor), sets out with a harp arpeggio, while snatches from the ballad, "Flow on, flow on, oh! silver Rhine," indicate the approach of Lurline, who shortly emerges from the river and mingles with the noisy guests of her lover. Placing the ring on his finger, which is to be a pledge of mutual faith, no less than a potent charm, and a safeguard in case of subtidal difficulties, she at length, in spite of opposition from Rudolph's associates, lures him into a skiff, which immediately disappears. Rhineberg, with "a host of spirits," is seen among the rocks, vowing vengeance against Rudolph: a storm arises; the skiff is supposed to sink beneath the waters, and the curtain falls. All this is combined with vigorous, striking and picturesque music, and the result is a finale which brings the act to a climax in a thoroughly effective manner.

The Diarist Abroad.

NOTES, BERLIN, (FEB., 1860.)

Has M—any desire to know about music at court? Here then is a passage from a letter of a friend to his wife containing something on the subject:

"The Soirée and Concert at the Prince of Prussia's was a truly fairy festival. The range of rooms surrounding the concert hall was filled with the most brilliant company, while the passages and smaller rooms were transformed by means of orange trees, palms and flowers into gardens of paradise—this entire world of faerie being enlivened by music, conducted by Meyerbeer. The acme of the concert was the great scene out of Gluck's Orpheus, sung by Jenny Meyer and chorus."

The scene is the palace of the Prince of Prussia, now Regent. This building, with the Royal Library, forms a parallelogram, of which the palace fronts are upon Unter den Linden and Behren Sts., the Library looking across a small square upon the Opera House. The Concert hall, as described to me, is a large oval room, with a dome and narrow gallery running back of the Library and forming the connection between the two parts of the palace. The hall has space ample for the full royal orchestra, and a select chorus from the opera, and an audience of six to eight hundred auditors. I have never seen it. From the gallery we look down into the hall upon the hundreds of women blazing with jewels and dressed in all the magnificence which European clothes-art can impart, upon the hundreds of princes, generals, ambassadors, ministers, professors, and so on, glittering with orders, in all sorts of splendid uniforms, and in short made up for a show; into the anterooms filled with foliage and flowers, and upon the ranks of singers or musicians—such a look my friend describes as beyond all his powers of description. Well, what music was given? A translation of the programme will show you:

"Concert in the Palace of their Royal Highnesses Prince Regent and the Frau Princess of Prussia, under the direction of the General-Music-Director and Court Capellmeister, Herr Meyerbeer, on the 18th of February, 1860.

1. Overture to Egmont. . . . . Beethoven.
2. Hymn from the Opera "The Vestal," sung by Frau Küster, Fraulein de Ahna and chorus. . . . . Spontini.
3. Wedding March from "Summer Night's Dream" . . . . . Mendelssohn.
4. Air, "Inflammatus," from "Sabbat Master," sung by Frau Küster and chorus. . . . . Rossini.
5. Overture to "Struensee" . . . . . Meyerbeer.
6. Grand Scene from the Opera "Orpheus," sung by Fraulein Jenny Meyer and chorus. . . . . Gluck.
7. Scene from "Trovatore," sung by Frau Küster, Herr Formes, (the tenor) and chorus. . . . . Verdi.
8. Finale from the Opera, "Count Orly" . . . . . Rossini.

My friend says that the scene from "Orpheus" was wonderful! that it killed what followed, dead, dead, dead!

Letters on Musical Subjects.

V.

MUSIC A LANGUAGE—A SONATA OF BEETHOVEN.

My Dear Friend,—While our "Philharmonic Society" is forming, I may use the time, to answer some of your questions. And although you may find here many things that you know already, yet it is well sometimes, to look back and arrange familiar things in order.

Now to say, what is the principal and governing element of musical utterance, is a matter of some difficulty. Not, that it is impossible, nor, that it has never been done. All these things have been treated of so frequently, that they are now quite familiar to musical people. But the difficulty lies in the wide ground covered by that question.

A mysterious power, subtle and penetrating, working up all our being, making it throb in sympathetic unison with that of the tone-poet; an agent, now passing through the finest fibres of our being, with a thrill of joy and ravishing bliss, then lulling our senses and feelings into a delicious, dreamlike state of serene satisfaction; now touching us with the magician's wand, and in weird numbers making our flesh creep with darkening awe, then transporting us to regions ethereal, warmed by eternal sunshine; now making us bend low with humblest meekness, then raising us up to a proud consciousness of a majestic grandeur, in our nature; now singing out in trembling accents the half unconscious bliss of new-born, or in longing tones the pangs of unsatisfied love, and, then again, picturing the clash of opposing passions, fierce, unholy hatred; now exciting in us a deep sympathy with the suffering of others, then freeing us from the oppressive load of our own sorrows—such is Music, the youngest daughter of the muses, the friend and comforter of man. Acting upon our innermost being by means of the subtlest of elements, the air, invisible and hardly perceptible unless agitated, it partakes of the nature of this, its medium. And as the gentle breath of balmy Spring pervades us, sending out in every part fresh life and new enjoyment, so music steals in on its wings, and caressing our heart, nestling closely to it, and steeping it in bliss, attunes it in holy harmony to that which is noblest and sweetest in human nature. Or it assails us in violent outbursts, overawing us, filling us with a perception of the gigantic and terrible, just as the air does, when, hurled along in violent gusts in the tempest, it strikes and cowers us.

It seems an almost fruitless endeavor, to seize this thing apparently bodiless, and yet acting so powerfully on us; to grasp, and become familiar with, the nature of a force, that has greater influence on us than words, the expression of logical thought, or any of the sister-arts. The fable of Orpheus, the stories about the effect of warlike music on the soldier, the experience of our own lives, prove the superior influence of music on our feelings. We know that much. But how are we to account for it?

It is a question that has puzzled man ever since he began to think, that is still as near or as far from its solution, as it was, when the ancient Hindoo and Chinese philosophers were theorizing about it; the question about the ultimate cause of all life. When the question shall once be settled satisfactorily, then the philosopher will have no further difficulty in giving a true account of the reasons, why music thus powerfully influences us. We know, that, entering the centre of nervous action, the brain, on the very shortest route, coming in bodily contact with the central and peripheric part of the nervous system by means of vibration, it is natural, the tone or a succession and combination of tones should affect us more powerfully than a picture or a statue. But why the tone is produced by a stated, countable number of vibrations of the body emitting the sound; why tones of a proportionate number of vibrations, and they in certain combinations only, should affect us pleasantly; how the action on the nerves is produced: these are questions which we may as well despair of ever seeing answered. We had better follow the naturalist, who, satisfied to leave the questions about the first origin of matter, of the final nature of the simplest elements, in their primordial darkness, considers the forms of the actual world of beings, trying to trace them to their elements. By applying his method to our Art, we may be sure to find out, which forms the tone-poet uses to express a sentiment; which is the arrangement of the simplest elements of such forms; and how these forms affect the hearer.

These are points settled, and not now wanting proof or discussion:—that music is the language of our emotions; that it speaks of, and to our feelings immediately, without the aid of the understanding; but that, the feeling having once come to our consciousness, the understanding may analyze, and in some cases, reduce them to a logical narrative of the consecutive order and arrangement of those feelings.

Let us take some examples which will show this practically. You remember the sweet Sonata in G major, op. 14, No. 2, by Beethoven. There is sunshine and youth; not a discordant element mixes with the blissful sensations pictured in the lovely work. There is variety of sentiment; the sentiment is strongly characterized. Yet no one, I think, could prove, why those sentiments follow and ought to follow each other in just the order, in which we find them. Let us take a passing survey of the work. The first movement opens with a prelude (measures 1—8). In measure 9 the first melody comes in, almost like a recitative, running out in tender, graceful runs, which lead us to the second melody in m 27, a melody, loving, but only as the first whisperings of unconscious, budding love; not deep yet; half playful, half longing. It calms down after seven measures in m 33, and leads over in m 48 to the quiet closing phrase of two measures, repeated to the end of the part, in m 64. The same elements are worked up in the second part, in m 64—125. It is in the nature of the second part of the Sonata-form to be more agitated. And thus the second part shows in m 81—115 some excitement. The bass takes the motive of the prelude m 1 and 2, while the right hand accompanies in arpeggi to m 99. The prelude is introduced in E flat major, m 99—107, and once more the agitation, this time in a strong wayward bass-figure accompanied by hurried runs in the treble, shows itself to m 115, from whence, panting as if it were, after resting, the motive of the prelude rouses itself again leading over to the third part, an enlargement of the first, m 125—201. The excitement of the second part is not deep nor violent. It is more like a cloud flitting across a beautiful face, darkening it for a moment, but not contorting its enchanting lineaments by the deeper corrugations of passion or anguish.

Serenely the Andante; in staccato chords, introduces a melody full of the charming and loving simplicity of innocence, which yet admits of a touch of humor in m 17 and 18. In pleasant variations the theme unfolds itself, as if playing with its own loveliness (Var. 1.), not without a taste of an arch but innocent humorous coquettishness (Var. 2) and overrunning with most graceful merriment (in Var. 3). The Scherzo, Allegro assai, the third and last movement is brimfull of "real fun;" the lightly skipping, gay motive in m 1 filling at least two-thirds of the 255 m that make up the part. In m 24 a roguish motive follows the first, which comes in again in m 43—73. Here it is relieved by a melody of sweetest, graceful, musing happiness, which repeats after a second part, containing the same sentiments to m 125, when the first motive enters again, to m 185, and from here, in graceful abandon, a passage leads to the closing measures 189—255, having the motive of m 24 in the bass, and skipping about across the arpeggio-accompaniments to m 287, when the first motive closes in frequent repetitions in m 255. This beautiful work impresses me like a sweet maiden, just budding into womanhood. With all the roguishness, vivacity, innocent simplicity of the gay and joyous girl mingles a tinge, a sweet foretaste of the coming experience, which will ripen the bud into the loving woman. All the tenderness and grace of that age, where love is just trying its wings, not knowing when and whither it may take its flight; all the youthful loveliness and careless abandon of this period; the tender, half-fledged feelings; all find their utterance in this poem. But to say, why these moods follow each other just so, to prove that that they ought to follow thus, is a thing of impossibility in my judgment. It is the play of the feelings in a maiden fancy-free, now assuming this, now that hue. But reasoning understanding cannot follow this play of the feelings, it cannot deduce a series of ideas from them.

In my next letter I shall contrast with this another of Beethoven's Sonatas; perhaps the one in C sharp minor, op. 27, No. 2, the "moonlight Sonata," as it is called; or the one in E flat major, op. 81, which Beethoven entitled: "Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour," or maybe both, to show, how a logical order of feelings, capable of finding expression in words, may be represented in a piece of music.

Though not a musical subject, yet I may call your attention to an article in the N. Y. Tribune of March 24th, on Wilhelm Grimm, the great German philologist, since it is written by the genial "Diarrist" of this Journal, whose sensible, earnest, and oftentimes beautiful articles have certainly pleased and instructed you as they have your friend.

Cambridge, March 27, 1856. G. A. SCHMITT.

HOW SPOHR LEARNED TO PLAY THE HORN.—In 1808 was held at Erfurt the famous Congress at which Napoleon entertained as guests his friend the Emperor Alexander and the German kings and princes, his allies. All the curious persons flocked from the neighboring places to have a gaze at the show. I, too, went on foot from Gotha, with some of my pupils, less to see the great ones of the earth, than to admire the illustrious artists of the Theatre Francaise, Talma and Mlle. Mars. The Emperor had made these great actors come from Paris, and they were giving every evening some masterpiece or other by Corneille and Racine. I hoped to be able to be present with my travelling companions at one of their performances; when I learned, to my misfortune, that they were only intended for the Princes and their suites, and that every other person was shut out. I still hoped to find a place in the orchestra, by the connivance of the musicians; but I was obliged to give up this idea, too, since they were strictly forbidden to introduce any person whatsoever. At last I hit on the expedient of replacing, with my pupils, a like number of musicians, and to be present at the entertainment by playing the music between the acts. By playing, we got the consent of the musicians, who knew that their deputies would replace them creditably. But another difficulty arose—the parts of violin and viola only gave us three places, and as we did not know how to play another instrument, one of us must be obliged to give up the treat. The idea then occurred to me of trying if I could not, in the course of one day, learn enough of the horn to be able to take on myself the part of second horn. I went at once to him I wished to replace, borrowed his instrument, and thereupon set to work. I began by producing frightful noises; but after scarcely an hour, I succeeded in giving out the natural sounds of the horn. After dinner, when my scholars went out to stroll, I at once resumed my exercises, and, in spite of the pain which they gave my lips, I did not rest until I was in a state correctly to play the part of the second horn in the overture—easy enough in truth—and of the entr'actes which were to be given. Thus ready, my pupils and I joined our comrades, each carrying his instrument—and got to our post without difficulty. We found the theatre brilliantly lit up, and already filled with the numerous train of the Princes. The places kept for Napoleon and his guests were just behind the orchestra. Like the unfledged hornplayer I was, I entrusted the conducting of the band to the heat of my pupils, taking my orders from him like the rest. Shortly after we had tuned, the august personages entered, and the overture began. The orchestra formed a long line facing the stage; and it was severely forbidden to the players to turn round in the direction of the Princes for the satisfaction of their curiosity. As I had been warned of this beforehand, I had brought with me a little looking-glass, by aid of which I could examine with impunity the arbiters of Europe's destinies, after the overture was done. But I was so rivetted by the admirable acting of the artists on the stage, that I soon handed over my looking-glass to my pupils, giving all my attention to the drama. The agony of my lips increased with every entr'acte, and at the end of the performance they were so swelled and bruised that I could scarcely snp. Even the next day, when I got home, my young wife was not a little surprised to see me come back with lips like a negro's. I added to her wonderment by telling her that I was reduced to such a state by kissing the pretty women of Erfurt. But she made famous game of me when the story of my studies on the horn came out.—Spoher's Autobiography.

NEW YORK, MARCH 26.—More rumors of opera. Rumors assuming a definite shape. MARETEK negotiating for the Winter Garden with success, and actually beginning his rehearsals. FABRI going to sing with ERRANI, the new tenor, and with Miss WISLER, a contralto from Philadelphia, said to be very good. Rumors that CORTESI will join the troupe, and that Maretzek is prepared to exercise all his energies to triumph over his natural enemy, ULLMAN.

Latter individual to be at the Academy of Music, in second week of April, and to have little PATTI and FREZZOLINI. They say that Frezzolini has completely recovered her voice, and is going to be as great as in her palmiest days.

ADELAIDE PHILLIPS arrived in town the other day, and is at her old stopping place, the St. James Hotel, on Union square. She came from Charleston by land, unable to bear the sea journey. In Havana, she had a serious attack of fever, but is now nearly convalescent.

I learn from a private letter from Santiago di Cuba, that the opera company there, under MORELLI, ASSONI and STEFANI, are meeting with only moderate success. They have given Trovatore, Lucresia, Lucia, and the Barber. GEIOMI, one of the singers imported by Ullman, had met with a great triumph in Ernani. She never appeared in a leading rôle in this city. She is a blonde, and envious people say that Signora Ghioni is only an Italianized version of Miss Jones, as Donovan was of Miss O'Donovan, and Signor Maccaferri of Mr. McCaffrey. LORINI, the tenor, has been singing with Ghioni—ALDINI, a contralto who sang here several times only in the part of Azucena in Trovatore, also belongs to the troupe, and does the Rosina in the Barber.

TIBERINI, the tenor, who sang here a few years ago with La Grange, is trying to get another engagement in this country. He has a wife, one ORTOLANI by name, who from all accounts is a fair to middling prima donna—MARINI and BETTINI are engaged for next year at St. Petersburg. So they won't come here. BOLCIONI, who sang the tenor music in William Tell better than any Italian singer that has yet tried it here, has been having a quarrel with the manager of San Carlo, in Naples, where he was singing in Luisa Miller. So much for our old favorites.

Scharfenberg and Luis have just published Muzio's Garibaldi Rataplan, and the Adelina waltz sung by little Patti. Muzio is becoming quite popular here. He certainly patches up an opera admirably, and can compose in the Verdi style, just like the original Joseph Green himself. Did you ever know the graceful name Giuseppe Verdi is, after all (in English,) nothing more than Joseph Green?

The Philharmonic Society gave the last concert but one of the season, at the Academy of Music, on Saturday evening, the programme presenting the following attractions:

Romanza, from "Maria Padilla," . . . . . G. Donizetti
Signor Pietro Centemeri.
Overture to "Der Freyschütz," in C. . . . . C. M. von Weber
Mr. H. C. Timm presided at the piano; conductor, Carl Bergmann.

The "Symphonic Poem" of Liszt did not please. It is a harsh, ungrateful thing both to perform and to listen to: the audience manifested weariness long before it was over; although it exhibits a quaint and striking originality that cannot fail to interest the musician. Madame GRAEVER JOHNSON played with taste and elegance, and Signor CENTEMERI gave great satisfaction. He is one of the best baritones in the country, and it is surprising he has not been heard in opera. He sings in Dr. Cummings' Roman Catholic Church in Twenty-eight street, and his solos are among the finest performances that may be heard in that accomplished choir.

There is, at present, quite a feeling in favor of band music, owing principally to the great success of a concert recently given by the National Guard (Seventh Regiment) Band. This was formerly Shelton's band, but now consists of an amalgamation of Noll's and Shelton's band, under the leadership of Grafulla, formerly a cornet player under Shelton. The concert took place at the Academy of Music, and drew such an immense house, that the Secretary of the Mercantile Library thought it would be a good idea to get the same band to give a concert at the same place, for the benefit of the library. So the house was hired, the band performers secured, and Messrs. PERRING and THOMAS, vocalists (there were actually no female singers in town at the time, to be got for love or money,) engaged. It cost the library eight hundred dollars, but the speculation succeeded. The immense Academy of Music was crowded, and the net profits must have been something, if not more.

All this, gave quite an impetus to band music, and greatly enhanced the reputation of the National Guard Band. Now hitherto, Dodworths' band—playing for the Seventy-first Regiment—has enjoyed the precedence over all others. Naturally anxious for their reputation, the members of Dodworths' have decided to give a concert too, and it will come off next Saturday evening at the Cooper Institute. Altogether this is quite an interesting band tournament.

TROYATOR.

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 27.—The Harmonic Society's concert, last night, consisted of a miscellaneous programme; English ballads and Italian cavatinae were consorted with oratorio and opera choruses. The solo singing was generally very satisfactory, whether furnished by the professional or the amateur portion of the society's forces; but all of the choruses lacked the requisite power. I was gratified with the singular purity of voice of a certain soprano, who bore a large share in the varied performances. Verily, her singing upon this occasion, was a new revelation—bringing to light the gratifying fact of a voice in our midst, which, in time, must prove a source of pride to all who are interested in the cause of music. The lady in question is said to be diligently pursuing a judicious course of study, under the able guidance of Sig. PERELLI, the eminent teacher of Italian vocalization.

Prof. AARON R. TAYLOR, principal basso on this occasion, acquitted himself in a creditable manner, vocalizing all the parts assigned to him with much feeling, self-possession and flexibility of voice—and displaying, withal, a uniformly tasteful appreciation of subject. The interest and success of this concert were materially enhanced by the participation of Messrs. JOHN J. FRAZER and THOMAS BISHOP, both known as quondam tenors of the Seguin Opera troupe, and now residing here professionally. Frazer sang "My sister dear," with so much of pathos and purity of intonation, as to hold his auditors spell-bound for the moment, and then to evoke thunders of applause, which carried him through a double encore. Nor was Bishop's success less. He, too, received the most enthusiastic plaudits from a public, which has long since ranked him among the very best ballad singers.

Our favorite organist, Prof. M. H. Cross, accompanied charmingly, as he always does—executing all transient intricacies with nicety, and at the same time, bearing in an admirable manner with the humors of the various vocalists.

We are to enjoy three nights of opera, next week. Alle gute Sachen sind drei. PATTI and COLSON are said to have charmed even the agitated, president-making politicians into something like sentimentality. A certain distinguished exponent of the squatter sovereignty abstraction, is said to have forgotten the ambitious scheme of a life time, in a nightly attendance within the seductive influences of music, as exerted by the two Lore-leis, Patti and Colson. The troupe returns to us, flushed with a success, both in Washington and in Baltimore, which has added fresh lustre to its reputation, and plenty of funds to the managerial exchequer. On dit, that MARETZEK, who is to open the New York Winter Garden on the 9th of April, has taken the Academy here, for a short season in May. He has been invisible from the corner of Broad and Locust, since a certain night when he and Torriani improvised a grand row with the habitués of that season—and when the indomitable Max is reported to have gone horizontally through a side window, in veritable Harlequin style. Miss ANNA WISSELER, who has resided here for several years, and who made a sort of informal operatic debut with the French Opera Comique Company, which humbugged us sometime since, has been engaged as the principal contralto of this Winter Garden troupe. She possesses a magnificent voice, and a very high degree of cultivation. Her debut is to be made in Linda di Chamounix, an opera assigned to her by the inflexible impresario, contrary to her own predilections. On Thursday next, the last WOLFSOHN and HOHNSTOCK concert is to take place. Those who have attended these delightful classical reunions, will regret their close, but rejoice to learn that the complete success which has attended them, will prove necessary encouragement for another edifying series, next winter. MANRICO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 31, 1860.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—We commence to-day the publication of WEBER's wild and exquisite opera Der Freyschütz, which we propose to give entire, arranged for the piano-forte. The first instalment of four pages contains the title-page, and an explanation of the plot, with references to each number of the music which will follow. BENNETT's "May Queen" Cantata will be continued alternately with the Freyschütz.

Concerts.

Mn. B. J. LANG.—The Compliment to this young artist, on Saturday evening, previous to his departure for Europe, was general, hearty, and substantial. The new Hall in Bumstead Place was fuller than it has ever been.—No complaints this time on the score of ventilation; it was simply want of management before.

Moderato and Andante from Quintet in C, op. 8. . . . V. Lachner Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
Scena and Aria from "Nina Pazzo" . . . . . Paisiello
Mrs. Long.
Adagio and Scherzo from Sonata in D, for Piano and Violoncello. . . . . Mendelssohn Messrs. Fries and Lang.
Duetto from "Don Giovanni." "La ci darem" . . . . . Mozart
Mrs. Long and Mr. Wetherbee.
Duo for two Piano-fortes, (8 hands). . . . . Moscheles Andante con moto—Fugue—Finale, Alla Siciliana.
Messrs. Dreese, Parker, Leonhard and Lang.
Moderato and Andante from Quartet in E flat, No. 4. . . . Mozart Messrs. Schultze, Meisel, Ryan and Fries.
Fantaisie for Piano, on themes from "Belshazzar" . . . . . Goria
Mr. Lang.
English Ballad. "What will you do, love?" . . . . . Lover
Mrs. Long.
L'Invitation a la Valse, arranged for two Pianos, (8 hands)
Weber
Messrs. Dreese, Parker, Leonhard and Lang.

Mr. Lang was rich in audience and in programme, rich in the friendly aid of other artists, in his own strength, and particularly rich in pianos; since there were two of those superb Erard-like Grands, just manufactured by the Messrs. Chickering. The two pieces performed on these instruments, by eight hands, were indeed the most interesting feature, apart from personal regards, in the whole entertainment. That by Moscheles is a masterly composition, happy in its themes, learned yet not dry in treatment, graceful in forms, keeping the interest alive by seasonable contrasts, and affording fine scope for the combined exercise of such executive and interpretative talents as our city may be proud of in the persons of Messrs. DRESEL, PARKER, LEONHARD, and LANG. A richer body of tone, — of full, yet always clear, upspringing harmony; greater precision of clear-cut outline, or more fineness of light and shade; greater vitality of touch, with perfect unity and aplomb in the striking out of vigorous chords, and sparkling purity and grace in ornamental phrasing, we may seldom hear. Weber's Invitation — the very poetry of the waltz — renewed the sensation it produced when played here for the first time last year. For assurance that no musician-ship or poesy was wanting in the eight-hand arrangement, it is enough to know that it was made by Mr. Dresel. (Ditson & Co. have published it.)

Of the contributions by the Quintette Club, the two movements from Mozart's finest Quartet were the cream, of course. As for the Quintet by Lachner, we found our interest in the first movement rather on the wane than growing, while the Andante was soporifically long and tedious.

Mrs. J. H. LONG and Mr. WETHERBEE gave a great deal of pleasure by their singing. The La ci darem duet was indeed nicely rendered, and there was no evading a repetition of the ever popular old melody.

In his own person Mr. LANG, besides taking the upper part at one of the two pianos in the eight-hand pieces, gave us in the first place an excellent rendering of the two movements from Mendelssohn's piano and violoncello Sonata, admirably supported by WULF FRIES. We thought him more happy this time in his treatment of the Allegretto Scherzando, than he was a few weeks since; but he reversed the order of the movements, taking the Adagio first, and in his few bars of random preluding between, which seemed of the fingers only and to have no connection with the musical intention, failing to bridge the way back from one into the other. With all the excellencies of this rapidly rising young pianist, it is but friendly justice to him to make him aware of this one little unartistic habit which he has of running his fingers unmeaningly over the instrument when he sits down to play something. It is not preluding: it does not express a mind full of the music and the meaning coming; it is just an idle or a nervous physical outbreak of the fingers; and often, we have noticed, even fails to modulate into the key in which the piece commences. Mr. Lang will not find such things done in Germany. It is such crudities which make it desirable for a young native musician, be he ever so facile and brilliant an executant, to pass some time in a musical atmosphere like Germany, and get imbued with the artistic tone. Our young friend, no doubt, feels this, and already means to profit by it.

The Fantasia by Gorla is one of the brilliant show pieces, in which Mr. Lang exhibited his virtuosity to good advantage. Thalberg's visit, leading us back to the fountain head of these things—a rather shallow spring at best—nearly exhausted their interest. On being enthusiastically encored, Mr. Lang played one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" with expression enough to command perfect attention.

We hear that Mr. Lang is also to receive a Complimentary Concert in his native place, Salem. With all these expressions of interest and good wishes, which we certainly share, he will go abroad with hope and high artistic purpose strengthened.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The eighth and closing Chamber Concert of the season, was in some respects one of the most interesting, although the programme might have been much better. Here it is.

1. Quintet, in A, op. 108.....Mozart
Moderato—Larghetto—Minuetto—Finale.—Tems con variazioni.
Clarinetto Principale.
2. "Souvenir de Haydn." Solo for Violin.....Leonard (Repeated by request.)
William Schultze.

3. Third Quartet, in F.....J. C. D. Parker
Allegro—Minuetto—Adagio—Finale—Vivace.
First time.

4. "Possenti Numi," High Priest's Air, from the Magio
Flute.....Mozart
Arranged by T. Ryan.

5. 12th Quartet, in E flat, op. 127.....Beethoven
Maestoso and Allegro—Adagio Molto cantabile—Scherzo—Finale, Allegro.
Second time in Boston.

The Mozart Quintet with Clarinet is always agreeable, although it has become somewhat of an old story. Mr. RYAN's clarinet warbled the variations with its usual glib and mellow volubility. The new Quartet of our townsman, Mr. PARKER, evinced substantial progress in the art of developing themes through the several forms which commonly make up the logical unity of this extended and most subtle, complex kind of composition. The Allegro was clear and graceful; the slow movement by no means dull nor feebly commonplace; the Minuet and Trio particularly happy, as fluent and spontaneous as one could wish. About the Finale we could not feel so clear. As a whole, the work was listened to with pleasure, and did credit to the writer.

Mr. SCHULTZE listened to a not very wise "request" in making his audience again listen to the senseless string of variations upon Haydn, by the Leipzig violinist Leonard. He was perhaps more successful in the rendering this time, and yet not always sure of pitch in the uppermost tone strata.

The arrangement of the "O Isis and Osiris" solo and chorus from the Zauberflöte, proved the sterling and enduring quality of that noble music. Sarastro's grand bass solo was taken by WULF FRIES, another 'cello filling out the quartet accompaniment.

The great Beethoven Quartet was better rendered on this second trial, and gained astonishingly upon the liking of the audience. Of course it needs four consummate artists to preserve clear and delicate, with just the right accent and phrasing, all those exquisitely fine divisions into which the motives melt and flow this way and that way in the four parts—subtlest divergence and variety returning ever into lovely, complete unity. This first experiment upon the famous and much dreaded "last Quartets" of the deaf, sublime old master (there are six of them) was truly encouraging, and we would fain take it as an earnest of many more attempt, to make acquaintance with them in another season.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—Here is the programme of last Wednesday Afternoon's concert, which drew an unusually large audience.

1. Symphony. No. 6. (First time in Boston).....Mozart
2. Walts Maiblumen.....Hessig
3. Overture. Die Hebriden.....Mendelssohn
4. Paullinen Polka.....Gungl
5. Potpourri, from Les Huguenots. (By request).....Meyerbeer
6. Ypanti Galop, (second time.)

The Symphony by Mozart was one in C, (not to be confounded with the "Jupiter")—a much smaller work than that, but yet delightful to listen to. We hope we shall have it again next week. It is full of the genial Mozart sunshine. The Hebriden or "Fingal's Cave" is Mendelssohn's best overture; full of poetry and cool sea-shore reverie. Why do we not hear it oftener? It evidently was not lost even upon a popular afternoon audience.

Musical Chit-Chat.

Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG's Complimentary Concert in the Bumstead Hall, this evening, gives excellent promise. Himself one of the most accomplished violinists and musicians we have ever had among us, Mr. E. cannot fail to give us a good concert. He will play a violin Concerto by Bach, with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club accompanying; the famous old Sonata of Tartini, called his "Dream," or "Il Trillo del Diavolo," with Mr. LEONHARD at the piano; and one of those quaint old curiosities, a dance called La Puvane;—also in some concerted pieces of his own composition, viz., three little trios for violin, viola and 'cello, and a Concertino for four solo violins, in which Messrs. SCHULTZE, MEISEL and COENEN will assist. The Orpheus Glee Club will sing a couple of their most taking part-songs; and Mrs. HARWOOD will sing a cavatina from La Juive and a Lied with 'cello obligato.

On Monday evening a new form of musico-dramatic entertainment invites us, in the "Parlor Operettas" of Mr. and Mrs. DRAYTON, which have found such favor in New York and other cities..... The call for chorus singers for the production of Mr. FRANZ KIELBLOCK's opera, "Miles Standish" has met with abundant response. The rehearsals go on vigorously under Carl Zerrahn, and the musical public will have a chance to hear and judge for themselves at the Music Hall next Saturday evening.... The Complimentary Concert for CARL ZERRAHN goes on swimmingly; the subscription is already large, and besides Mrs. HARWOOD, Miss WASHBURN and Miss FAY, the pianist, the Orpheus Glee Club volunteer their aid. The concert will take place Saturday evening, April 14.... There will be the usual Afternoon (orchestral) Concert on Wednesday afternoon.... Meanwhile, too, "Haymaking" is still continued; and the street corners and old walls are covered with the hideous old bonnets of the "Old Folks," black as well as white. The Ethiopians are not to be beaten in such dodges.

The Messrs. CHICKERING & SONS have moved into their new warerooms, in the elegant building just completed on the corner of Avon Place, Washington St. They have most spacious and artistic accommodations there; the place itself is worth a visit, as well as the unrivalled stock of fine pianos. One of their rooms has been constructed purely for a music room, suitable for choice chamber concerts, music parties, &c., and large enough for three or four hundred persons. It is a very beautiful and attractive hall.... The Orpheus Glee Club gave a second concert in Brookline this week, and are soon to give one, in compliance with earnest solicitations, at Jamaica Plain. Following the tuneful art in their own quiet, social, independent German way, this Club seems to have excited an appetite for the sound of their voices everywhere in the neighborhood.... There was a Band Concert in Providence this week, in which patriotism ran so high, that Mrs. LONG sang the "Star-spangled banner" in costume!.... The papers tell us that the prima donna FABBRI's name is fabricated; that she is not an Italian, but a German. She was born in Vienna, and her original name is Agnes Schmidt. Her wedded name—she was married to a German—is Molder. She ought to be called Agnes Molder.

Music Abroad.

PARIS, Feb. 29.—If some old Roman had been thrown into a lethargic state for a few centuries, like the sleeping beauty, and by the stroke of some magician's wand suddenly transported to Paris, were he to wake up in one or other of the principal lyrical theatres, his astonishment would not be as great as we might expect; for he would find himself surrounded with all the splendor of the pagan ages. At the Théâtre-Lyrique alone, he could one night descend with Orpheus into the dark regions of the lower world, and wander with him in search of his Eurydice; and the next night he could, in the same Théâtre-Lyrique, sup, in company with Philémon and Baucis, in their humble cot, with the great chief of the Olympian deities. The libretto of M. Charles Gounod's new opera is written by MM. Jules Barbier and Michel Carré. It is in three acts. Instead of a grand overture there is a simple introduction, worthi-er of a classical subject and in accord with the subdued tone of the first act, the more striking and brilliant efforts of the composer coming in the later parts of the opera. This introduction is a pastoral, in F, and on its last notes, the curtain rising, we find ourselves in the cottage of Philémon and Baucis, which, poor as it looks, is rendered a pleasant spot by the happiness of the good old couple. In a duet these happy beings celebrate their love, which has resisted time and poverty and age. While they are softly singing this, sounds of quite a different kind are heard in the distance. The other inhabitants of the village, who have lost all fear of the gods, are giving themselves up to their impious saturnalia. The effect of this ensemble is striking. Soon, however, the rising sounds of a tempest are heard, and while the storm is raging round the little cottage, two strangers knock at the door, asking shelter. Philémon, who is for the moment alone, receives them. These two strangers are Jupiter and Vulcain. There is here a very good trio, after which Vulcain sings a few stanzas with a very characteristic accompaniment to represent the strokes of a hammer on the anvil. The air sung by Jupiter which next follows, "Allons, Vulcain," is also good. Baucis makes her appearance, and, after a long speech, sings in a manner that proves she can sing as well as she talks. But as Vulcain says, "Supper, not singing, is now the object," and to supper they accordingly go, when Jupiter, by changing their humble fare into a more recherché repast, declares himself, and promises to reward Philémon and Baucis for their virtue and piety, but, wishing them to avoid seeing the vengeance he intends taking on the impious villagers, he throws them into a deep sleep, and a melange of horns, arpeggios on the harp, and the tremolo of the violins, is a pleasing termination to the first act.

The second represents the people of Sybarites reclining in gala attire, under the portico of the Temple of Cybele. Here the composer strives to assume all the passion and fire such a scene requires. The stanzas sung by Mlle. Sax (a bacchante), "C'est le vin," are not, however, worthy of the rest of the score. In the midst of the dances to which they are giving themselves up, Vulcain appears, and upbraids them. They wish to drive away this bird of ill-omen, when Jupiter appears, and, in a grand and dramatic finale, destroys this sacrilegious people. All this time Philémon and Baucis have been sleeping, and, in the third act, the curtain rising to the refrain of the pastoral in the first act, Baucis is discovered in all the splendor of youth and beauty, and in festive attire. Still in a trance, starting up, she seeks Philémon, to whom his youth and good looks have also been restored. Hardly knowing each other at first, the truth then breaks on them, but for a moment their felicity threatens to be troubled, for Jupiter, like Pygmalion, is very nearly falling in love with his own work. Baucis, however, rather than listen to any other voice than Philémon's, implores her gray hairs and wrinkled features may be restored to her. Jupiter, thereupon, like a gentlemanly deity, withdraws his suit, but leaves the happy pair in the enjoyment of their renewed youth. Battaille performed the part of Jupiter, M. Froment that of Philémon, and Madame Miolan-Carvalho that of Baucis, and M. Balanque, Vulcain.

The concerts are going on still. The one given by Kruger on the 10th of February, in the new salons of Erard, was one of the best. Cruger played the grand sonata (Op. 57) of Beethoven, and the duet in D major of Mendelssohn, with the violoncellist, Rigault. He also gave "La chanson du chasseur," "Guitare et marche nocturne." Kruger had just returned from Stuttgart, where he had gone to be present at a festival given in honor of his father, on the occasion of the latter's completing the fiftieth year of his membership of the Chapel-Royal. The violinist, M. Servais, has just arrived here (Paris); he proposes making some stay here. The third concert of the Société des Concerts gave the symphony in E flat of Félicien David, the benediction of the flags from the Siège de Corinthe, and fragments from the ballet of Prométhée, the Berceuse de Cherubini, the Symphony in D of Beethoven completed the programme. The Société de Jeunes Artistes, under the direction of M. Pas de Loup, pursues its course with success. At their third concert some fragments, never played before, of Meyerbeer's opera Struensee were given; the "Revolt des Gardes" and "Le bal et l'arrestation" were the titles of these pieces: the overture was also given, but it is well known here. The rest of the concert was equally well composed. To-morrow a concert that is looked forward to with the greatest interest will be given in the salon of the Louvre, M. and Mad. Sainton (late Miss Dolby) being the great attraction. Mad. Pleyel will perform on the 7th. M. Jacques Bauer also gives a concert to-morrow at the Salle Erard. A banquet was given the other day at the Cafe Vevour, at which many English and French writers assisted. M. Delaporte presided. He is the clever director of the concerts of the French Orpheonists. The object of the banquet was to publish the project that has been decided on, and which will be accomplished in the month of June. At that period 3,000 French Orpheonists will go to England to renew at the Crystal Palace the festival held by them in Paris in 1859. Twelve steamers will convoy these artists over. Every one seems to think the company of the Crystal Palace have behaved in the most liberal manner. 200,000 francs is the sum said to have been given to defray the expenses. The Orpheonists stay one week in England, and they will give three concerts. This enterprise has been welcomed in the warmest manner here, and will doubtless prove successful. These are some of the choruses that will be sung: "Le Septuor des Huguenots," "Le Cimbres et Teutons," "Le Psaume de Marcello," "Le Veni Creator," "La Re-traite, le Départ des Chasseurs," "Le Chant des Montagnards," and "Le Chœur des Prêtres des Mystères d'Isis."

March 7.—Never has Lent been so little kept in this gay city as at present. All goes on actively. New operas are in preparation; new dramas are brought out; and the various "Concerts d'Artistes" have to keep head against the "Concerts d'Amateurs." This latter amusement has extended itself even to the Tuilleries, where the Empress and a privileged few join in this innocent way of passing their time. While waiting the representation at the Grand-Opera of the Pierre de Medicis of Prince Poniatowski, the habitués of this theatre have just had a novelty, in the shape of M. Michot, a tenor, who used to sing at the Theatre-Lyrique. He debuted at the Grand-Opera in the Favorite, in the part of Fernand. He sang remarkably well, especially the airs, "Une ange, une femme inconnue," and "Anges si purs." He was most ably seconded by Madame Barbot in the rôle of Leonora. At the Opera-Comique, Le Roman d'Elvire, Galathée, and Don Gregorio, draw full houses; and the Theatre-Lyrique has no reason to repent of its adhesion to the mythology of the ancients, the receipts being anything but mythological. Roger, after performing in the Traviata the part of Alfredo (with Mme. Penco and Graziani as coadjutors) with unbounded success, has concluded his engagement at the Italian Opera; he has now left for Antwerp. Tamberlik will soon be here to fulfil his engagements at the Italian opera. Meanwhile, the rehearsals of Il Crociato of Meyerbeer are going on actively under the direction of M. Fontana. M. Merly will have a part in this opera.—Corr. Lond. Musical World.

LEIPZIG.—We take the following extract from a letter to the Taunton Democrat:

I hunted up an old friend, a Boston organist, who has come to this place to perfect himself in music, for Leipzig is the centre of the world of music as it is the centre of the world of books. The Conservatorium here is a kind of musical university, and every department of music is taught in it by distinguished masters. But Mr. T. gave me some particulars which are not very encouraging to musical men who think of coming abroad. He, let me premise, was one of the finest organists and pianists in New England, when he came to Leipzig, a year ago. He was at once put back to five-finger exercises, and so commenced at the very rudiments, not because he had a bad style, but because he had a different style from the Leipzig pianists. Of course this made him neither one thing nor another: his own style was fixed by habit, and the result was that he worked on through elementary exercises for nine months, playing worse and worse all the time, until at last he gave up the Conservatorium, took a private teacher, a very distinguished musician, and is now just beginning to feel that coming abroad will do him good. He thinks the Conservatorium is not the place for a man to enter, without he is a beginner; and that moreover, there the love of getting numbers of students is so great that very little time is given to each. Mr. T. told me that not more than seven or eight minutes could be given to each student at a lesson.

There are now little more than twelve American musical students at Leipzig, of various character and attainments, some very steady, hard-working fellows, some very idle, dissolute fellows. One man neglected his lessons to such an extent that he did not know the professor by sight, and on going to him to get his diploma signed, he mistook another gentleman for the professor, and for such palpable ignorance the diploma was refused. My friend Mr. T. will probably go to Berlin, as he says there are advantages greater than he can enjoy at Leipzig, particularly by one who wishes to receive private tuition. A musical student can live at Leipzig for fifteen dollars a month in very good style, and tuition is about fifty cents a lesson from first class men.

BOCHSA'S INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE HARP. A new and Improved Method of Instruction, in which the Principles of Fingering and the various means of attaining finished Execution on that instrument, are clearly explained and illustrated by numerous Examples and Exercises. Composed and Fingered by M. Charles Bochsa. 1,25

The plan of this method is entirely new, the author having brought the common harp and the harp with double movement into a comparative point of view, and united all their relations—constantly treating the latter as a sequel to the former, and clearly proving that whoever understands the one will in a short time be perfectly acquainted with the other. The general principles of fingering, unfortunately omitted in some instruction books or treated of in a light manner, are in this work completely developed and illustrated by numerous examples. The various means of attaining expression, are also minutely explained and exemplified.

Never had such an assemblage of distinguished men and beautiful women been gathered together in the Catholic Church of Dresden, as on the afternoon of that Sunday, when Cantor Bach had promised to play the organ. Countless cavaliers in glittering court dresses, brilliant ladies in all the splendor of satin and jewels, or decked with the lovelier ornament of youth and beauty, formed a waving, sparkling wreath, in whose centre the princely form of Augustus of Saxony sat enthroned. The carriage of the somewhat elderly prince was still erect, his head upraised; but his features, whose former beauty was still to be seen in the delicate lines of nose and mouth, and the clear contour of the chin, appeared lax and sunken, and the fire of his large eyes was extinguished. Augustus conversed with his favorite Brühl, who stood at his side with the elegant demeanor of a man of the world, listening to the words of his lord with apparent humility. Untamed pride lay on this bold forehead, insatiable avarice glittered in these restless eyes, immeasurable imperiousness sat enthroned on the finely cut lips.

"And so the droll Cantor would not visit the court last evening?" whispered the Elector laughing. "Now I will annoy him again to-day! As soon as the concert is over, I will desire to see him; he shall be taken to the ball and supper, and the prettiest of our court ladies shall ask him to dance." Brühl bowed silently. "We are all, however, very anxious for the arrival of the celebrated organist; expectation sits on every face," continued the prince. "Hasse throws up his black eyebrows impatiently, and the charming Faustina looks as restlessly round the church, as if she were watching for a rival. Only our virtuoso Marchand has not yet laid aside his mocking smile."—"But now, silence! look, Brühl! there are three new figures in the choir! Who are those two young men, with the open, ingenuous faces, who have just taken seats at the side?"—"Those are the eldest sons of the Cantor, your Majesty," answered Brühl. And then the full organ tones, outswelling, filled the church as with a holy incense, purifying all hearts from frivolous emotions. A deep silence reigned; every heart seemed penetrated with devotion, and all eyes looked up. A noble prelude flowed out in a golden stream of sound; on its shores bloomed the flowers of Paradise; it drew the longing soul, on its strong waves, through the noble and glorious choral:

"A sure stronghold is our God."

This powerful hymn of the evangelical church floated down from the choir. With what a happy smile Father Bach accompanied his playing! At this moment, he rejoiced to think that his beloved church could triumph, even in the Catholic house of God. A crowned conqueror, the fine melody rang through the lofty roof, strong as though countless angel voices joined in the lofty song of praise. And still the stream of harmony flowed on; father Bach's spirit rose higher; while ever the choral's giant voice floated above that rushing sea of sound: at every human breast it beat. The pillars of the church seemed shaken; the sorrowing voice of the entire human race seemed to cry from the deep for mercy; an entire world seemed lifting up its hands for grace. And then, alone, like a soft breath of pious incense, rose the melody again:

"A sure stronghold is our God."

And then a wondrous rush of tones gave answer to the prayer of believing love. At last the beseeching voices seemed to weary; softer grew the prayer; gentler the complaining. And then—oh, wonder! came the great forgiveness. The lofty roof disappeared, the blue and gold of heaven flowed in; the intoxicating breath of spring seemed to float through the church. Sweet, warm tones dropped through the air, and seemed the voice of boundless mercy, promising eternal forgiveness to all sinners. And then a pious delight trembled through those clear sounds, swelling, rising, strong as a million happy human voices, and amid them floated the joyful hallelujah of the angels, the glorious song of victory:

"A sure stronghold is our God!"

The organ was silent. Johann Sebastian Bach sat on the organ bench with folded hands; his face seemed almost transfigured. Pale with excitement, trembling with delight at the triumph of their honored father, his two sons stood near him. A dull murmur passed through the church. Then a side door of the choir opened, and the Elector appeared; behind him entered, at a respectable distance, a glittering crowd. Augustus of Saxony approached, almost timidly, the great man, who, half sunken in a pious reverie, scarcely observed his approach; he feared to disturb such a childlike, religious mood. At last he lightly laid his hand on Bach's shoulder. The Cantor stood up, and openly, laughingly, looked his prince in the face. The great master, full of the glory of God, to whose heaven he had ascended on the wings of music,—how could earthly power and worldly splendor move him in such a moment of holy enthusiasm? It seemed even difficult for him to find the words of earthly speech. "Gracious Prince," he said quietly, after a pause, "I can see that the voice of the dear God has touched your deepest heart! Is it not a strange happiness, and yet a wondrous awe? Is it not as if the sun shone upon you? Does it not seem as if you saw fairer, greater worlds than this grain of dust that bears us? Does not the glitter of earth crumble to nothing before the splendor above? Does not the voice of God give you spirit and life, to bear you there, whence it comes, into the eternal light?"—"Bach," answered the prince with an uncertain voice, approaching him nearer, "as I heard you play, I felt a presenti-ment of coming death! But the thought rose before my soul like a friendly genius; I lost all fear; I no longer trembled before the face of death, as when, in lonely moments, I pondered on the enigmatical close of all mortal life. Oh, Master, could I hear you in my dying hour!"

Bach did not answer; he looked at the prince with eyes that overflowed with emotion and tender joy. His pious heart rejoiced, at this moment, far more than his artistic pride. There was a rustle at the door; a woman broke hastily through the prince's suite, a woman in the fullest bloom of life, with a noble form and proud Juno-like head; it was Faustina Hasse, the favorite singer, the idolized darling of the entire residence. With wet eyes and glowing cheeks, with all the passion of an Italian, she fell on the neck of the Cantor, and, sobbing, kissed him on both cheeks. "God bless thee, thou beam of His own light!" she cried, in the greatest emotion. Bach did not know what to do; the bystanders smiled: Hasse stepped up, softly drew his wife away, mentioned her name, and pressed the hands of the great master with unfeigned respect. Even the mocking Frenchman, the elegant virtuoso Marchand stepped up; no sneering smile played round his lips; his eyes sparkled with the dew of inward emotion. He silently drew the master's hand to his breast. The prince's suite followed these examples; the charming court ladies were not behindhand; fair hands touched those of the Cantor; sweet lips thanked him. At last the master, shaking off the crowd, cried in a voice that echoed through the church: "Enough! such soft flattery should not be the reward of holy, serious organ-playing! move aside, ye alluring forms, I will not gaze longer on ye! Now I see well enough, that I am in wanton Dresden, and I would I were far from the flowers and the serpents, in my quiet, comfortable house with my wife and children! Gracious prince, said he," turning to the prince, who regarded the scene with a melancholy smile, "let me go! you see, old Sebastian Bach does not feel at home here! he cannot swim in these waters!"—"I will not let you go," answered the prince kindly, "until you have requested a favor from me!"—"You cannot grant me anything, my king! I am richer than you."—"But think of your sons!" proceeded Augustus.—"Well, gracious prince, if you can do anything for my Friedemann" said Bach, drawing the blushing youth forward, "I shall be glad of it; but not for two years to come; I need the boy still; he engraves well on copper, and now we are working at the Passions-Musik. My Philip," here he nodded towards his second son, "is already cared for by the dear God; it goes passably with him. I thank you with all my heart, gracious Elector!" The Elector parted with the honored master, after the kindest promises as regarded Friedemann's future, gave his hand to father and sons, and assured them all of his favor. The most distinguished cavaliers pressed forward to accompany the departing visitors, and assisted the plain Leipzig Cantor to his carriage with as much care and respect, as if he had been one of the loftiest rulers of the world.

As, on the next morning, Johann Sebastian Bach, with his two sons, rolled towards their beloved home; as they passed the princely palace, as the noble Elbe road revealed itself to their eyes, Philip Emanuel cried in an excited manner: "However, dear father, Dresden is beautiful! but the most beautiful of all is—Faustina Hasse!" "Silence, boy," answered the master, while a roguish smile touched the corners of his mouth, "you understand nothing at all about it!"

Süssmayr and Mozart's Requiem.

[Thus far from Jahn's account of the last days of Mozart. I pass over the burial—the funeral in a terrible storm, which accounts for the loss of his grave, he having been buried among the poor, which graves are dug over every ten years—and go on with the translation where the Requiem comes again in question.]

"One of her (Widow Mozart's) next cares was the Requiem. Mozart had left the Requiem uncompleted. She must expect that he who had ordered it would now not only refuse to accept it and pay the sum still promised, but demand a repayment of that already advanced. In this extremity the idea occurred to her and the friends with whom she took counsel, whether the Requiem could not be made complete out of what Mozart had left, with some additions, and thus the order be satisfied. The completion of the work was offered to several musicians; they declined the doubtful undertaking, some for want of time, others because "they could not compromise their talents by a comparison with the talents of Mozart"; very possibly other doubts influenced them. So came the matter into the hands of Süssmayr, who seemed especially fitted for the task; he was at the time Mozart's pupil in composition, had aided his master in Titus, had, while the Requiem was in progress, several times sung and played the finished numbers through, and Mozart had often talked over the working out of the score with him, and explained the movement and grounds of the instrumentation. 'As Mozart felt himself growing weaker,' wrote the widow to Abbe Stadler, (Nachtrag, p. 40,) 'Süssmayr must often sing over what was written, with him and me, and thus he received regular instruction from the composer. And I can hear Mozart now, how he used to say to Süssmayr—"Ei, there are the oxen again at the foot of the hill—that you don't understand by a great sight!"' This expression was one also of which her sister Sophia had a lively recollection. The meaning of it is perfectly clear in the light of Mozart's method of jotting down a composition and working it out, as we have it before our eyes." [Jahn gives here a reference to his third volume, where this is discussed.]

"The first two numbers, Requiem and Kyrie, Mozart had fully completed and written out in the full score—on these there was nothing to be done. Of the Dies irae, he had only, in his usual manner, sketched the score; the vocal parts were completely written out, with the bass occasionally figured; of the instrumentation, he had only sketched the themes in ritornels and interludes and in passages where instruments were to appear prominently in the accompaniment, as hints for the full scoring of the work, which was left to some future time. In this manner the score was laid out to the last verse of the Dies irae; with the words:

'Qua resurget ex favilla Judicandus homo reus,'

Mozart ceased.

"He had not composed the different numbers of the Requiem in order, but worked out his conception of single movements according to the mood he was in. For instance, before the completion of the Dies irae, he had composed the Offertorium, which, consisting of the two numbers, Domine Jesu Christe and Hostias, was completed and the full sketch of the score written out.

"It is now easy to conceive how Mozart, as he went through the score thus sketched with his pupil at the pianoforte or at the desk, could carry on with him an instructive conversation upon the instrumentation; how he would have him try his hand at it, and then give him minute explanations of the manner in which the work should be executed; and how he himself had thought it out, so that Süssmayr, in fact, in many respects could have formed a lively picture of the complete score, as it was to be, and be fully able in divers points to supply the want of the hand of his master. Of this the manner in which the composition was wrought is a proof. Of the other numbers—the Sanctus, the Benedictus and the Agnus dei—no such score had been sketched.

"Süssmayr's first work was to copy all that Mozart had in this manner sketched out, 'so that two styles of chirography should not be mixed up together,' as the widow wrote to André (Cecilia, vol. VI. p. 202), and then he added to his copy the needful instrumentation in such manner and form as seemed to him most perfectly to meet the ideas of Mozart. The original sketches of Mozart came into other hands; the sheets (11—32) containing the Dies irae down to the Confutatis, and nothing else, Abbe Stadler, at a later period, obtained from the now unknown original owner, and afterward gave them to the imperial Library in Vienna; the rest of the sheets (33—45) containing the Lacrimosa, Domine and Hostias, Kapellmeister Eybler bought and presented to the same library. That these were intended by Mozart to be fully scored and to be united into one work with the Requiem and Kyrie, is proved by the numbering of the leaves, which is in his hand and is in regular order; besides, there is no instance known in which he ever copied such a sketch of a score before filling it out.

"Süssmayr, according to his own distinct statement, had then written 'entirely new' the close of the Lacrimosa, the Sanctus, Benedictus and Agnus dei; only, 'to give the work more unity,' he repeated the fugue of the Kyrie to the words Cum sanctis.

"The Requiem thus completed was now delivered to him who had ordered it—the first two movements in Mozart's original, the rest in Süssmayr's hand, as Stadler relates, (Vertheidigung, p. 13.) That the whole should be accepted as the work of Mozart, it was necessary for the score, by its appearance, to be an evidence to that effect. How decidedly it was so is shown by this score itself, which in the year 1838 became the property of the imperial Library. The first impression was and is for every one who sees it and is acquainted with Mozart's hand, that the above was written out by him; hence in the first tumult of delight at the supposed discovery it was published to the world that Mozart's original score of the Requiem had been discovered. More thorough examination and reflection began to raise doubts; variations from his usual hand, although slight, were found, and to a request for information made to Mozart's widow [then Madame Nissen], she replied (Feb. 10, 1839): 'There could be no complete score from the hand of Mozart, for the Requiem was not finished by him, but by Süssmayr.' A comparison with several scores incontestably from Süssmayr's hand—a terzet and a bass aria which he had composed as additions to the Servia padrona in 1793—solved the riddle. Here was found precisely the same hand, the same striking similarity to that of Mozart, the same slight variations from it which in the Requiem had aroused suspicion—in short, no possibility of doubt was left that Süssmayr had written the score from the Dies irae;

moreover the leaves from this point are newly numbered, beginning with No. 1, and beginning again with No. 1 at the Sanctus. There is one passage too in which the transcriber has betrayed himself by a mistake. The last measures of the Tuba Mirum are noted by Mozart in his sketch for the string instruments, thus:

"In copying this passage Süssmayr overlooked the octaves in the violins and the characteristic movement of the viola at the close; what he wrote instead is no improvement on the part of the writer.

"Süssmayr had then, purposely or unconsciously, formed his hand so after that of Mozart, that, except in very slight variations, it was similar, to the point of being easily mistaken for it. This is no solitary case. The second wife of Sebastian Bach wrote so much like her husband that only an expert can distinguish them; and Joachim's hand—at least formerly—was strikingly like that of Mendelssohn. This time this habit or skill was but too opportune to give the manuscript for him who had ordered the work the appearance of an original. There is no doubt that Count Walsegg received and accepted the score as one composed and written out by Mozart—whether he was distinctly told so or whether it was left to him as a natural inference, is no question for us; that the Count's intention was to practise a deception of quite another kind, is curious enough—though it is no excuse for that put upon him."

The farther history of the Requiem need not be translated for the present purpose. This is sufficient to prove conclusively that Süssmayr did have a share, and no small one, in the production of this famous work, the London Musical World to the contrary notwithstanding. A. W. T.

W. V. Wallace's New Opera.

The second act ("Crystal dwelling of Lurline; doors of bronze") begins with a chorus of gnomes ("Behold, behold, wedges of gold," E minor), gloomy, savage, and monotonous, as befits the singers, and leading to an unpretendingly graceful ballad for Lurline ("Under a spreading coral wave"—G major), which Miss Pyne sings charmingly. In the absence of Rhineberg, the water-nymphs diapaire themselves in dance and song to a very lively chorus (B flat major) at the end of which a compliment to the River-King's sagacity is conveyed in the following language:—

"Though lock'd in your breast, he the secret can find,
'Neath one beam of his eye your poor heart must unfold,
And out floats the truth like the bee from the rose."

This chorus interrupts and mixes with the ballad of Lurline. The sparkling music of Mr. Wallace, however, here once more controverts the dogma of Herr Wagner. Rudolph's début as a vocalist under water is in a cavatina ("Sweet form that on my dreamy gaze"—B flat major), which, though it can boast an elegant melody, is even more strictly noticed for the ingenuity of the accompaniments. Lurline's brindisi

(with chorus), "Take this cup of sparkling wine" (E flat major), which obtains an encore every evening, thanks to Miss Louisa Pyne's brilliant singing, is, in its chief feature, a sort of reminiscence of the old English nursery tune, "Girls and boys come out to play." The concerted piece (E flat minor and G flat major), where Liba and her companions avert the watchfulness of Zeliack, intrusted with the guardianship of his master's treasures, is animated and clever. The introduction here of snatches of the foregoing air is felicitous; and the drinking song at the end (there are too many drinking songs and choruses), "As in this cup the bead flies up" (G minor and major), while in some passages too florid for Mr. Corri's method of vocalization, is eminently characteristic of the situation. Ghiva's ballad in the next scene ("Troubadour enchanting"—F major), almost primitive in its simplicity, is, nevertheless, extremely pretty and attractive. Miss Pilling (the new "contralto") sings it well, and, being invariably called for twice, it helps to lengthen the performance. A chorus of huntsmen ("Away to the chase"—E flat major) is one of the most vigorous pieces in the opera. The introductory symphony, with the unanticipated notes for various brass instruments, modifying the harmony of each section, is of itself remarkable, and the rest fully bears out the promise it entails. Rhineberg's ballad (B major), "The nectar cup may yield delight," (for which Mr. Santley's admirably expressive singing elicits an inevitable "encore"), is one of those model drawing-room ditties certain to gain the favor both of sentimental young gentlemen and sentimental young ladies, the especial delight of music publishers, and of which Mr. Balfe has invented the most admirable and popular specimens. The next piece, an "Ave Maria" (E major) supposed to be sung by Rudolph's friends in a boat on the Rhine, for the soul of their comrade, whom they imagine dead, while Rudolph, from his subaqueous and supernatural abode, actually overhears them, and responds to their appeal, is of a very different stamp. Nothing could be more beautiful of its kind, more ingeniously constructed and impressive. The finale to the second act (chiefly in E major) is superior to that of the first. The incident is the return of the Rhine King, who, at Lurline's intercession, spares the life of Rudolph, and sends him back to his mortal home, loaded with treasures, amid the mutual despair of the lovers, who, resigned to fate, are still loth to part. The music here is thoroughly dramatic, and most skillfully composed, the grand passage of combination (or "ensemble") consisting of a large and energetic melody, upon which (as in some of the operas of Donizetti and Verdi) is brought to bear the united power of chorus and orchestra, while the voice of the chief soprano (Lurline) predominates over the rest, in high, prolonged, and resonant tones, until the culminating point is attained (as by the same originals) in a broad phrase of unison, allotted to all the voices, choral and solo, and all the instruments except those of the lower register.

The third act (prefaced by a capital orchestral interlude, in which an episode belonging to the overture, in F sharp minor, is developed with much interest and skill), although quite equal in interest to the others, must be more briefly dismissed. Rudolph's song, "My home, my heart's first home!" (A major) is another improved drawing-room ballad, inferior, however, to the one in which the Rhine King gives gushing expression to the sentiment of paternal love, and at the same time still more nearly shaped on some of the specimens to which Mr. Balfe owes so many laurels. "Gold and wine heal every care" (E flat major) is another extremely effective chorus for male voices, comprising, moreover, one or two novel points—as, for instance, the pauses at the end. As in the drinking chorus (Act I.), and the hunting chorus (Act II.), the execution of this piece confers the highest credit on the singers. The duet which follows, for Rudolph and Ghiva (B flat major), is, in a great measure, like the duet between the baron and the same lady (Act I.), a display for the orchestra, in which the fiddles shine to their heart's (strings?) content, while the voices are too frequently subordinate. It is clever, nevertheless, and would have more pretensions to be styled "original," but for the provokingly Auberish phrase occurring at the end of the second movement ("Telling of fond eyes that weep.") The short chorus of "storm-spirits" (same key), that ensues upon Ghiva's casting into the Rhine the magic ring she has snatched from Rudolph's finger, may pass as a mere allusion. Lurline's grand scena (beginning and ending in F major), "Sad is my soul," which includes two beautiful slow movements, the second one (a prayer in A flat major, "Oh, Thou, to whom this heart") to the melody allotted the stringed instruments in the opening of the overture, and terminating with an extremely spirited allegro ("As a bounding barque,") is a very striking composition, in which the voice-part and orchestral accompaniments are alike interesting, while the dramatic feeling is sustained with unabated vigor to the end. This is one of the capital pieces of the opera, and in it Miss Louisa Pyne exhibits her finest singing, whether expression or fluent execution be taken into consideration. Scarcely less effective, while equally well written, is the duet (commencing and terminating in A major) where Lurline first reproaches Rudolph for losing her ring, and then restores it to him. Abounding in passionate phrases, although somewhat too lengthy, for the situation in which it occurs, this duet never once flags in interest. Both the foregoing would gain by being placed somewhat earlier in the opera. There still remain to be mentioned a lively chorus with ballet ("Now with joy each bosom beating"—D major), at the opening of the last scene, which might have fallen from Auber's pen without raising a doubt about its genuineness; and last (in some respects best of all), the unaccompanied quartet, for Lurline, Liba, Rhineberg, and Zeliack ("Though the world with transport bless me"—E flat major), which in every respect fully warrants the enthusiastic reception it meets with from the audience. A genuine English glece, with florid passages and cadenza for the principal voice (Lurline), this quartet is attractive enough to have saved a weak opera, and may be accepted as all the more remarkable, considering the effect it produces after so much that is excellent has gone before. In a word, it is a faultless example of vocal part writing, and everywhere as pleasing as it is ingenious. The finale to the third act is, according to precedent, the least ambitious of the three. The commencement (in D major), with the accompaniments in triplets for violins, again smacks of Auber. Lurline's exhortation to the Rhine to devote its waters to the destruction of the conspirators (which climbs, by an ordinary sequence of semitonic progressions, from A minor, through B flat minor, to B minor), and the storm-movement (in F sharp minor) that follows, where the first subject of the allegro in the overture is presented in the relative minor key, are undistinguished by any very salient characteristics; while the concluding vocal display for the prima donna is merely a repetition of Lurline's first air ("Flow on, oh silver Rhine," in the same key as in Act I.—E major*), embellished with ornaments and "bravura" traits to show off the neatness and brilliancy of Miss Louisa Pyne's vocalization. It brings down the curtain, however, with great animation, and is exactly fitted for the place it fills at the end of an opera, which, independently of its intrinsic merits, is the most successful dramatic work of a deservedly successful composer.

*We should have preferred the finale in D major, the key of the overture. "Pourquoi?" Mr. Wallace will ask, and we shall be at a loss to answer him. Nous ne savons pas; but we should have preferred it. Voilà tout.

Liszt's "Tasso."

The Century of last week, after noticing the more familiar compositions given at the last Philharmonic Concert in New York, has the following comments on the new feature in the programme.

Finally comes the Symphonic Overture by Elector Kapellmeister, Dr. Franz Liszt, which is by no means to be so readily assigned its place as the compositions of Beethoven, Von Weber, and music-master Hummel. The war of opinion still rages whenever the orchestral compositions of this wild son of genius are heard, or even his name mentioned. Whatever we may think or say of the merits of this work, we must at least thank the Society for giving it to us. The production of the compositions of Wagner and Liszt, show, that the directors are determined to keep pace with even the swiftest musical reformers of the age.

The climax of interest at the concert rested in this Symphony. Here was a new champion, a proclaimer of new truths, to be rehearsed after a new fashion—the head of a new school—the vanguard of the composers of "the music of the future."

The chief element of difference between Liszt and the older or classical masters, is in the theory held and acted on by the former that tone by itself is capable of conveying ideas, as ideas, and not as sentiments—that musical phrases may appeal to our intelligence, and that they are all-sufficient in themselves to convey their absolute meaning with very little or no aid from words. Therefore, while Mendelssohn, for example, will be content to give us a symphony which shall be a tone poem alone, and shall appeal to us only spiritually, and in a manner not capable of translation into words, any more than the scent of a flower can be so translated, Liszt says: "I will tell you a story by means of tones, and will so use the expressional instruments of my orchestra, that, if you are bright, you may follow me through to the end." So much for the idea upon which the work is based; as to material means, of course he differs as widely in the use of these from such as Mendelssohn as he does in theory. Every instrument is called upon to do its utmost towards the production of the grand effect to be obtained. Whatever individuality or expressional force any instrument possesses, is tortured from it. The story must be told at all hazards, so that he who runs may hear. In the instance before us, the subject upon which this experiment has been made, is the story of Torquato Tasso; and Liszt has attempted to give us a biographical sketch of the life of that distinguished poet. Unfortunately, owing doubtless to a lack of musical intelligence on the part of the world in general, it has been found necessary to accompany the performance of the piece with a printed explanation, pointing out the course of principal events. By this aid the musical intention becomes sufficiently clear, and we are left at leisure to study the means employed in the production and development of the story. Here we find ourselves on new ground. The ear is assailed from every quarter by the most uncouth tones; abrupt sequences of harmony startle and confound us; dissonances of the most complex character vex the ear; discords are hung suspended never to be resolved; the orchestra is a great sea of turbulence and unrest.

But out of this storm of discord come the violoncellos to our relief, with a charming little cantata, taken up again afterwards, and most felicitously, in a quicker tempo, and finally leading us into an heroic strain, strongly accentuated, and of much force and spirit. To the sway and pomp of this movement every instrument lends its strength, the kettle-drums being reinforced by their "big brother," the bass drum, and the trombones by their deep-throated friend the Ophicleide. Such a body of tone as is produced by a band of eighty performers so reinforced, is sufficient to carry everything before it—especially where the rhythm is strongly marked—the whole orchestral force bearing upon a single note in the bar, as in this case. At such times the audience feels the sway of the orchestra, and gives its applause freely enough, under the impression that a work that moves it so must certainly be very grand. Such is the ending of "Tasso—the lament and the triumph"—(lamento e trionfo.) We are forced to say that, however it may please, it is absolutely and radically a false work—false to the eternal laws of symmetry and beauty; and like all other untruths in art or in humanity, its relations with the beautiful are only specious, external, and momentary. A certain sensuous beauty it may have, just as a picture may have sensuous beauty of color, or a statue sensuous beauty of form; but they can only vitiate the taste that lends itself to their allurements, and must, if indulged in, mar all delicate perception of the calmly pure and serenely beautiful. It is the music of materialism.

The spirituality has gone out of it. The first offence is to take from music its own divine utterance, and to put in its place literalism, which is materialism; the second is to substitute violent color for simplicity of tone, abandoning the effects of melody for those of harmony, and leading the ear captive by splendid exaggerations. This is not the creative faculty which Beethoven had, (with what marvellous simplicity of means!) but the work of man's hands assured of death only, and not of immortality. It is easy to see how a musician of Liszt's power has been led into this error. In the first place, he was not born a creator of new things, but a splendid interpreter of the old. His transcriptions for the piano, of the compositions of others, are confessedly the best ever made; but it is as certainly impossible for a man to become a musical composer by dint of study, or by familiarity with the works of others, however extensive, as it is for one familiar with poetry to become a poet—the divine spark not having been born in him.

But Liszt was not content with the sphere of an interpreter. Having attained the highest living fame as a pianist, he wished to ascend still higher. He was a king at the piano: he did what he would with his audience; he commanded their smiles and their tears as he desired; he conveyed every mood and caprice of his mind to his instrument—swept its keys like a whirlwind, and held his auditors breathless with astonishment at the splendid audacity of his performance. Nothing appeared impossible—everything easy to his marvellous and mysterious power; and the instrument seemed subdued to his hand like a living creature. What wonder that he wearied of his absolute reign, and aspired to more daring conquests? What easier than to suppose that a great orchestra might vibrate to the wild promptings of his will as easily as the passive piano had done? How much grander a field—what exhaustless resources lay within his grasp? What undreamed of mysteries of tone might not be slumbering in the vast and untried depths of that gigantic instrument, if only a man bold enough dare wave the wand and evoke them? Why might not that splendid technique that had worked like a spell of wonder on all hearers, be transferred to a grander arena, and so the author live long after his hand had lost its power, the founder of a new school—the great master who called forth the “music of the future?” Here were the means for the display of the wildest flights of genius—the great orchestra would climb up to heights to which the piano had no parallel, or sink to depths of which its heaviest chords were but a faint suggestion! The prospect was tempting, and the ambition of the man obtained the better of his discretion. We have here one of the results—“Tasso: a tone-poem.” The spirits of the orchestral deep have been evoked, and with a direful confusion of tone they have overwhelmed their would-be master in a surging chaos of sound.

A Letter of Mendelssohn.

[Written at the age of 15 years to Frederik Voigt, author of the book to the opera, The Wedding of Camacho, translated and communicated to the London Musical World by his fellow-student and friend, Dr. Ferdinand Rahles.]

HONORED SIR,—Excuse me that my thanks for the excellent first act comes so late, as I would not express my gratitude before having acquainted myself thoroughly with its beauties; and having now done so, I find my thanks too feeble for such a masterpiece.

I shall endeavor to imitate your poetry; but feel afraid that I may not be able to express through my music those elevated impressions which it must produce on every one at the first reading, but hope with my ardent desire to try to do the utmost in my power. The first act is so beautiful and charming, that I anxiously wish to be in possession of the second as soon as possible, and beg of you to realize this favor at your earliest convenience.

You will kindly allow me to state the following remarks:

With regard to the verses and the diction of those parts, which are to be set to music, I have very seldom, I may say never, met before with such excellent ones, which in the first perusal have had the power of producing musical ideas in me. They are so smooth, so fitted to the adaptation of music, not too long, and contain all the qualities of a superior opera text.

As the numbers of pieces to be composed are too many, I make use of the liberty you kindly granted me in omitting the following ones, viz.—the arietta of Vivaldo, “My sword, my lyre;” the aria of Lucinda, “How inconvenient is a fortune;” and the immediate following air of Carrasco, “What a running;” because there would be seven music-pieces without an interspersed dialogue, by which the audience would be tired. The choruses of the cousins, in contrast to those which enter with Carrasco, please me exceedingly, and the short advice you give me, shows how I must set them to music.

I also must ask the favor not to divide the opera into three acts, but compress the whole in two, as agreed upon. Lately I saw Hamlet, in which a priest comes upon the stage and speaks, so I think we have got over the difficulties we thought we might encounter in bringing the clerical garb upon the scene. Let priest remain priest; but he must not be allowed to sing upon the stage: and the opera an opera in two acts. Amen!

What a fine fellow is Vivaldo, and an excellent part for a tenor singer, and as you will do away with Basilio's going through the air, I do not see any difficulty more in having a good singer for this part also. St. Peter may say, “Let every man have what belongs to him,” and so says the basso Sancho upon his gray mare.

The only favor I have again to ask you is, to let me have the second act, for which I am longing and very anxious; therefore be so good as to send it as soon as possible. I shall not feel happy before then. With my best thanks.

I remain, your obedient servant,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

P.S.—I wish so much to be in possession of the second act that I cannot commence to compose before I have reviewed the whole of it.

FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLODY.

Spohr's Letters from Paris.

(From Alexander Mallbrant's Louis Spohr. Sein Leben und Wirken. Frankfurt am Main. J. D. Sauerland's Verlag, 1880.)

I.

Paris, 18th December, 1820.

—With beating heart I drove through the barriers of Paris; the thought that I should now have the pleasure of becoming personally acquainted with the artists whose works had inspired me in my very earliest years, excited this lively sensation. I transported myself back in thought to the time of my boyhood, when Cherubini was my idol; for I had, through the French theatre, which then existed at Brunswick, an opportunity of knowing his works sooner even than those of Mozart. I recollected vividly the evenings when Les Deux Journées was given for the first time; how, quite intoxicated with the powerful impression the work had made upon me, I got the score the same evening, sitting up over it the whole night, and how it was principally this opera which gave me the first impulse to composition. I was now about to see its author, and many other men whose works had exerted the most decisive influence on my education as a composer and a violinist.

We were, therefore, scarcely housed, before I made it my first business to call upon several of these artists. I was received in a friendly manner by all, and a friendly intercourse speedily sprang up between myself and several of them. I had been told of Cherubini that, at first, he was reserved, nay, gloomy with strangers; I did not find him so. He received me, without my having brought any letters of introduction, in the most friendly way, and invited me to repeat my visit as frequently as I chose.

On the evening of our arrival, Kreutzer took us to the Grand-Opéra, where a ballet, Le Carnaval de Venise, with pleasing, characteristic music by himself, was represented. It is evident that the singers and dancers are accustomed to move about in a larger building; they exaggerate too glaringly for their present locality, which is very limited in comparison with the opera-house they have left. Several grand operas, especially those of Gluck, cannot now be given, since it has not been possible to obtain the necessary space even for the whole orchestra. People are, consequently, looking forward with the greatest eagerness to the completion of the new opera-house, which, however, no matter how actively the works are carried on, cannot be ready before the middle of next summer. Previously to the ballet, the opera, Le Devin du Village, words and music by Rousseau, was given. Ought we to praise or blame the fact that the French, side by side with the admirable things with which their operatic repertory has been enriched in the last twenty years, still give the very oldest productions imaginable; and is it a sign of an advanced and cultivated taste for art, that we see them welcome the oldest operas by Grétry, in all their harmonic poverty and incorrectness, with just the same enthusiasm or even still greater than the master-pieces of Cherubini and Méhul? It does not strike me so. What a time has elapsed since the operas of Hiller, Dittersdorf, and others of that period disappeared from our repertories, although these, in inward musical value, are far, far preferable to most of Grétry's. It is true that, on the other hand, it is very dispiriting that only what is new, however insipid and incorrect, finds currency among ourselves, many admirable older compositions being cast aside and forgotten in consequence. It is, however, to be considered a great point in favor of the Germans' taste for art, that Mozart's operas alone form an exception, and that, for more than thirty years, they have been given uninterruptedly at all German theatres; because it furnishes a proof that the German nation is at last penetrated with the perfection of those unsurpassable master-pieces, and, being convinced of this, will not be led astray, however far the sweet musical poison, that flows so copiously from the other side the Alps, should extend.

The orchestra of the Grand-Opéra contains, in comparison with other orchestras, the most celebrated and distinguished artists, but is said to be inferior in ensemble to that of the Italian Opera. I cannot yet give an opinion, as I have, at present, heard no other. In Herr Kreutzer's ballet, played with great precision by the orchestra, I was delighted with an oboe solo, performed in a masterly manner by Herr Vogt. This gentleman has succeeded in imparting to his instrument a perfect equality of tone and intonation throughout the whole compass, from C of the small octave, to F upon the fifth line of the staff, which is something in which nearly all oboists fail. His style is, moreover, full of grace and good taste.

A few days since, I was less pleased at the Grand-Opéra than on the first occasion. The opera was Les Mystères d'Isis. The complaints of Mozart's admirers are only too just of the transformation of the magnificent Zauberflöte into this piece of patchwork, which, on its production, was christened by the French themselves Les Mystères d'ici. We must feel ashamed that it was Germans who committed this sin against the immortal master. Nothing has remained untouched, except the overture; everything else is jumbled together, changed and mutilated. The opera commences with the concluding chorus of Die Zauberflöte; next follows the march from Titus; and then, first one fragment and then another from other operas of Mozart, and even a bit from a symphony by Haydn. Between all these, there is recitative, of Herr Lachnith's own manufacture. But worse than all is the fact that the adapters have put a serious text to many light, nay, comic parts of Die Zauberflöte, so that the music becomes simply a parody on the words and the situations. Thus, for instance, the Papagena here sings the characteristic air of the Moor: “Alles fühlt der Liebe Freuden,” while the charming trio of the three boys: “Seid uns zum zweiten Mal willkommen,” is given by the three ladies. Out of the duet, “Bei Männern welche Liebe fühlen,” they have made a trio, etc. But, worst of all, they have taken the liberty of making changes in the score, thus, for instance, in the air, “In diesen heiligen Hallen,” at the words, “So wandelt er an Freundes Hand,” they have altogether omitted the imitative bass:

which is here indispensable, not only on account of the harmony, but also, referring to the “wandering,” is so characteristic; instead of this, the basses only give now and then the B natural. How flat and bald this passage, so often admired in Germany, thus sounds, you may easily imagine. Furthermore, the adapters have introduced violoncellos and double-basses into the music of the three ladies, where, in Mozart, the third vocal part is only strengthened and supported by the violins, so that the bass lies on three different octaves to these tender passages, treated only in three parts, which is insupportable to a cultivated ear. There are more offences of the same kind. We must do the French the justice to say that, from the very beginning, they decidedly disapproved of this Vandal-like mutilation of a great masterpiece (a mutilation, which, as they are unacquainted with the original, is not known to them in its full extent); but how comes it that, despite of this, the Mystères has remained for eighteen or twenty years quietly in their repertory, when the public here, as I see every day, reigns so despotically in the theatre, and can do whatever it likes?

The performance could not satisfy a German, as I am. Even the overture did not go as well as it should have done, when executed by so magnificent a body of distinguished artists. It was taken too quickly, and, towards the end, hurried on still more, so that, at last, the fiddlers could only play semi-quavers instead of quavers. The singers of the Grand Opéra, whose great merit may lie, perhaps, in declamatory singing, are but little fitted to render satisfactorily the tender strains of Die Zauberflöte. They sing with a sturdiness which destroys anything like tenderness. The mise-en-scène, as regards scenery, costumes, and dancing, is respectable, but not so splendid as I had expected. Yesterday we went to the Grand Opéra, for the third time, and saw Clari, a grand ballet in three acts, music by Kreutzer. Little as I like ballets, and little as pantomimic productions strike me as worth the outlay of artistic resources here lavished on them, I cannot deny that the Parisian ballets entertain a person very agreeably, until he is tired by the monotony of mimic movements, and still more by that of the dances. But, even when given as perfectly as it is here, pantomime, on account of the poverty of its signs, which always require a printed explanation, strikes me as being, when compared to declamatory dramatic productions, like a shadowy outline compared to a drawing. However it may be decked out by a golden background and ornamental accessories (as the ballet here is by the magnificence of the scenery and costumes), it merely presents us with outlines, and life is wanting. In the same way I feel inclined to account the drama, when compared to opera, as a drawing compared to a painting. It is through song that the poem first obtains color, and the song only is able, when supported by the power of harmony, to express those indescribable emotions of the soul, of which we have simply presentiments, and at which language must content itself with merely hinting. The music of Clari is very successful, and, especially in the second and third act, overpoweringly effective. It very much facilitates, by correct painting of the passions, the task of understanding the story, and contains a treasure of pleasing melodies, which we regret not to see belonging to an opera. Mlle. Bigottini played the principal part, and gave proofs of having deeply studied action and gesture. That, in very passionate situations, she worked up the expression of her countenance to grimaces, may, perhaps, be justly attributed to the fact that, until now, she has always appeared in a large building, where, on account of the distance, great exaggeration was necessary. Perhaps, this only seems to me so, from my being a German, for the applause was never more tumultuous than when (so far as my feelings were concerned) she overstepped the limits of the Beautiful and the Graceful.

Before the ballet, they gave Le Rossignol, an opera in one act, on which is founded Weigl's German opera, Nachtingall und Rabe. The music of the French piece is insignificant, and only interested me by Herr Toulou's masterly rendering of a solo for the flute. It is impossible to hear a more beautiful tone than that which Herr Toulou obtains from his instrument. Since I heard him, it no longer strikes me as so unsuitable as it did for our poets to compare the harmony of a sweet voice to the tone of the flute.

Death of M. Jullien.

JULLIEN, the famous man of "monster concerts," died in Paris, in a lunatic asylum, on the 16th ult. The Tribune says: "The closing scene of his life was melancholy. While on the eve of carrying into execution plans for an orchestral campaign, more extensive and magnificent than even his previous exploits—embracing a tour throughout the whole civilized world, accompanied by an army of orchestral performers, vocalists, and men-of-all-work—just as he was collecting his forces at Paris for this purpose, he became harassed with pecuniary troubles to such an extent that first his health and then his reason gave way. In this condition he was conveyed to an Insane Hospital, where he died on the 16th day of March. Jullien was in his 48th year, having been born at Sisteron, an Alpine town, on the 23d of April, 1812. His father was bandmaster of a Swiss Regiment, and from him the boy learned the rudiments of the art in which he was to become renowned. Having lost a voice which was singularly beautiful and strong in childhood, he turned his attention more exclusively to orchestration; first learned the use of the violin, and successively studied the practice and capabilities of every orchestral instrument. When a young man he led a military life, conducting a regimental band, and being present at various battles, at one of which he was severely wounded in the shoulder. Finally, he went to Paris, where, receiving instruction from such masters as Cherubini and Rossini, his peculiar orchestral powers rapidly became developed, and he soon found himself before the public as director of the concerts of the Champs Elysées and the Royal Academy balls. The jealousy of rivals at his instantaneous popularity finally became powerful enough to drive him away from Paris, and he took refuge across the British Channel. Then at London, during twenty years, ensued a series of those grand popular triumphs which only Jullien could achieve, and with which our readers are familiar from their recollections of his late American campaign. It was in 1853-4 that he made the grand tour of the United States, accompanied by a monster orchestra, drawing great audiences, and admirably adapting our national melodies to the purposes of a multitudinous band. There was a marked scorn of conventionalism in his management. If he wished to produce a certain effect, and could only do so by the introduction of gun-shots and boatswain's whistles, the shots and whistles were fearlessly introduced. If his music was not classic, it had at least a certain largeness of combination, and was marvellously effective, as rendered by his own orchestra, under his own guidance. There is something inseparable between our recollections of the man and of a superb waistcoat and the whitest of perfumed gloves; but, for all the manner that seemed affectation and the elation so plainly visible after his conquest of applause, there was a real greatness in the power by which he brought a thousand performers into harmonious action, and carried the listener along, from the delicious fineness of a single violin note, through wave after wave of sound, to the grand clash and clang of the innumerable stringed and wind instruments, bells, and cymbals, and drums, that worked together to overwhelm us with the tempest of their sound."

Musical Correspondence.

William Sear, Wm. Doehler and Ch. Brannes.

It is greatly to the credit of several of our resident pianists, that they have thus undertaken to make music, of the kind in question, more popular with our public than it has been. I fear, however, that their chances of success are very small, when their first concert called forth, in one of our best papers, the Evening Post, a notice like the following, in which I give you, at the same time, a specimen of New York criticism.

The First Soirée of the "Chamber Concert Union" attracted a good audience last evening at Goldbeck's Music Hall, and the programme was adhered to with the exception of the piece of the evening, namely, Schumann's sonata for piano and violin, which Mr. Mollenhauer could not remain long enough to play. We regard the Beethoven trio in E flat as one of the least interesting of all he has written. It was tedious, and the names of the movements were omitted on the programme, a grave error where classical music is performed. Mr. Mills showed that, however excellent as a solo pianist, his playing in concerted music (at least of this character) does not do him as much credit. He played too loudly, and the trip-hammer style of which he is master marred the effect of many passages. Mr. Sear was warmly applauded. Millard was the vocalist of the evening. The programme of the entertainment was, on the whole, rather dry. To please any other than an entirely Teutonic audience, the projectors of this series of "chamber concerts" should not confine themselves too exclusively to composers whose merit every one is willing to acknowledge, but to whose music very few will consent to listen.

Allow me upon this to give my opinion, that the trio, though not equal to some others of the master, is still very beautiful, and that it was rendered by Mr. Mills in a masterly manner. To me, this was the piece of the evening, although I regretted the omission of Schumann's Sonata, for which many excuses were made by Mr. Goldbeck. Mr. Sear has improved greatly in his performance; he plays with more force and greater nicety. A little more poetry infused into his rendering of the music he gives us, however, would do no harm. Mr. MILLARD has a fine voice, though no great compass. His enunciation is execrable. He was half through the "Adelaide," before one could distinguish in what language he was singing it. His whole rendering of this gem, indeed, was exceedingly unsatisfactory, too hurried, and too milk-watery. His pronunciation of the refrain "Adelaide," with the third and fourth syllables drawn into one, like i in mine, was simply ridiculous. Mr. Mills was encored after his last piece, and gave an arrangement of "Hail Columbia," with which he had the good taste not to unite "Yankee Doodle."

The trio by Schumann in the second concert is not one of his clearest, and must be heard more than once to be appreciated. So too the variations. Both were well played, i. e., the first as far as the piano was concerned. Mr. DOEHLER has a clear tone, but not enough force nor spirit to appear to advantage in concerted music. This appeared, too, in the charming Rondo of Schubert, where the piano, rather too loudly played, sometimes almost drowned the violin. The trio by Schubert, quite short, and only in one movement, is charming, and was done justice too in all parts. In Chopin's beautiful scherzo Mr. GOLDBECK appeared to the greatest advantage; he played it admirably, and won the heartiest applause. The "Union" seemed doomed to disappointments, for on this occasion Dr. GUILMETTE had been taken ill, and could not appear. Mr. MILlard kindly took his place, and sang an Italian aria, and a pretty little French song, "Deux à deux" from Halévy's L'Eclair. The third concert is announced for next Tuesday.

In compensation for the musical dearth of the past winter, we are being overwhelmed with concerts now. Most persons, however, would probably prefer a musical entertainment every week or two during the winter, to one every few days for five or six weeks. Following close upon the first Chamber Concert, was the Philharmonic, last Saturday. The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's lovely Second Symphony, a Poème Symphonique, by Liszt, and the ever fresh and beautiful Freyeschütz overture.

Of the first and last nothing need be said, except that they were very well played. Than Liszt's composition nothing could be more incoherent and out of. The fourth hearing of it brought me no nearer the solution of its mysteries than the first. The analysts, too, given on the programme, only

"Made the case darker
Which was dark enough without."

Mme. GRANT-JOHNSON played Hummel's A minor concerto with great precision, force, and spirit. It is a much admired piece, and has many great beauties, but also many tedious passages, and I sigh to think how much Hummel has to answer for, by being the originator of the deluge of modern brilliant "Salon-music" which, in the mere mechanical imitation of one branch of his style, without his genius, has become insufferable. Mme. Johnson also played a couple of insignificant pieces by Litolff, and in answer to an encore, Taubert's graceful little Campanella. Signor CENTEMERI, an Italian, with a remarkably fine baritone voice, and good school, was the vocalist of the evening, and sang a couple of arias, by Verdi and Donizetti, which were not quite worthy of a place in a Philharmonic programme.

For to-morrow night Mr. SATTER announces a concert, and next week holds out the prospects of several like entertainments. So you will hear from me oftener for a while than you have lately had occasion to. One thing more: the Philharmonic Society announce the Ninth Symphony for their last concert, with the assistance of the Liederkrans. Think of our having the whole of the Choral Symphony, with a good chorus, twice in one winter! You had better appoint a delegation to come on and hear it for the Bostonians.

NEWPORT, R. I., MARCH 20.—I wish I could say that the churches in this city, of which there are twelve or fourteen, were all blessed with good music. Some of them, however, are favored in this respect. The Catholic church, of which devotion to art, is characteristic has a very accomplished organist (Mr. PAYNE), and some admirable voices in the choir. Trinity Church (Episcopalian) has a choir of boys, under the direction of Mr. TOURJEE. This, I believe, is altogether a new feature in the church music of our city. It was introduced by Mr. Tourjee, who, possessing great energy and enthusiasm in his profession, has made it quite attractive.

The Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. T. W. WOOD, have given us two concerts this winter, and will soon favor us with a third. The Society had crowded houses each time; their performances exhibited very thorough drill and preparation; and their selection of music was of a very elevated character. Mr. Wood, indeed, possessing thorough culture himself, has inspired the Society with great zeal, so that they do not shrink from the most classic music; and, we are happy to say, that, in the execution even of the most difficult pieces, they exhibit great skill and correctness. In this respect we think the Society deserves great credit; for, while the popular ear does not demand the best style of music, they have steadfastly brought forward the most elevated pieces. In this manner, we think the musical taste of our community has perceptibly improved. It may be mentioned that among the pieces at their last concert were, "Now the Philistines," "Hallelujah Chorus," Benedict's chorus, "Joy, freedom to-day." A duo for violins, by Mr. Wood and his brother, exhibited exquisite time and admirable expression.

There is an Antiquarian Musical Society in this city, the object of which is to revive some of the good tunes of lang syne. Singing, as yet, is not taught in our public schools.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 7, 1860.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—By some unaccountable mistake, our last number contained four more pages of the "May Queen" Cantata, instead of the introductory pages of the piano-forte arrangement of WEBER's Freyshütz, which had been prepared, and were announced accordingly. We give them now, and shall continue the opera at intervals until it is completed.

Mr. Eichberg's Concert.

We do not often find a musical entertainment so fresh and enjoyable throughout, as was the Complimentary Concert given in the Bumstead Hall, last Saturday evening, for JULIUS EICHBERG. The programme was choice, classical, happily varied and of just the right length. Indeed the evening, pleasant as it was, seemed short.

1. First Concerto, for Violin, in A minor, (1st time in America).....S. Bach
Mr. Eichberg and the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.
2. Cavatina from the opera "La Juive".....Halevy
Mrs. Harwood.
3. Tartini's Dream, a celebrated Sonata, composed in 1690
.....Tartini
Mr. Eichberg.
4. Turkish Drinking Song, (by request,).....Mendelssohn
Orpheus Glee Club.
5. { a. Allegretto, } for Violin, Viola and Violoncello,
   { b. Fairy Legend, } from op. 28.....J. Eichberg
   { c. Sérénade Genoise, }
      Messrs. Eichberg, Meisel, Coenen and W. Fries.
6. Lied, (with Violoncello obbligato, by Mr. W. Fries....Möring
      Mrs. Harwood.
7. La Pavane, (Con Sordino,) Ancient Dance.
      Mr. Eichberg.
8. a. Slumber Song.....O. M. von Weber
   b. Beware.....Ginschner
      Orpheus Glee Club.
9. Concertino for four solo violins.....Eichberg Messrs. Schultze, Meisel, Coenen and Eichberg.

We have more than once spoken of Mr. Eichberg as the most masterly and artistic violinist whom we have among us. It does not seem quite right that such a classical, high-toned musician should have to earn his bread by the drudgery of preparing and presiding over the cheap, humdrum music of the Museum theatre. Yet it is proof of strength and manliness that he submits to it cheerfully, doing his best within the scope allowed to raise that music, while he is still faithful to his own higher artist aspirations. We could not see, by his performances on Saturday, that any virtue had gone out of him; he played with as much artistic style and earnestness as ever, and gave us satisfactory renderings of noble old works, as well as some interesting specimens of his own original production.

A large, firm, evenly sustained, noble execution is but the natural result of such familiarity as Mr. Eichberg has cultivated with the violin-works of Bach and old Italian masters. The Bach Concerto was strong, hearty, honest music; quite as remarkable for hearty, genial, strong humanity, as for the masterly contrapuntal skill with which its unity in variety is preserved. It was finely played, and put one in a sound and wholesome appetite for what should follow. The "Dream," or Teufels-Sonata, of the old maestro Tartini is a famous work, for our only hearings of which here in Boston we have been indebted to Mr. Eichberg, nor could we wish a better interpreter. There is soul and genial fancy in the composition. The devil's part in it, the peculiar freak of virtuosity which gives the sonata its Italian name, Il trillo del diavolo, seems an anticipation of the modern showy virtuoso style. This might be called tracing a thing to its first source.

The old dance, called Pavane, is a quaint, hurdy-gurdy-ish sort of a thing, with quite a captivating melody, and was nicely rendered. Of Mr. Eichberg's Concertino for four solo violins, without speaking critically, we may say that it proved an ingenious, pleasing and effective piece. There was more richness than we could have supposed in the combination of four such equals, as if it were four prime donne without tenore or basso, and the alternating, commingling streams flowed smoothly and melodiously on. Mr. LEONHARD accompanied at the piano. Mr. E.'s smaller pieces we were obliged to lose, but understand that they gave pleasure.

The part-songs contributed by the Orpheus Club were three of their most captivating. The cunning little Hüte dich! (Beware!) still keeps its freshness; it was too good and too short to escape repetition, as it did. The voices sounded better in the hall than they did a few weeks since; this was quite perceptible in the sustained Pianissimo of Weber's exquisite little Slumber Song, a piece, with all its simplicity, most difficult to render as the Orpheus did it. Mrs. HARWOOD's voice, in her first piece, was overloud for such a hall; yet much was finely executed, and the voice in its middle and lower range is exceedingly rich and beautiful. In the Lied, accompanied so feelingly by WULF FRIES, she was very happy, not exerting her organ so painfully. Indeed it was a charming piece of singing. Why do we so seldom hear this lady?

Drayton's Parlor Operas.

We attended the second of these novel and agreeable entertainments, in the New Melodeon, (a very pleasant, clean and airy hall, by the way, with comfortable seats), on Tuesday evening. The audience was not, in numbers, what we had expected or what the entertainment merited. For really it was a very genial, tasteful, easy, natural union of acting and singing, in a very simple, unexceptionable form—but all so cleverly done, so artistically, with so much of a certain French ease and liveliness, as to make it a refreshing rarity in these parts. There is no vulgar clap-trap, nothing coarse or violent about it; it is the genteel comedy of music. A nice little orchestra, about a dozen instruments, play you an overture—new in name, not new in sound, but well enough; the handsome curtain parts to either side, revealing a genteel little parlor scene, and the dramatis personæ, only two in number, Mr. and Mrs. HENRI DRAYTON, proceed to interest you, now by talking, now by singing, in the unfolding of a sentimental comic little drama, the first part of which is called "Love is blind," the second, "Never too late to mend," the lady passing herself off as two characters. They are both very clever actors, and the humor of the thing grows irresistible towards the end.

Mr. DRAYTON, a fine, manly looking person, full of vivacity, has an uncommonly rich and marrowy bass voice, and is equally good in tossing off a strong and hearty old English song, in expressive sentimental cantabile (where he modulates his voice with great delicacy, sustaining and diminishing a note finely), and in voluble parlando. Mrs. DRAYTON is a pleasing actress, with a plenty of pretty espieglerie. Her voice is very sweet and musical, finely drawn out in high and liquid passages, but with a certain filmy veil over it (possibly the effect of a cold that evening); some low tones surprised by their richness. Her execution is smooth and graceful.

The music itself consists of shreds and straws gathered from all quarters and ingeniously woven into the little bird's nest of an opera; the plot being so managed as to afford plenty of opportunities for "introducing a song." Altogether there is a refined and parlor air about the whole thing, which may not make it popular with a Negro Minstrel public, but must surely win its way with those who like a quiet, genial, home-like sort of evening amusement. The Draytons, in their very limited experiment, do much; while they suggest how much more might be done, with say four instead of two such clever artists; chorus might also be added. Private parlors may well take a hint from them.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

We have already mentioned the concert tour which these five long-united and accomplished musicians are about to make to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, &c. We earnestly commend them to those who have a love for chamber music in those cities. For eleven years these gentlemen have furnished us in Boston with our regular supplies of classical Quartet, Quintet and Trio music. They have made us acquainted with most of the important works in these forms by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, with not a few specimens of Schubert, Schumann, Gade, Cherubini and many others. We do not call them perfect interpreters; for a perfect Quartet is the rarest thing in the world of music, even in Germany or England. But they have given us many a memorable feast, and have done a vast deal in awakening and cherishing a love for such music both in Boston and the whole country round. In all the musical places of New England they are known and valued.

Of course they will unlock some of their pure classical stores wherever they go. But they are equally furnished and expert in music of a lighter and more miscellaneous character, arrangements from operas, solos, variations, &c. Each of the five is a skilful solo-player, and that skill not confined to the stringed instruments; one can turn his hand to a flute, another to a clarinet upon occasion, and thus they make out a nice little quasi-orchestral accompaniment to the voice, in airs and scenes out of Mozart's operas, and other vocal pieces. This time they take with them one of our best native singers, Mrs. J. H. LONG, who will add greatly to the interest of their concerts. We look for good accounts of their reception in the cities where they shall make known their quality.

Musical Chit-Chat.

To-night, it is presumed, we all "assist" at the first taste of a new American opera, (to be given, however, Cantata-wise—if it were on Sunday evening we should say Oratorio-wise—without scenery or costume), in the Music Hall. American, we mean, in subject, it being Longfellow's "Miles Standish," run into libretto mould by Mr. C. T. CONGDON—and in the fact that its composer, Mr. FRANZ KIELBLOCK, has for years resided in this country and found his inspirations here, as well as in the musical masters of his Fatherland. The piece has been diligently rehearsed under Carl Zerrahn, and the performance will be conducted by the composer himself. It will be sung by Mr. WEINLICH as Miles Standish, Mrs. HEYWOOD as Priscilla, Mr. C. R. ADAMS as John Alden, Mr. GEORGE WRIGHT, JR., as Elder Brewster, with a large volunteer chorus, supported by the orchestra of the Philharmonic Concerts. We are told that it bids fair to become popular.

The preparations for the Complimentary Concert to CARL ZERRAHN are nearly completed, and all augurs success. The orchestral pieces will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony (in B flat), and the overtures to Leonore and Tannhäuser. The Orpheus Glee Club will sing some of their best, and so will Mrs. HARWOOD. . . . The principal features in the Afternoon Concert this week were Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1; the Hebrides overture by Mendelssohn, again; the Lohengrin finale, and Schubert's "Eulogy of Tears." This was the twenty-second concert of the season, and it is announced that only two more will be given. We trust the public will turn out in such force as to demand a much longer continuance of them. . . . The "Messiah" was performed last week by the Montreal Oratorio Society—choruses and solos good, it is said, but the orchestra consisting of only eight or nine instruments.

The operas in New Orleans during the few past weeks have been, Martha, Il Barbiere, the Huguenots, Rigoletto, Norma, &c. Mme. GAZZANIGA has given a concert there, with the tenor Tamaro, M. Berthal, basso, of the Orleans theatre, Sig. Albites, and a young pianist, Henry Sanderson, who is much praised. . . . Mme. ANNA BISHOP was creating a sensation in Texas. . . . The New Orleans Classic Music Society gave for its fifth concert Beethoven's "Heroic Symphony," overtures by Weber, Rossini and Mendelssohn, an Andante by Haydn, &c. Both COLSON and PAKODI were expected in that city. . . . The Springfield Republican says:

It is a fact, perhaps not generally known, that Springfield people are indebted to the original P. T. Barnum for the parlor operas which were given in this city last week by Mr. and Mrs. Drayton. He hired them in England and brought them over here, and ever since they have been in this country they have been in his employ, though he has been behind the scene. To Barnum's shrewdness may be attributed in part their success, and to that in part his own recovery from his late financial prostration.

The last volume of the new American Cyclopaedia contains an article on Haydn, in which it is said that a French traveller in 1782, wrote the following account of Prince Esterhazy's orchestra:

"Esterhazy's orchestra is one of the best I ever heard, and the great Haydn is his court and theatre composer. He (the count) often engages a troupe of wandering players for months at a time, and he himself, with a few officials and servants, form the entire audience. They are allowed to come upon the stage uncombed, drunk, their parts not half learned, and half dressed. The prince is not for the serious and the tragic, and he enjoys it when the players, like Sancho Panza, give loose reins to their humor. For this man the witty and jocose Haydn, ever ready with new and excellent music, was just the man."

Little PATTI was announced in Philadelphia this week to sing both in Martha and in Don Pasquale. The "Sicilian Vespers" for Tuesday evening; and on Wednesday the Ullman-Strakosch season was to close. . . . The Cecilia Society in Cincinnati performed at their fifth concert, March 20, the third scene from the first act of Wagner's Lohengrin; an Andante and variations, for two pianos, by Schumann; the Terzet from Fidello; songs by Robert Franz, &c. Herr RITTER is the conductor. The Männerchor in the same city are rehearsing Lortzing's Czar und Zimmermann. . . . The young American violinist, H. VAUGHN, of whose successful studies in Germany our "Diarist" has informed us, has returned to Cincinnati, which place is his home.

The New York Sängerbund has established a singing school for beginners, which already numbers about 250 scholars, under the instruction of Herr Methfessel. . . . In Chicago a series of six so-called classical concerts has been commenced. The programme of the first contains the name of Meyerbeer three times, that of Beethoven once; also Brahms once, a song by Franz, &c. . . . CARL BERGMANN was to give a concert in New York, the programme including: Schubert's D minor Symphony (a piano-forte arrangement of which by Carl Klauser, of Farmington, Ct., is soon to be published); Les Préludes, by Liszt; Beethoven's Leonore overture, No. 3; "The Lord's Supper," a biblical scene for male voices and orchestra, by Wagner; and concertos for piano and for violoncello.

The letters of FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLOMY are soon to appear in print in Germany, edited by his brothers, Droysen and Paul Mendelssohn. . . . "LOUIS SPOHR, Sein Leben und Wirken" (his life and labors) is the title of the biography just published, written by his pupil, Alexander Malibran. Spohr's autobiography will also soon appear. . . . ELISE POLKO, some of whose charming musical tales and sketches we have been giving to our readers, has published a musical romance, entitled "Faustina Hassé."

One of our young American singers, it would seem, has "taken Holland." She came from Albany, which may account for it. We read:

Miss HINCKLEY, the American prima donna, recently had a great success in Amsterdam. She sang in the opera of Linda, in presence of the Queen of Holland, who came and took her by the hand, and thanked her for the great pleasure afforded by her singing. Her Majesty has spoken of the young vocalist very often, and says that she has been dreaming of her ever since, "she looked so pretty." At Utrecht she sang, and after the concert she was serenaded by the students, who came in a torchlight procession, and the lady was called out upon the balcony of her hotel, and saluted with huzzas and fireworks. A banquet was also prepared in her honor. At Rotterdam, also, her success was brilliant.

Fast day in Worcester was to be improved by the performance of Haydn's "Seasons," with selections from Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn, by the Mozart Society, which has received a large accession of members, and has organized an orchestra under the leadership of GEORGE P. BURT. . . . Springfield, on the same day, was to receive a visit from the Hartford Beethoven Society, who were to perform the "Messiah." . . . We congratulate the good people of Springfield on the acquisition of so good a pianist and teacher, and so gentlemanly a man, as Señor CASSERES, the young West Indian, who gave one or two concerts in this city a year since. During his stay in Canada he has gained health and control of nerves, and has now settled down in Springfield for the good, we trust, of numerous pupils. Of an invitation concert, which he gave there on Monday, the Republican says:

The concert was a decided success, so far as it vindicated the high reputation which Mr. Casseres has brought with him from Europe and our own eastern cities. His great excellence consists in the precision and delicacy of his touch, and the taste of his musical articulation. If we were to criticize him at all, we should say that his playing lacks the power which is necessary for brilliant success in the concert room. He loves to let his fingers glide delicately over the keys, bringing out the sweetest harmonies and modulation, as if seeking rather to please himself or a listener leaning over the piano, than to startle and electrify an audience. His playing is eminently sympathetic, and is better calculated to win him reputation in drawing rooms or at a chamber concert, than in rooms as large as the Music Hall. He labored last night, however, under the disadvantage of having only a square piano, which, though a finely tuned instrument, lacked the volume necessary for the room and for the music. An offer of one of Chickering's grand pianos, obligingly made by the manufacturers, came to late, we understand, for Mr. Casseres to avail himself of it. We felt the want of it throughout the evening, and especially in Beethoven's magnificent sonata in A. flat (the world-famous Opus 26) with which the concert ended. In spite of his fatigue after two hours' playing, Mr. Casseres rendered it admirably, and we were gratified with the impression which this grandest of musical utterances (?) made for the first time on a Springfield audience.

In Montreal they are organizing a Choral Society, partly for the performance of a Cantata, by a resident composer, M. Sabatier, in honor of the approaching visit of the Prince of Wales, and partly with the permanent end of uniting musicians and amateurs in the practice of good music. The COOPER troupe are to open there on the 9th. . . . An exchange paper tells us:

There are now in Florence, Miss Field, Miss Fay and Miss Chapman, of Boston, and Miss Bodenheimer, of New York, as well as others from different parts of the country, in training either as amateur or professional singers. Miss Greenough, gifted with one of those sweet and bird-like voices such as one does not often hear, after some months' instruction there, has recently left for Rome. Of those in training as professional singers, without doubt Miss Chapman promises best, says a correspondent of the Times.

A writer in the Albany Journal, "G. W. W."—the initials of a well-known organist and teacher there—endorses all that was said here last summer of the great organ built for that city by Messrs. Simmons and Willcox. He says:

The Grand Organ in the New St. Joseph's Church is at last completed, and our musicians have already had a taste of its superlative merits, thanks to the kindness of Mr. Willcox, who is one of the builders and also most certainly one of the very best organists in this country. This instrument is by all odds the largest and most complete yet erected in America and is a monument of skill and musical science on the part of the builders, which will carry their fame throughout the continent. This organ was exhibited at the factory in Boston last Spring and brought out such encomiums from the press, including the musical papers, and such an ovation from the profession, that its prestige has made all persons interested in the King of Instruments most anxious to hear it. At this time it will be impossible to describe why this organ is so remarkable, except to say that it numbers the most pipes (especially those of large calibre) all of which are of extra quality of metal and of the choicest voicing. That its mechanism is a wonder and it must be said of intricate simplicity. That it possesses all the modern effects of action, couplings and variety in stops, which have made the celebrity of the large cathedral organs of Europe; in fact, that nothing has yet been done in this country which can be compared on a level with this organ of the new St. Joseph's Church.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Philadelphia Bulletin translates the following: March 10.—Last evening, at the Grand Opera, took place the first performance of Pierre de Medicis, an opera in four acts and seven tableaux, words by Messrs. St. George and Emilien Pacini, music by Prince Poniatowski. The house was splendid to look at. As it had been announced in the bills that every place was taken in advance, the box-offices were not even open.

The Emperor and Empress, Prince Napoleon and the Princess Clotilde, all the great officers of the Crown, all the ladies of the Court, half of the Senate, all the aristocracy of Paris, all the diplomacy, in fact all that Paris regards as celebrities in letters and in the arts, were present, making the most brilliant public that can be imagined. The ladies were in ball dress, very much décolletées and covered with diamonds. The theatre was illumined by them. The Empress wore a simple dress of lace, with a diadem of diamonds.

Rossini, the master of Prince Poniatowski, and who loves him much, was not present at the performance, but he had been at the general dress rehearsal on Wednesday last. This was the first time he had consented to set foot in the opera for twenty-five years. After hearing the work, the master complimented the Prince and said to him: "Ah, my friend, I was more excited than you, this evening."

Pierre de Medicis, son of Lorenzo the Magnificent, became sovereign of the States of Florence, Pisa, &c., in 1492, on the death of his father. He was a young prince of dissolute habits, very cruel, and yet of weak character. His subjects revolted against him, and his brother, Julien de Medicis, succeeded him.

The scene opens at Pisa. Pierre has come thither, attracted by his love for the fair Laura Salvati, niece of the Grand Inquisitor, Fra Antonio. Laura is in love with, and is loved by, Julian de Medicis, the duke's brother. The scene represents the grand saloon of the ducal palace, on the triumphal arrival of Pierre de Medicis. After showing himself to his people, he remains alone with the Grand Inquisitor and asks him for the hand of his niece. He sings to him, and for this reward he promises the ambitious monk that he shall share his power with him.

"D'elle j'attends son coeur, devous j'attends sa main,"

The scene changes to the chamber of the Countess Laura Salvati. Her ladies of honor are preparing her evening toilette. Left alone, she sings a love song. Soon Julien arrives. He tells Laura that Pierre wishes to marry her, and he urges her to fly with him to seek happiness in another land. She resists, and the act closes with this duo.

In the second act, we are in the gardens of the palace of the Dukes of Medicis at Pisa. Pierre is giving a fête to the people. In the back ground is a fountain of real water, which obtained a success of enthusiasm. The assembled people are present; soldiers and peasants are playing at a game which turns into a quarrel. Knives are drawn, but the procession which appears stops the struggle and the fête begins. This fête is a mythological ballet—the loves of Diana and Endymion. Diana, the great huntress, is in turn hunted; Love pursues her and hurls a dart at her. Diana, wounded in the heart, loves Endymion, and shows her love to him in a lively, animated dance. The ballet closes and the gardens of the city of Pisa, suddenly illuminated, are seen. The illumination is made with gas, although it was unknown in the days of the Medicis.

During the fête, the Grand Inquisitor informs Pierre that his brother is his rival, and Pierre, to rid himself of Julien, appoints him Grand Admiral and Commander of the fleet which is to go to fight against the infidel. Laura, who learns that all is lost, consents to fly with Julien.

In the third act we are introduced to a fisherman's house on the banks of the Arno. It is here that Laura is to meet Julien. She comes, but she has been followed. The Grand Inquisitor and Pierre de Medicis hasten to prevent her flight. Laura formally refuses the hand of Pierre, who exclaims: "You refuse my hand? Then be the bride of heaven!" Nuns enter, take possession of Laura, and lead her away. The scene changes to the Campo Santo at night time. Julien is at prayer before his mother's tomb, when news is brought to him that Laura has been arrested and thrown into a cloister. Julien's friends surround him and offer to restore the woman he loves. The conspirators swear to conquer or die, and they hasten away to the combat.

The first tableau of the fourth act shows a tavern where some soldiers are drinking, while a party of young girls are dancing the trescone. Pierre de Medicis arrives alone, pale, wounded, holding in his hand his broken sword. He has been deserted by his friends in the melee; he has repented what he has done, and wishes to hasten and restore Laura to her father. Will he arrive in time?

The scene changes to a cloister. A procession of inquisitors and nuns passes. Laura appears in the dress of a bride—the bride of heaven. The ceremony of taking the veil takes place. Laura's hair falls under the sacred steel. Suddenly a great tumult outside is heard. The cloister doors, broken down by blows of axes, fall to pieces. Pierre de Medicis, dying, enters, supported by Julien, and cries "Stop!" He advances and restores Laura to his brother; but the Grand Inquisitor, pointing to Laura, stops them with a gesture, saying "she belongs to Heaven." Pierre expires, Julien seems paralyzed with grief; the nuns lead off Laura, and the curtain falls.

The third act is richer than the two preceding, if not in the number, at least in the value of its pieces. It contains among other beautiful things a Prayer to the Virgin, sung by Laura, a trio by Pierre, Laura and Fra Antonio, in which Obin makes a great point, and finally the air of Julien in the Campo Santo, for which Bonnehé was called out. In the fourth act the chorons of drinkers and the finale deserves praise. For the rest, the score is hard to analyze. There is not in it a single piece that does not show happy intentions, interesting details and very skilful instrumental combinations.

The performance was excellent. Mme. Gueymard-Lauters alone would have secured success. Gueymard, Obin and Bonnehé sang very well. Mme. Ferraris danced with infinite talent and success in the ballet of Diana. A young dancer, Mme. Fiore, is charming in the part of Love.

The work is mounted with great splendor. The costumes are extraordinarily rich, the decorations very fine. The first, second, third and last tableau produce great effect. The fifth tableau, the Campo Santo by moonlight, is marvellous. It is positively asserted that the mise en scène of this opera cost 125,000 francs.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—Dr. Wylde has this year again taken the field early, and again taken the initiative in the great classic performances of the season. The director and conductor of the New Philharmonic Concerts has issued his prospectus, but stands pledged to nothing definite. He intimates persistence in his former course of administration, and proclaims non-interference with the open policy of the Musical Society of London, especially that part of it which holds out a protective hand to the British musician. The first concert of the ninth season was given on Monday evening week. The programme was as follows:

Overture (Abenoeagen). . . . . Cherubini
Aria, "Parto, ma tu ben mio" . . . . . Mozart Concerto in E minor, violin and orchestra. . . . . Spohr
Chorus (Ruins of Athens). . . . . Beethoven
Romance of Arie, "Einest trübsinnig" (Der Freischütz). . . . . Weber Symphony in B flat. . . . . Beethoven
Concerto in G minor, piano and orchestra. . . . . Mendelssohn Sarabanda e Gavotte, violoncello. . . . . Bach
Madrigal, "In going to my lonely bed". . . . . Edwards A.D. 1560
Aria, "Batti, batti" . . . . . Mozart
Overture (Ruler of the Spirits). . . . . Weber —London Musical World, March 3.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—Probably a larger audience was never assembled in St. James's Hall—which, though calculated to admit two thousand persons, was by no means sufficiently spacious to accommodate more than three-fourths of the amateurs of classical music who applied for admission at the doors—than at the eleventh concert. Many hundreds were unavoidably denied admission, and almost as much money was "returned" as would have made an ordinarily successful evening. The programme was as follows:

Quintet, in A, stringed instruments and clarinet. . . . . Mozart
Song, "Soft and bright" . . . . . H. Smart
Song, "I quit my pillow" (Don Quixote). . . . . Macfarren
Sonata, in A flat, piano and orchestra. . . . . Paganini Sonata, in E flat major, for piano and orchestra. . . . . Weber Song, "Adelaide" . . . . . Beethoven
A Lullaby, "Golden slumbers kiss your eyes". . . . . 17th Century Quartet, in D major, op. 18. . . . . Beethoven Conductor—Mr. Benedit.

The concert of Monday week, (the first of the new series, the thirteenth of the second season), was one of the greatest possible interest. It was composed entirely of works, vocal and instrumental, of the Italian masters. The selection was as follows:

Quintet, in A major, for two violins, viola, and two violoncellos. . . . . Boccherini Aria, "Basta in pace, idolo mio" (Gi' Ormai ed i Our-lui). . . . . Cimarosa Recitativo e Rondo, "Ah non mi qual pena". . . . . Sarti Scena Tragica—Grand Sonata, in G minor, for piano and orchestra (Didone Abbandonata). . . . . Clementi
Duetto, "Cantando un di". . . . . Clari
Aria, "Com'ape ingegnosa" (Tarara). . . . . Ballerini
Quartet, in E flat (No. 5), two violins, viola, and violoncello. . . . . Rossini Grand Quartet, in E flat major, for two violins, viola, and violoncello. . . . . Cherubini
Grand Aria, "Se il ciel mi divide" (Didone Abbandonata). . . . . Paganini
Capriccio (Moto Continuo), violin alone. . . . . Paganini
Aria—Almaviva—"Io son Lindoro" (Barbiere di Siviglia). . . . . Paisiello
Duetto—Almaviva and Bartolo—"O che umor" (Barbiere di Siviglia). . . . . Paisiello
Ternetto—Rossini, Almaviva, and Bartolo—"Ah chi sa questo suo figlio" (Barbiere di Siviglia). . . . . Paisiello Trio, for violin, viola and violoncello. . . . . Corbelli

The selection from the Barbiere di Paisiello excited general curiosity. The tenor air (remarkably well sung, by the way, by Mr. Tennant) was at once remembered by the old opera goers as the late Mr. Tom Cooke's duet, "Ah! maiden fair," interpolated in place of the great air, "Ecco ridente," in Rossini's Barbiere. In those days managers and directors had but little respect for masterpieces. Paisiello's (not Tom Cooke's) air, however, is eminently graceful. It must be remembered, Paisiello's Barbiere was written thirty or forty years before Rossini's. The duet (Mr. Tennant and Mr. Winn) and the trio (the same gentlemen with Miss Susanna Cole) are extremely graceful and quaint, and, no doubt, on the stage, would open a vein of comedy, which they seem to want in the concert-room.

A Beethoven Night was given on Monday, and attracted an immense audience. The programme could not have been better selected:—

Posthumous Quartet, in F major (No. 17). . . . . Beethoven
Song, "Ave Maria". . . . . Schubert
Air, "Dah per questo". . . . . Mozart
Air, "La Pastorella dell'Alpi". . . . . Rossini
Sonata Appassionata, in F minor, op. 57. . . . . Beethoven Sonata, in A major, op. 80, for piano and violin. Beethoven Songs, "Ah, how sweet it is to love!" and "On the brow of Richmond Hill". . . . . Purcell Song, "A bird sat on an alder bough". . . . . Spohr Septet, in E flat, op. 20. . . . . Beethoven

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Artful Dodger. Song. Sam Cowell. 25

Irresistibly laughable when sung by this comic genius. It is not difficult to take advantage of the many fine points which this song offers.

The maid of the milking pail. Arranged by Tom Comer. 25

As sung by the charming "soubrette" Agnes Robertson, also introduced by Mrs. Chanfrau at the performances of "Our American Cousin," on the boards of the Howard Athenaeum.

Sweetheart. A Bird's Song. M. W. Balfe. 25

One of the prettiest, sweetest little songs. The "London Musical World" which paper does not give music but perhaps once a year, has lately given it to subscribers as a choice and rare delicacy, which fact is in itself sufficient recommendation.

O not with tears alone. (S'altro che lagrime.) "Clemenza di Tito." 25

Gentle Zephyrs. (Zeffiretti lusinghieri.) Song. "Idomeneo." 50

With hearts overflowing. (Ah, grazie si rendono.) Quartet. "Clemenza di Tito." 25

Two songs and a quartet, all of rare beauty, but hitherto unattainable. All belong to Wesley's series of Mozart's songs. The quartet is a masterpiece of smooth, graceful and melodious writing.

Instrumental Music.

Be kind to the loved ones. For 5 or 6 Instruments. B. A. Burditt. 50

Elfin Waltzes. For 5 or 6 Instruments. " 60
Excellent for small amateur bands. The arrangements are for two violins, clarinet, flute and bass.

Six Polonaises. For four hands. Opus 61. Two Books. Franz Schubert, each 60

These were originally composed for four hands, and are not mere arrangements. They are the most charming pieces ever written and will have a lasting place in musical literature.

Spanish Retreat Quickstep, for 6 Inst's. Burditt. 60

Hero's Quickstep. " " 60

Very desirable arrangements for small bands, from the set of the "National Orchestra."

THE GOLDEN HARP. A Collection of Hymns, Tunes, and Choruses for the Use of Sabbath Schools, Social Gatherings, Pic Nics, and the Home Circle. By L. O. Emerson. 25

This popular music book for Sabbath Schools has recently been much enlarged. It has been introduced into many large schools, and has in every case given the fullest satisfaction. This is not surprising when a hasty glance at its pages discloses a numerous collection of old favorites, interspersed with so many new pieces that must become equal favorites with the public as soon as known. Individuals whose interests are enlisted in the cause of Sabbath Schools cannot do a better deed for the good of that cause than by examining this work, calling the attention of their friends to it, and introducing it into use in their respective localities.

Mme. Schroeder-Devrient.

(From the Leipzig Zeitung.)

A short time since (Nov. 10, 1859) the public journals brought us the news from Munich, that SOPHIE SCHROEDER, at the age of nearly eighty years (her maiden name was Bürger, her first married name Stollmers) had excited such a jubilee by her recitation of Schiller's "Bell," as would have been possible to but few of the younger notabilities of the stage. And now (Feb. 9, 1860) we read of the decease in Coburg, of her equally renowned daughter, Wilhelmina SCHROEDER-DEVRIENT, by second marriage Mme. Bock. Five and twenty years younger than her mother, her shorter career has been not less eventful, and not less rich in victories and triumphs. Born in 1805 at Hamburg, in her fifth year she figured on the stage of her native city as an Amourette in a ballet; and then she went with her mother to Vienna, where she first appeared as an actress at the age of fifteen, and in such parts as Alicia in Phädra, Louise in Kabale und Liebe, Beatrice in Der Braut von Messina, did honor to the teaching and example of her great mother. At the same time she received musical instruction from Grünwald and Mozart, and already in the year 1821 turned her attention to the opera. Emmeline in Weigl's "Swiss Family," Maria in Grétry's "Blue Beard," and Fidelio are mentioned as her first and most prominent parts. If the much repeated and embellished story that it was she who first caused the world to recognize the power and beauty of Beethoven's opera, at first so little understood, is wholly untrue, inasmuch as Fidelio had maintained its place upon the repertoire of the Vienna opera since 1816, still it is true that in her study of this rôle the young Wilhelmina Schroeder of sixteen did enjoy the personal instruction, and in her performance the fullest applause, of the composer. Thus equipped, she stepped forth into the world. She went first (in 1823) to Berlin; and from there to the court theatre at Dresden, with which she remained connected, notwithstanding all sorts of artistic tours, until her retirement from the stage in 1848. Here she never tired of learning and of making progress in her art; but even when she had long shone as a model, she repeatedly began anew at the foundations, availing herself of the instructions of the celebrated singing master, J. Miecksch. Here she laid the chief foundation to her fame, which after her journeys to Paris, in 1830 and '31, and to London in 1832, '33 and '37, spread over the greater part of cultivated Europe.

Should we undertake to recall all the rôles, in which she appeared during a period of twenty-seven years, we should not wander far from the truth, if we maintained that she had represented all the leading parts in all the operas written and produced before and during her theatrical career. While she revealed to us the perennial freshness in the works of Gluck, Grétry, Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, Spontini, she understood how, at the same time, to make Rossini and Bellini, Au-ber and Donizetti, Halevy and Meyerbeer exceedingly enjoyable to us; and any person who has admired her in the German masterworks of later times, in the operas of Weber, Spohr, Marschner and Richard Wagner, will find it hard to tell how much these masters owed to her and how much she to them. We shall not see such another Armida or Iphigenia, such another Donna Anna, such another Fidelio, or Euryanthe, or Rebecca, or Adriana, or any of the great rôles she created for us; we shall not see again that perfect harmony of two geniuses, of the composer and the interpreter, which we have enjoyed in her creations. But perhaps the highest thing in her art was the soul with which she quickened and ennobled weaker and even weak forms. To the end of her stage career she was on this account besieged by an uninterrupted series of those artists, who thought they felt within them the clear call to immortality, but who, not exactly knowing how to find the true and shortest way to their own glory, found it convenient to bespeak the friendly mediation of the disinterested artist woman. Nay, I could name one — composer, who hardly could have believed in his own immortality, whose operas Schroeder-Devrient regularly studied and performed, because, forsooth, the man had expectations not only of a rich operatic, but also of a rich family fortune, and because a prospect opened before him of an honorarium from another great court theatre, the moment that his work should pass the ordeal of one stage with applause. "She could help the man," and Schroeder-Devrient was always glad to help where she was able. Most glad, to be sure, when it would really serve the cause of Art. For she had sincere joy in her art; for her it had nothing mechanical, nothing slovenly or careless, nothing done for mere applause or gain. When she made a pilgrimage to Paris and London, to Vienna and Berlin, it was no Barnum raid, but an internal need of finding whereabouts she stood then in her art. It was the need of testing the correctness of her efforts before a strange and a perhaps higher and severer judge; not the desire to take her talents to a richer and more paying market. Hence we do not see her seeking an inexperienced and uncultivated public of backwoodsmen; but we see her going to the places upon which all her great predecessors had stood, where she still found living rivals, where the public had seen and appreciated the highest and best of its time. In fact, her artistic journeys were far more productive of fame, than of any material advantage which she carried home.

The same zeal for Art she always showed towards other talents striving in the same direction.

If it was not possible to carve, as she said, a Schroeder-Devrient out of every piece of wood, yet there were a great number of younger talents whom she taught, and helped to develop, whom she favored, furthered, or at least carried along with her. For, indeed, we must not imagine her instruction to have been any systematic schooling, lessons to be learned and said by heart. Where no real soul for art betrayed itself, where the capacity to understand and follow her was wholly wanting, there her influence could not of course avail; and, in such cases, she would privately and in her own way advise one to keep on knitting stockings. But where there glimmered any spark of native fire, she knew well how to quicken it, sustain it and cause it to shine out. From Agnes Schebest to Johanna Wagner I could mention a whole list of singers, who, if they would be just and candid, would have to confess, that they must ascribe the best that they have ever done to her, to her example and her teaching.

Her zeal for the aspirations of more recent tone-poets, has been already alluded to. There has hardly been one of any importance, who has lived at the same time with her, who has not sought her acquaintance, been enthusiastic for the genial, gifted woman, and, if he deserved it, won her friendship. She was one of the first to recognize the genius of Richard Wagner; she too belonged to that prophetic artist circle, who did not let themselves be led astray either by the unmistakable excrescences that cleaved to the first works of that master, or by the fault-finding criticism of those days, but who clearly foretold the rising of a new and genuine star; she it was who in the parts of Adriano and of Senta, decided the quick victory of these creations. Nay, for the first representations of the Tannhäuser, she undertook the part of Venus.

This was the last creation of her genius; the rôle in many respects was not well suited to a woman then of forty; but we shall not see such another Venus. It was her unmistakable enthusiasm for the composer and his work, that lent a coloring to her performance, which those present never can forget, and which they, who have only seen this opera without her, cannot understand.

It has been my good fortune to have seen and heard this artist often, during many years, in nearly all her famous parts, and that repeatedly; I am aware, therefore, that for all who knew her, there is and can be no description even remotely corresponding to the memory we have of her. And I know just as well, that, since she stands beyond all comparison with any living singers, it is hardly possible for one, who has not seen her, to form any conception of her performances. Who can imagine a Fidelio, who, with the first words she uttered seized upon every public, and in the prison scene moved even the actors on the stage to tears? Or a Donna Anna, who, in the brief words of the introduction: Padre mio! thrilled every nerve of our being in the deepest manner? Or a Euryanthe, who could breathe such an ecstasy of love into the duet: Hin nimm die Seele mein! Who, if he has not — I will not say seen or heard — but if he has not lived it, can form any idea of that cry, with which Rebecca greets the trumpets of Ivanhoe? And who could trust to the same artist, a few moments afterwards, to move him so deeply, as she does with the words of painful gratitude:

Yes, thou hast fought for me, the Jewess!
What more would the poor Jewess have?

We shall again see Clytemnestra rage, and Marie toy in "Blue Beard," and perhaps an Emmeline smile amid tears; we shall certainly often hear the Adelaide and the Erlkönig sung; and we shall again be thrilled by the imperishable beauty of these strains; but still the highest enjoyment we shall feel in them will and can only be, that the singer falls not too far short of the ideal which has been realized to us once and not again. Such oneness of the artist with her part, such perfection of dramatic expression generally and of each single expression which the situation demands, such a union of splendid resources, of most highly cultivated singing with complete impersonation,—all this we shall never see again in such perfection.

The happy instinct with which she saw and caught the spirit of every rôle and the peculiar meaning of its every moment, has often been a theme of wonder. This, to be sure, was native to her. But the great reason of it was, that she had cultivated her taste to the finest degree, and that she was never weary of proving the task set before her on all sides, and never ceased to study it until she had found the truest expression for it.

As the Devrient was always great and noble in her performances, so too she always set for herself the highest tasks in her art. And thus she has worked for her time, and her name will live through all time.

In announcing the death of the great German singer, Mme. SCHROEDER-DEVRIENT, the London Musical World says:

When Madame Schröder-Devrient appeared at Drury Lane for the first time, Pasta was declining from her zenith at the Italian Opera; Sontag had just risen above the musical horizon; and Malibran, from a different point of the hemisphere, was beginning to emit a few brilliant scintillations of that light which was destined in so short time to obnubilate, if not extinguish, all contemporaneous luminaries. That, indeed, may be denominated the great operatic epoch of the age. Season after season brought new singers of celebrity to London, and from Catalani to Grisi may be traced one unbroken line of indisputable queens of song. Madame Schröder-Devrient then had some names and reputations to contend against. The sympathies of the public were either enlisted with Malibran and Sontag at the Italian Opera, or with our own Miss Stephens and Miss Paton, on the English lyric stage; while at the oratorios and in the concert-room were heard such popular and renowned songstresses as Ronzi de Begnis, Camporesse, Lalande, Pizarro, Blais, and other foreign cantatrici. Nevertheless, the great Teutonic artist, who, in all probability, on the Italian stage would not have taken rank among the first singers, achieved an unparalleled success at Drury Lane, and attracted all London for an entire season. Mad. Schröder-Devrient was a singer apart from all comparisons. She possessed very superior capabilities, both vocal and histrionic. Her voice was a high soprano, powerful and sonorous, matchless in the expression of passion and strong emotions, but somewhat deficient in tenderness and suavity. Thus, in the character of Fidelity, not even Malibran, perhaps, gave equal force to the denouncement of Pizarro in the prison scene; while to the Governor's interrogation, "Who art thou?" the answer "I am his wife!" (almost lost, by the way, in the English translation) was transcendent in its energy and earnestness. In the last finale too, Mad. Schröder-Devrient's voice, a real soprano, "towered" above principals, band, and chorus; and the singer never failed to send away her hearers with her last brilliant tones ringing in their ears. As an actress—a serious actress, let it be understood—her powers were of a high order. Indeed, nothing short of the rarest endowments and finest impulses could have enabled an artist to conceive and grasp a character like that of Leonora, at once so domestic and tragic, so natural and so lofty, so simple yet so sublime. Mad. Devrient's figure did not consort well with the male. She had too much enbonpoint, and her walk was over-studied and conventional. Every action and movement, however, was instinct with reality, and became the requirement of the moment and the situation. She was truly absorbed in the scene, and in her abstraction seemed to forget the stage; the footlights, and the audience.

Iphigenia in Aulis.

From ELISE POLKO'S "Musikalische Märchen, Phantasien und Skizzen;" translated by FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

Oh, radiant art of tones, blessed is the head thou surroundest with thy shining glory! Like a powerful talisman, thy light preserves from the insect swarm of every-day mortal cares; happily wander the spirits thou shelterest, over the rough floor of life, and through its darkness; their feet stumble not, and before their prophet eyes all shadows disappear. "Loneliness amid the noisy crowd of life, is true loneliness!" Thus, on a lovely April morning, might any of the fair forms have whispered to themselves, whose glances rested on a serious, thoughtful man, who had taken a place on one of the little seats in the budding garden of the park of Versailles. His upward-looking face was turned away from the glittering crowd; his forehead bore the unmistakable stamp of greatness; his clear, blue eyes shone undazzled by the sunlight, and a smile of heavenly enthusiasm played round his noble mouth. His dress was simple—almost negligent; and its plain, gray color contrasted strongly with the richly embroidered apparel of the French court gentleman; for it was in the year 1774, and Louis the Sixteenth was then king of France. The countless promenaders, who came and went like a swarm of bees, laughing, chattering, and coquetting, scarcely remarked the immovable stranger; the violet sellers, who pounced on every man like a swarm of flies, had grown tired of importuning this apparent petrification, and no longer condescended to direct a look or a smile to him. The crowd gradually thinned; the garden grew quieter, paler gleamed the sunbeams, the blue of heaven darkened, the spring-intoxicated birds sought their nests, and at length all was silence around. Then the lonely man arose and turned homewards; but, walking with up-turned glance, he missed the way to the entrance door, and wandered deeper into the centre of the park. Here all was enchanting secrecy; the sweet spring seemed to have hidden herself in those close walks, thickets and bushes; all was bloom and perfume; fountains told their watery legends, and white marble deities peeped through the young green. The wanderer paused and smiled dreamily; but not the beauty of the garden had called forth the smile; it arose from the deepest soul of the silent one; glorious thoughts seemed to agitate him. He lifted up his hands, then let them fall; then went on in haste, humming to himself a complaining melody. Then his expressive face darkened, threatening glances shone from his eyes, and with a full, penetrating voice he sang this recitative:

"Go, seek death at a father's hand! my step shall follow thee to the dreadful altar! there will I lame the arm that threatens thee!"

Then, clinching his hands, and raising himself to his fullest height, he stretched out his arms, and sang with passionate anger:

"Soon shall he be my anger's prey!—
My dagger before him unheathing.
The altar they're cruelly wreathing,
In the dust shall this revenging arm lay!"

At this moment, two of the Swiss guards burst like tigers from the bushes, seized the excited stranger by the shoulder, and plentifully showered him with French and German words of abuse. "Scoundrel!" cried one in broken German—"Dare you lift your arms to threaten the palace! Dare you raise a dagger against king Louis? Will you blaspheme the holy church and the altar of the Lord?"

"Look here," panted the other, "the fellow has destroyed the flower-beds of the royal park, and trodden down all the violets and daisies. Off to prison with him!" The accused was motionless for a moment; he stared at his captors in astonishment, threw a glance of surprise on the destruction his footsteps had caused; at last a smile played over his features. "Now then," he said quietly to the tall soldiers, whose eyes angrily followed his every movement, "take me wherever you will! but I desire first to be led before the king: only to him will I exculpate myself." The soldiers made signs to each other that their prisoner was decidedly weak in the upper story; however, they nodded to him affirmatively, and the little procession moved onwards.

As they arrived in the court yard, a splendid gilt carriage, drawn by four spirited white horses, whose heads were decked with blue plumes, drove up, and stopped before the portal of the palace. Officious hands were offered to assist a graceful female form to alight from the elegant fairy equipage, whose seat was covered with nothing less than blue velvet. A black velvet hat, with floating feathers, ornamented the lady's delicately powdered little head; lace and rose-colored satin veiled her exquisite figure. This lovely apparition was Marie Antoinette, queen of France. While the queen's fat companion struggled with difficulty out of the carriage, Marie Antoinette, looking curiously around her, observed the mysterious prisoner, held fast in the grasp of the soldiers. "What is the matter?" she asked hastily, in German, pausing at the threshold of the palace. At the sound of her voice, the prisoner looked up and smiled; a little scream escaped from the rosy lips of the princess. "Oh, Master Gluck," she cried delighted, holding out her hand, "dear, dear Gluck, who ventures to fetter your free spirit in my kingdom?" Gluck's eyes glistened; a glance from the queen dismissed the confounded Swiss guards. "Come, master, follow me," cried the queen, gayly, "you shall not escape! Now I will be your gaoler. Tell me what led you in such suspicious company to the door of our palace; and rest a few moments in the apartment of your former scholar." So saying, she ran in such girlish haste up the carpeted staircase, that Gluck found it difficult to follow her. The assiduous crowd of servants remained, on a little word of command, in astonishment behind. Marie Antoinette passed, with a rapid step, through several handsome, gilded state-chambers, then opened a tapestried door, and stepped, with her silent companion, into a charming, simple little room, with a fine view over the fresh spring garden.

"Princess!" cried Gluck, visibly surprised, "this is precisely the comfortable room of our beloved arch-duchess Maria in the royal palace at Vienna! What a graceful miracle!" "Do you recognize it so well?" answered the queen, handing a soft seat to the master. "Come, sit down by me," she continued with enchanting grace and cordiality, "we will talk German and chatter about our dear Vienna, shall we not, Gluck? So long as you are here, I am only the cheerful, careless princess Marie, the darling of her noble queen mother, and the awkward pupil of the great master, Gluck." As she said this, she laid aside her rose-colored mantle and her hat, and stood before her former teacher in a pale green silk dress, with a bouquet of orange-blossoms and roses at her breast; a lovely picture to look on. Throwing herself into a large arm-chair, and resting her little foot on a red velvet cushion, she went on: "Ah, Gluck! since I heard of your arrival in Paris, how often I have longed to be back in those by-gone days! but the troublesome court festivals have left me no leisure. I have not seen you since that stiff reception, when you were presented to the king, and brought me letters from Vienna. I scarcely knew you in your court dress; but I was obliged to smile to myself, when I saw your proud greeting, that accorded so ill with your finery. In that hardly visible movement of the head, that set all our courtiers beside themselves, I recognized our Gluck again. Now I like you a great deal better; in this plain gray coat, I find my austere master again." "Gracious princess," answered the master absently, "those were pleasant hours that I passed in the pretty blue saloon of the royal palace at Vienna, and Marie Antoinette was a careful, attentive scholar, anxious to learn, and persevering as few women are." "Not always, Gluck," answered the queen, shaking her head; "do you not remember how cross you were sometimes, when I played badly, because a court ball or a sleighing party was running in my head? And have you forgotten how little I fancied Bach's fugues? and how often you drew me away from the piano, saying,—'Archduchess, such jingling is not to be borne!' and then you would take my place, and thunder away at the fugues, so that I almost lost sight and hearing, and drew back frightened into the furthest corner of the room. Oh, then how you played finer and finer, and I understood the intricate melodies, as I could not before, until the door softly opened, and the queen came in to listen; and then the quiet auditors increased, until the room and the ante-chamber were both full! And you paid no attention to them, but went on with your flights of tone, until some careless listener stumbled against a noisy object, or the fat, tight-laced, court-gouvernante was taken with her spasmodic cough; then you would start up suddenly, and say hurriedly: 'That was finely played, archduchess!' But sometimes you were so strange, that I scarcely dared to speak; then Marie Antoinette might play as she would, Master Gluck heard nothing, did not reprove false chords, unresolved dissonances, heavy allegros, or furious andantes; the eyes of my master were turned on high; his hands played on the piano-lid, he murmured to himself, until at last, he almost sprang up, and whispered with a happy smile: 'Ah, now, now thou art mine, sacred melody!'—and then you would turn to me, as if no interruption had taken place, and say: 'Go on archduchess!'"

Gluck looked with fatherly kindness on his former pupil, and his forehead grew clear under the cheerful, happy influence of her lovely face. "We have not altered, your Majesty," he said, dreamily; "you are still the childlike, careless, gracious princess; I am always the awkward, odd, absent-minded Gluck." The princess suddenly bethought her of his new opera: "Is it not Iphigenia in Aulis? When will it be brought out? Have you commenced the rehearsals yet?" "Ah, your Majesty," answered the Master, "I held the first rehearsal to-day, in the royal garden. Have you forgotten that I promised to give you an account of the way I came to appear in such company before you? I was just flinging to the winds the recitative and grand air of my Achilles, with the suitable gestures, as two of the park guards seized me. The good Swiss supposed that my Achilles, as he raved about his drawn dagger, was threatening the life of their lord, and they strangely confounded Louis the Sixteenth with Agamemnon!"

"Poor ill-treated, unappreciated singer!" jest-ed the queen, "what a good thing it was, that I happened to be queen of France, just at the moment they were slipping off with my dear Master! But tell me seriously, how your Iphigenia is getting on, and when will it be brought out? I can scarcely wait for the triumph of my countryman and master over Piccini, Sacchini, and Lulli!"

"I do not even dream of victory," answered Gluck, sadly; "there is yet nothing said of a representation; I have fought unceasingly against the power of secret intrigues that prevent any rehearsals, that prejudice public opinion beforehand, and wound me in a thousand ways. But I will not yield; my work deserves that I should employ all my strength to smooth its way to the hearts of men. And should I sink after the struggle, it would be without a sigh! for then I could say—I have not lived in vain; I have left my trace behind me! Yes, my queen," continued the noble master, with louder voice, and increasing enthusiasm, "it is a good work, this youngest child of my soul, this fruit of consecrated hours! I have displayed in it the noblest movements of my soul, the purest feelings of my heart, and my loftiest thoughts. In this opera is my own being unveiled; here shall posterity see what I am, or rather what I would be. This music is all Gluck! I have not merely felt, I have also thought it; it is a part of myself! Gone forever are my days and nights of error; gone my restless, passionate striving;—the lofty ideal of my soul, unclouded clearness, a glorious simplicity of melody, a godlike truth to nature, all stands now unveiled and eternal before my eyes; my happy aim will soon be gained, the blessed goal reached!"

Gluck was silent; how wonderful was the expression of his classic features, and his glowing eyes, that seemed looking into another world! Marie Antoinette regarded him with wondering reverence. She cried,—"Dear Master, trust in your queen! Iphigenia shall be brought out, next week if you will, by our command. With a royal word of power, I will annihilate the cobwebs of envy. To-morrow I will express my wishes to the intendant of the royal opera. You shall not struggle any more; you shall conquer, and I will crown the conqueror myself." Gluck looked kindly, but doubtfully, in the face of his excited pupil, whose lively enthusiasm would probably be extinguished by the next ball; but she met his glance with one so serious and determined, that he, with much emotion, took her pretty hand and pressed it with devotion to his lips.

Near the midnight hour of the 19th of April, 1774, the Parisian opera house rang with such delight as its walls had never before re-echoed. The Iphigenia in Aulide of Gluck was just ended; the audience had accompanied every number with increasing applause; but the glorious aria of Achilles raised enthusiasm to the highest pitch; the officers grasped their swords involuntarily; public excitement was displayed in a manner that mocks description, in a manner that we cold blooded German citizens would have stigmatized as insanity; tears flowed, sobs resounded, Gluck's name was pronounced by a thousand lips, flowers fell in showers on the stage. On the red velvet cushions of the royal box leaned Marie Antoinette, splendidly attired, her eyes glittering and overflowing for joy in the noble triumph of her honored master. Louis the Sixteenth stood near her; his ordinarily pale face, with its kindly eyes, was colored with a slight blush; he looked with lively sympathy on the excited crowd. "Good heavens," he cried suddenly, turning to the queen, "if the feverish flames of delight should be transformed to those of rage, in the breasts of this easily excited populace! What a fearful idea!" Marie Antoinette did not answer; she looked in wonder on the king, shuddered involuntarily, and anxiously grasped the arm of her husband. "Where is Gluck?" she whispered, in a restless and hardly audible voice. He was but that moment breaking away from the embraces and raptures of his admirers, the compliments of his vanquished enemies; and pressing the hand of his generous opponent Piccini, he hurried from behind the scenes, and followed, with uncertain steps, and almost overcome by his feelings, a patient attendant, who led him to the royal box. As Gluck entered, he bowed to the king; but the countless tapers dazzled his eyes with their light, his heart beat loudly; he struggled for breath. The queen approached the hesitating master, and with a lovely smile, placed a full, fresh laurel wreath on the head of the hero of tones. But he, suddenly rising, with burning eyes, passed his thin hand over his pale forehead, and turning to the queen with a look of horror, cried out: "Merciful God, what a fearful sight! Gracious queen, wipe off that dreadful streak of blood that encircles and disfigures your white throat! Who gave you such an ornament? Quick, destroy it! the horrible band grows larger every moment; your head is tottering; it is a stream of blood now! too late, too late, oh, heavenly father!" With this cry he staggered, and fell down in a swoon.

"Does Gluck see ghosts?" asked the king, as pale as death; "this extraordinary excitement was too much for him; the victory was too sublime; too brilliant for body and soul to support." Marie Antoinette trembled all over; like a frightened child, she tore off the precious ruby necklace that encircled her snowy neck, and, recommending the senseless Gluck to the care of her physicians and servants, she left the box, still sobbing and shuddering, on the arm of the king.

Little didst thou foresee, newly arisen Orpheus, that, in this moment of exaltation, thy prophetic eye pierced the veil of the future, as thy lip pronounced those fearful words. That thy spirit overcame time and space in that superhuman hour, and prophesied what was to be.

The unwithering laurel of fame flourished over thy grave, and between its leaves, blossomed in imperishable freshness those flowers of woe: Helena, Alceste, Orpheus, Armida, and those glorious twin blossoms, thy two Iphigenias! Sweetly didst thou rest after thy struggles, and even the worship of posterity no longer reached thine ear; in a happier land cherubim and seraphim hearkened to the transfigured tones of thy purified lyre; then came the fearful fulfilment of thy prophecy.

Nineteen years after thy first glorious triumph, the head of Marie Antoinette sank under the axe of the guillotine, in October of the year 1793.

Music in Southern Seminaries.

FEMALE INSTITUTE, RIFLEY, TENN.

Mr. Editor: What are old-fashioned, conservative people to do in these "fast" times? Or, in other words, what are teachers of music to do, who are expected to accomplish in five or ten months, what used to require almost as many years? I do not mean to say that people have any very definite ideas on the subject; because, as a general thing, it is a matter about which they are profoundly ignorant; but only that, in this comparatively new country, where everything is fresh, unsettled, and full of movement, the teacher who cannot make his pupils, in one or two sessions, rattle off, in some fashion, a number of polkas, schottisches, &c., is thought to be a very poor concern. And, really, where so little time is allowed for laying a foundation, where people want immediate results, it seems to me that a modification of the old slow and sure method of teaching—something analogous to the Ollendorf plan in language—might be profitably introduced.

I have been teaching music for many years, and have been considered, I believe, a successful teacher; but I have been gradually changing my method, and I am now convinced that, in consideration of the peculiar difficulties of the case, my present plan is by far the best. And I throw off these hints for the benefit of my fellow-laborers, especially those who are young and inexperienced; praying them, at the same time, not to misunderstand me; and not to think that I am advocating a superficial method. That be far from me!

Instead then, of keeping my pupils long in the instruction book, hammering away at dull exercises, I take a piece which is an exercise in itself. But, mind now, I do not mean some easy waltz, by some musical sophomore; no, I mean classical music, which will teach a true musical construction, the proper fingering of the scales, and, at the same time, form the taste and delight the ear.

Fortunately, of these little pieces, there is a great variety. My plan is, to write to headquarters, describe the advancement of my pupils, and order suitable music. Mr. Ditson sent me thirty pieces by mail the other day; I could not have selected them half so well myself; he has better opportunities of knowing what is good music than I have, and is probably a better judge.

Now, to make my meaning plainer, let me cite one or two examples. The first, a little girl of about ten years old—has been taking lessons about four months—is here from abroad—and practices at the Institute only the five school days. Now, I take one of the pieces of the "Nebelbilder"—a beautiful collection of 24 pieces, by Oesten, arranged "für kleine Haende." For this little girl I have selected the Shower of Pearls. Then I take the instruction book and make her play the scale two or three times in that key, till the key is firmly fixed in her mind. Then I make her play the bass, counting carefully herself every note, and noticing every mark of expression. I explain everything till I am sure she understands it. Then I play with the right hand, while she plays again with the left. Her countenance lights up, she perceives the beauty of the music.

Then I make her play the two parts together. Though she plays it very slowly, to my surprise and gratification, she plays it correctly, and with expression. But with the two hands, I give her a very small portion to practice; this she is to know by the next lesson.

Another case, my own little son, not yet eight years old. For him I selected the "Barcarolle," No. 4 of Nebelbilder. I pursued the same plan. He has taken five or six lessons upon it, and now plays it—a little slowly, but almost in time; and with good expression; and really understands it.

One little girl, quite small, who took lessons last year from another teacher, but was interrupted by the two months' summer vacation, has progressed with wonderful rapidity under my present plan. I gave her, as an experiment, No. 5 of the 12 "Fantaisies on German Songs," by Oesten. She plays it beautifully, and her little fingers fly over the keys to the surprise of everybody. When she had conquered that, I gave her a piece of much greater difficulty—in fact, it was more difficult than I supposed—and, by pursuing the same system, she learned it patiently and well.

I could write much more, for my mind and heart are both full of this subject; but my letter is already longer than I intended. Perhaps, at some future time, I may tell your readers how I try to train the voices of the little ones, which have been sadly neglected. There is great love for music in the West, and a good deal of talent. But such ideas as the mass of the people have!

Last summer, while in Mississippi, I carefully drilled a double quartet to sing at an exhibition of a male school, where heretofore they had been accustomed to the fiddle, played by the boys, keeping time with their feet. I thought, and so did some good judges, that we had very passable music; but at the next exhibition, the boys said that they all liked the fiddle best; and so we let them have the fiddle to their hearts' content. March, 28, 1860.

P. S. Since I closed my letter, I have thought of an anecdote which is too good to be lost. We attended, in Mississippi, a service of our church—the Episcopal—at a place where a zealous missionary was endeavoring to establish regular services. Before church, the clergyman asked me if I would raise the tunes. I told him if I knew what tunes the people could sing, I would lead them.

"Everybody knows Old Hundred," says he, "sing that."

"Very well," said I.

So, when the time came, I started Old Hundred; but not a soul joined in, except the minister, who, after some time, began singing the air an octave below, in a jerky, thumping, staccato style, which would have upset my gravity if I had not been burdened with the responsibility of carrying the tune to the end, or—letting it fall. We dispensed entirely with the second hymn.

After service, I asked my friend why nobody sang. "I thought you told me," said I, "to sing Old Hundred."

"Oh," said he, "they didn't know that was Old Hundred. I didn't find it out for some time, and then I helped you all I could, I'm sure."

And truly, when I heard them sing it after their own fashion, I didn't wonder that they didn't recognize my version of it. S.

Have we performed before the King of Naples? No, we have not. We have not yet got beyond being saluted by the Queen each time she has perceived us. However, the Queen can do nothing for us, and it is easier to tell you than to write you a description of his Neapolitan Majesty. But you can easily imagine how these sort of things are managed at court. The young violinist Lamotte,* who is in the service of the Empress, and who has been travelling in Italy by her orders and at her expense, had been a long time in Naples, and extended his stay three weeks longer, kept in a state of suspense, as he had been led to hope the King and Queen would ask to see him. Of course nothing came of this. I have a hundred amusing stories to tell you of this court; and I will show you also a picture of the King. I have not yet been able to see any one here. I did not tell you the reason why in my first letter, but as things are assuming a better aspect now, I will do so. You know that two horses and one postillion make three brutes. At the last stage before Rome, the postillion whipped the horse harnessed to the shaft, and who consequently supports the sedan. The horse fell rolling in the sand and dust, and fell violently on one side, dragging with him the front part of the sedan, which has only two wheels. I held Wolfgang by one hand, so that he did not fall out of the carriage, but the shock dragged me down, and my right leg, which was caught in the iron fastenings of the apron of the carriage, was torn for about the length of my finger to the bone.

To-morrow we are going to dine with the Cardinal Pallavicini; the day after with the Baron de Sainte Odile, Ambassador of Tuscany. We are to learn to-morrow a piece of news that will greatly astonish you. The Cardinal Pallavicini has received orders to remit to Wolfgang an order from the Pope with the diploma. Do not say anything about this yet. If the news prove true I will let you know soon. The last time we were at the Cardinal's, he said several times in speaking to Wolfgang, Signor Cavaliere; we thought it was a joke. Wolfgang has grown very much since he has been in Naples.

What I wrote to you the other day about the order is true. It is the same order as that which was bestowed on Gluck; in the papers appertaining to it the words written are, Te creamus aurata militie Equitem. And he must wear the beautiful gold cross that he has had presented him; you can imagine how I laugh each time I hear him called the Signor Cavaliere. We are to have an audience of the Pope to-morrow on account of this.

P. S. de Wolfgang.—Cara Sorella mia, I was agreeably surprised to see that you can compose so well; your air is really very fine; try often to do the same kind of thing; send me soon the six minuets of Haydn. Mademoiselle, I have the honor to be your very humble servant and brother—Chevalier de Mozart—Addio. †

We congratulate you on your fête day, wishing you good health, and before all the grace of God. It is the one thing necessary, all the others are added blessings. We have been to hear a mass performed at Civita-Castellana, after which Wolfgang played on the organ. On the 16th we went to Loretto; I bought several relics there; amongst others a splinter of the true Cross. We saw the fair at Sinigaglia; yesterday we came here. We left Rome on the 10th: the Count Pallavicini has offered us here all that we wanted. I accepted the offer of his carriage. If Wolfgang continues to grow as he does, he will be very tall.

P. S. of Wolfgang.—I congratulate my dear mother on her fête-day, and hope she may live a hundred years. It is what I pray God for every day, and what I shall continue to ask for her and for my sister in my prayers. I can only offer my mother the bells, the wax candles, the caps and the ribbons, that we bought at Loretto, and which we will bring her. Meanwhile I remain her faithful child.

Io vi auguro d'iddio vi dia sempre salute e vi lasci vivere cent anni, e vi fanno morire quanch'avrete mille anni. Spero che ovi imparerete meglio conoscermi in avvenire e che poi ne giudicherete come †Mozart only wore the Order of the "Cross of the Golden Spur," and which gave him the right to call himself the Chevalier de Mozart, (as Gluck called himself the Chevalier de Gluck) in his younger days, in the imperial towns and in his journey to Paris, by the express orders of his father, in 1770. Mozart was fourteen years old.

ch'egli vi piace. Il tempo non mi permetto di scrivere molte; la penna non vale un corno, ne pure quello che la dirige. Il titolo dell'opera che ho da comporre a Milano non si sa ancora.

I have just received as a present from our hostess at Rome, the "Thousand and One Nights" in Italian; they are very amusing tales to read.

My leg has not got quite well yet; this accident will cost us 12 ducats. It is not very gay work being ill while at an inn; if I had made 1000 ducats at Naples I could easily console myself for the expense of my illness. However, we have always something in hand, and with that, thank God, we live happily.

Yesterday we received the libretto, and the names of those who compose the Opera Company. The title of the opera is, Mitridate re di Ponto, and it is written by a poet of Turin, Vittorio Amadeo Cigna Santi by name. The opera was performed in 1777. The dramatis personae are:—

Mitridate, King of Pontus, Signor Guliemo d' Ettore, tenor.

Aspasia, betrothed to Mitridate, Signora Antonia Bernasconi, prima donna.

Tipare, Son of the King, in love with Aspasia, Signor Santorini, first soprano, (who played in the last Carnival at Turin.)

Farnace, eldest Son of Mitridate, in love with Aspasia, Signor Cicognani.

Ismene, Daughter of the King of Parti, in love with Farnace, second prima donna, the Signora Varese.

Artabes, Governor of Mijee soprano.

Magio, Roman Tribune, tenor.

We heard Sartorini sing at Rome, we already know La Bernasconi, and Cicognani is also our friend.

The two portraits have pleased us very much, but one must not look too closely at them, for a pastel is not a miniature. They are rather too highly colored, but they lose this looking at them from a distance; and we are satisfied and that is enough.

P. S. of Wolfgang.—Cara sorella mio, Io vi devo confessare che ho un grandissimo piacere che vi avete mandat i minuetti i quali mi piaccio in molto.

THE BLIND NEGRO PIANIST.—If we may credit the reports of the southern papers, the blind slave-boy Tom, of whom we have already given our readers some account, is one of the most remarkable instances of inexplicable genius that has ever been heard. All great men have moments of inspiration that seem to be the effect of some visitation of a supernatural power, rather than the result of mere human intellect, and this, though often evinced at an early age, cannot be called precocity. There have been poets who in early youth have poured forth strains that all their productions of maturer years could not excel. Among musicians and artists there are similar instances, which can only be attributed to some mysterious gift of deity that cannot be explained. This negro boy, Tom, though on a different scale of action, is another argument in behalf of this theory. Though a blind slave-boy, without musical culture, and without even ordinary intelligence on other subjects, he evinces an ability in musical execution that usually requires years of labor and undoubted musical genius to attain.

A few nights ago, in New Orleans, the manager or conductor of his entertainments, requested any one of the audience to play on the piano some piece of music not common or popular. A lady present played a Spanish piece of some length, and rendered more difficult by elaborate variations. As she played the boy listened, leaning his elbows on the end of the piano, with his hands clasped in the wool over his ears, his sightless eyes rolling upward, and his whole body writhing and twisting as if in pain. When the lady finished he played the piece so as to astonish everybody. But the lady detected a few faults, and, on being requested, again played the selection. Tom listened again, and afterwards played it without a single mistake. A few days after he remembered it perfectly, and played it again when asked.

With Tom this is rather an exercise of memory than of absolute musical talent, for his memory is as great, though less intelligent, in other things. If a long sentence is said to him in any foreign language, he will at once repeat it just as it was spoken, but without really understanding a word. So it may be with his music. He probably does not understand it, though in this case the facility with which he can find the right notes on the piano is as marvellous as the memory which can retain the piece after one or two hearings. Mozart had this memory when he heard and reproduced on paper the music of the Miserere at Rome; only, his was an intelligent memory, cultivated in the art of music, while Blind Tom's memory is a gift, of which the lad cannot appreciate the extent.

As Tom is a slave, his owners will probably be afraid to exhibit him in a free state, so that it is doubtful whether the New York public will have any ocular or auricular proof of the reported talent of this singular boy.

CHINESE MUSIC.—The musical scale of the Chinese consists of only five notes instead of seven, and their music is not written on five lines like ours, but in perpendicular columns, like the characters in their books. The elevation or depression of tones is indicated by distinctive names. They have no semi-tones, and hence arises a tedious monotony of sound. There is said to be a resemblance between the Chinese melodies and the ancient Scottish airs. If this be so, Scottish music in the days of Ossian must have been much ruder than it has ever yet been represented, for of all unearthly sounds Chinese singing is the most unearthly. There is no noise like it. Those who have attended a genuine Chinese theatrical performance, have had a specimen of how the men acquit themselves in song; but Chinese music can only be heard to perfection by strolling through the narrow streets of a Chinese town. Men, women and children all strain their voices to the utmost pitch, and give out a sort of double-fortified squeaking falsetto. The singers are usually accompanied by the viola, and sometimes by the pig-skin drum likewise. One's tympanum throbs and thrums as though a dozen fairies were beating upon it. Yet the Chinese have their Jenny Linds, Grisis and Sontags; their Lablaches and Tamburinis. They have their "infant phenomena," too, who, if they keep their lungs whole until arriving at mature age, certainly deserve the name. You are frequently called upon to admire what in another place than a Chinese town you would suppose to be an imitation of the piteous complaint of a pig jammed under a gate; being all the time in a state of nervous excitement, lest the warbler should break a blood vessel in your presence.

Unlike our private singers at home, the Chinese need no pressing to "favor" a company with a song. On the contrary, the performances are generally voluntary, and the performers never give the excuse of cough or cold. In truth, a slight cold is rather an improvement upon their style. The willingness with which they entertain you in this respect is only equalled by the evident vanity of the singers, or the exulting pride of the bystanders of celestial origin. "That booty!" she will ask; and others, "How you likee dat?" "What you tinker dat?" "Merican side can sing so booty?" To all of which it must be your invariable rule to give the expected answers, or you will immediately find yourself involved in a discussion in their horrible lingo, called pigeon-English, of which you are sure to have the worst, for the odds are too strong against you.

So long as a Chinese songstress can keep herself surrounded by listeners she will sing, and I believe really that singing in a Chinese town, like the reveille and tattoo of Great Britain around the world, never ceases. Their favorite hour is just at the close of twilight. When all else is still, and silence would reign with darkness, howls and squeals begin to float upon the air; at first low and indistinct, but soon loud, confused and piercing. Almost every other door-step is thronged with noisy musicians (your pardon, Euterpe!) and their eager and admiring listeners. From windows and casements come the tones of more delicate and retired singers, beating a select party within. Every group has at least one "infant phenomenon," the gentle cadence of whose voice is occasionally heard, followed by exclamations of astonishment and delight, repeated perhaps for the hundredth time. Be the theme of any song plaintive or gay, the tune seems to be much the same, and at times a hideous chorn will startle you into the belief that fiends are let loose upon earth.—Krackerbocker.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 2.—GUSTAV SATTER gave a concert last Thursday at Dodworth's Hall, which was quite a rara avis in these days, so unprosperous for entertainments of the kind. It was not only exceedingly well attended, but the audience was evidently a paying one. Most of the familiar faces belonging to the genus "dead-head," and which compose a usual New York concert assemblage, were among the mis-ing. One must congratulate Mr. Satter upon his success in bringing about a gathering so original.

The programme contained several very attractive numbers. A Prelude and Fugue by Handel, (originally composed for the organ); a beautiful Sonata, by Beethoven, (in E flat—the companion to the Moonlight Sonata); and Schumann's Andante and Variations for two pianos, were the finest. The first two Mr. Satter played admirably; in the third he was ably sustained by Mr. TIMM. His wonderful arrangement of the Tannhäuser Overture concluded the programme, and was far more satisfactory than Liszt's arrangement, for two pianos, of Les Préludes. All the defects and inequalities which, in Liszt's orchestral works, are glossed over by the richness and gorgeousness of the instrumentation, are painfully observable in the more meagre form of a piano arrangement. The only other instrumental piece was a Quintet, for piano, two cornets, horn, and baritone, by Mr. Satter, which, though excellently rendered, did not produce a very deep impression.

Mrs. BARCLAY, a lady with a pleasing mezzo-soprano voice, but very little school, who made her début in public during the past winter, sang Cherubini's Ave Maria, but seemed to be laboring under great nervousness, and, I should judge, hardly did herself justice. Mme. JOHANSEN took a more prominent part in the entertainment. She sang a couple of songs by Mr. Satter—one of them, "Bird in the forest," a pretty, humorous little thing, imitating the warble of various birds, but hardly appreciable by those of the audience who did not understand the words. Schubert's Barcarole Mme. Johansen sang exceedingly well, but I should advise her not to rely too much upon her own skill in accompaniment. She nearly spoiled the whole by a gross error in the piano part. There still remains to be mentioned the very satisfactory performance, by Mr. SCHREIBER, of Spohr's "Rose, wie bist du so reizend und mild," for cornet-a-piston. This gentleman is perfect master of his instrument, and the long drawn notes of the beautiful melody seemed just suited to the soft, mellow tones which he knows how to produce.

NEW YORK, APRIL 2.—Last week was almost destitute of musical novelties. The only feature was a rather deplorable one. A person, who advertised himself as a "new Spanish tenor" and bore the name of Señor ALSINA, gave a concert at Hope Chapel, assisted by two pianists and a violinist—all "youths to fortune and to fame unknown." The entertainment, I am told, was about on a par with the musical efforts of boarding-school misses, and the young men with pale faces, no-colored hair and tea-spoonful-amount-of-voice, which abound in every community.

WILLIAM H. FRY has written an overture. Mrs. Bateman has recently dramatized Longfellow's poem "Evangeline," for the purpose of giving her daughter Kate a good part in which to re-appear on the stage after several years' retirement. For this play Mr. Fry has written an overture, or rather an overture for the poem; for the lady dramatist has taken most startling liberties with the original, and makes the principal trials of Evangeline's life and her subsequent meeting with Gabriel at the hospital in Philadelphia only a dream, so that the play ends in the conventional happy lover style.

Now Mr. Fry's overture only expresses the poem in its originality. The first theme is for the cornet-a-piston; and is followed by a motive arranged as a duet for the flute and bassoon! Then there is a solo for violoncello, a strain for two horns, a long solo for violin (admirably played by Mr. Mollenhauer.) The overture closes without the customary allegro, and for that reason appears somewhat unsatisfactory and unfinished. Yet in closely adhering to the sentiment of the poem, the composer could have done nothing else. Had he followed the play, he could have ended with the expected climax. It is for this reason that the overture has not been a great success with the majority of those who heard it. It bears about the same relation to the conventional overture that a poetic recitation does to a drama.

Mr. Fry's Leonora—I believe the only one of his operas that has been played here—evinces much talent, and though the airs do not display much originality, the recitatives and bits of concerted pieces are effective. He has several other operas in manuscript which would be worth producing, from what I hear. At present Mr. Fry is so engrossed in politics that he pays no attention to music.

The "Chamber Concert Union" is giving a series of moderately successful soirées at Goldbeck's Music Hall, a snug little box of a room in Broadway. To give an idea of what is done at the concerts, I append a copy of the programme of the concert for to-morrow evening:

1. Trio in C minor, Op. 1. .... Beethoven.
S. B. Mills, Wm. Doehler and Ch. Bannes.
2. Mary's Dream, Song. .... Goldbeck.
Dr. Guilmette.
3. Fantasia on a Russian Air, (Flute). .... Heinemeyer.
Mr. Eben.
4. Scherzo Eroico. .... Goldbeck.
Robert Goldbeck and Wm. Doehler.
5. Pierre L'Ermite, Scène Dramatique. .... Membree.
Dr. Guilmette.
6. Campanella. Etude. .... List.
S. B. Mills.
7. Serenata, Op. 41, (Flute and Piano). .... Beethoven.
Mr. Eben and William Saar.

Next week we shall have the two opera troupes, which commence operations simultaneously, Maressek at the Winter Garden and Uimann at the Academy of Music. TREVATOR.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 3.—The performance of Flotow's Martha, last night, on the occasion of Uimann and Strakosch's rentrée at the Academy, was by no means such as might have been expected from the abilities of the individual artists of the troupe. There was a carelessness manifested in almost every portion of the charming music, which displayed a great want of respect for the audience. Imprimis: STRAKOSCH, who was the conductor, whether through a want of mental concentration upon the task before him, or through imperfect rehearsal, presided over the orchestra so unenergetically, that many portions of the accompaniment seemed like a grand scrub race, in which each of the contestants appeared laboring after a prescribed goal, by a special method of his own.

JUNCA, as Plunkett, sang fairly, but displayed such an utter lack of the vis comica, as to cause much surprise that he should ever undertake a rôle, which affords so much scope for pleasant points. His countenance seemed, throughout, like that of a solid Quaker, meditating over the curse of slavery, at an abolition meeting. Splendid looking son of Apollo, nevertheless—superb in all rôles demanding dignity and imposing presence!

BRIGNOLI treasured his power throughout the first two acts, for his pièce de résistance in the third—the M'appari, which lies in his best tones, and in which his Marta, Marta! gushes forth, as though his whole soul were gliding through his mouth into the hearts of his auditors. Of course, he made not the slightest attempt at a delineation of the character; so far from any mental conception of that, he was not even able to go successfully through the mechanical part of the spinning wheel scene.

Mme. STRAKOSCH is said to have been much out of her regular health, and her singing substantiates the truth of the rumor.

PATTI looked most charmingly, with a red mantle thrown over her little shoulders, a la Red Riding Hood. Her success here has been immense. I cannot help thinking that the rigorous demands of the management upon her services, must, if persisted in, wear her out, physically and musically, ere she shall have attained that status of art development, to which she certainly seems destined by her "natural gifts," (in the words of Hawkeye.) It seems to me that, even already, cavatinas which, a few months ago, seemed to flow as spontaneously from her pretty lips, as the spring from the mountain rock, now cost her physical exertion quite premature. If she be judiciously treated, her future reputation must become world-wide. The young men in shining patent leathers, who stand in the door ways of the Academy, in a blasé attitude, as though it was not worth their while to secure seats for that which is as familiar to them as their own billiard balls, throw to her an extensive assortment of bouquets, each night; a procedure which has placed Brignoli and a sensitive portion of the public in antagonistic positions. When the troupe was here in December of last year, the handsome tenor found himself, one crowded opera night, hissed with much malignity, from the neighborhood of the family circle, for the imaginary offence of refusing to stoop in his tights and pick up about a wheelbarrow load of bouquets, which a couple of young English lords, sojourning in this latitude at that time, had cast at her tiny feet. Then arose the most dire confusion—a storm of mingled plaudits and hisses, in which, however, the former far outweighed the latter. Tenor stood upon his dignity. On the following morning, the newspapers commented upon this bit of comedy—some of them berating the metallic-voiced singer in unmeasured terms, and others eulogizing his independence, on the score of European precedents, which, according to them, render it unnecessary for the artist to lower himself beyond the first bouquet. Indeed, this subject has been the theme of controversy in polite circles ever since. Last night the bouquets fell, as usual, in copious showers; Brignoli maintaining his first principles. An attempt was made to hiss him again—but the thundering storm of applause which rose above it, endorsed the action of the lackadaisical Brignoli, and settled, once for all, so far as the Quaker City is concerned, the absurdity of an attempt to convert a romantic tenor into a serving bouquet gleaner, to the imminent risk of his tights. Imagine Amodio stooping to pick up three score, or thereabout, of these votive offerings. MANRICO.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Opera, Der Freyschütz, by C. M. von WEBER, piano-forte arrangement, commencing with the Overture.

Mr. Kielblock's "Miles Standish."

It is not to be wondered at that Mr. FRANZ KIELBLOCK, a cultivated German musician, living in New Bedford, and among descendants of the pilgrims, a man of poetically sensitive nature, readily enamored of Longfellow's poem and its hero, full of the music of his fatherland and wont to see and feel things through a musical medium, unconsciously perhaps translating his experiences into tones,—should have been moved to make an opera of "Miles Standish." It was a bold task, and a formidable, for a beginner in large forms of composition; one in which few succeed, even with the public of a day; and in which the fewest of the few achieve a real success. Creative genius, marked, significant originality, is heaven's rarest gift. Yet one may properly indulge the impulse to produce, without imagining himself a Weber or a Mozart. The misfortune is that, leaving the final great rewards of genius out of the account (and they come usually quite tardily, after long outward failure), the other prizes (of immediate popular success), the "lucky hits," are much more apt to fall to coarser and more superficial talents, coupled with worldly enterprise, than to much finer powers, which feel, appreciate, aspire to what is highest, yet fall short of genius. The new composer of a new opera, therefore, necessarily meets a sceptical public; or rather does not meet it at all; used to hearing the world-famous works, the public waits to be pre-convinced of the excellence of a thing, before it troubles itself to go out and listen to it. At least this is true of a half-musical American public, which only trusts, and is only tempted by either that which is "classical" or that which is "popular." Mr. Kielblock, therefore, might well take it as encouraging that the great Music Hall was more than half filled, last Saturday evening, with eager and respectful listeners to the first necessarily imperfect trial of his work. Among these was a very large delegation from New Bedford, whose interest in the occasion speaks exceedingly well for the estimation in which Mr. K. is held among his familiar friends and neighbors. Most of the audience testified their gratification, as the work proceeded, by looks and frequent applause, even to the end of a three hours' performance.

The impression of the music suffered from two causes, extrinsic to itself. In the first place, what was written for the stage was given as a Cantata, which of course made much of the recitative tedious, and robbed the whole of vitalizing dramatic explanations and connections. In the next place, the libretto, however fine poetically (and much of it was in the very words of Longfellow's admirable poem), seemed not entirely plastic in the hands of music. Some sentences and phrases sounded very oddly; thus Priscilla's "Why don't you speak for yourself, John," though treated as well as it could be, perhaps, in the only possible form, that of Recitative, seems to lie entirely out of the sphere of music; and many other verses were too complete as word-thoughts, to require or not to lose by musical interpretation. Some of the songs, a prayer, &c., expressly written by the librettist, were much to the purpose.

On the part of the performers, the thing did not much suffer. On the contrary, they for the most part did themselves and the composer credit. Much is due to the earnest rehearsals under CARL ZERRAHN, who gave his heart and best skill to the work of conducting. In the lady who sang the part of Priscilla, (Mrs. LIZZIE HEYWOOD) we had the fresh sensation of a new soprano voice of uncommon purity and beauty, and great compass; besides a natural, refined, easy way of using it, although there may be room for schooling; but the part of the Puritan maiden was simply and expressively presented. Mr. ADAMS, tenor, sang of course sweetly, although with not great energy (how far due to the music and how far due to him we feel not sure), the part of John Alden. Miles Standish had a German for a representative, Herr WEINLICH, with a powerful bass voice and a good singer. But his German accent aggravated the awkwardness of some of the recitative. "A wonderful man was this same Julius Caesar" sounded oddly, whereas in the poem it is simply quaint and characteristic. Mr. GEORGE WRIGHT gave the parts of Elder Brewster and the Captain of the Mayflower passably. The chorus, of near 200 voices, was excellent. The orchestra, too, was well at home in its work.

And now for the composition. Of course we do not fully trust the impression of a single hearing. We should say it was pleasing, striking, even beautiful in parts, and those occurring pretty frequently; but that it seemed to lack central vitality, unity, proportion, and also directness, concentration, as a whole. There were many striking, beautiful beginnings which somehow ended in the vague, or in familiar sounding commonplaces, or seemed helplessly prolonged to tediousness. The most natural thing in the world, no doubt, with a first work. Equally natural was it that the music should seem to abound in reminiscences, should often sound exceedingly familiar. One writes of course, honestly, out of his own musical consciousness, his own musical life;—and how much that is made up of commingling vibrations of all the music one has heard and loved! Once in a while, very rarely, a positive original genius insinuates a new element of its own amid the reflected influences, and then we have a Beethoven, a Schubert, a Rossini. We cannot say the work contains no fresh ideas; at the same time we cannot say we felt the presence anywhere of a decided, new creative genius.

The work is melodious, flowing, smooth, for the most part, even to the point of seeming more Italian than German sometimes; or at least suggestive of that class of German composers, who are sometimes called Italian Germans,—the Lortzings, Flotows, Kückens, Abts, &c. Some of the concerted pieces, trios, &c., which were really pleasing and effective, struck us in this way. The best parts, to our ear, were the choruses; and those had so much life and vigor, that we could have wished one or two introduced nearer the beginning of the work. The chorus of sailors and people, opening the second part, was quite effective; and particularly the chorus: "Over the billows morning is dancing," interested by its buoyant, billowy rhythm.

There were not a few happy orchestral ideas. The first half of the overture, for instance, promised finely; the chorale strain by flutes and reeds alone, answered by the brass, making a good episode; but the last part seemed weak and common. The figurative accompaniment, where Priscilla is heard singing "Old Hundred" from within, was quite poetic, full of birds and blithe wood sounds. The agitated figure, too, kept up through the whole length of John Alden's first solo: "Must I relinquish," was suggestive of the tumult within, but grew monotonous by length. The orchestral introduction to the second part, scene by the sea shore, was striking, yet hardly continued so well as it began. One merit the work may claim, both in the instrumentation and the song parts, to-wit the absence of extravagances, of "new school" strainings after novelty by "o'erstepping the modesty of nature" and the bounds of Art. The worst sin seemed to lie in some indulgences in certain modern effects, which have grown to be commonplace, such as certain of the Verdi sort of dying harmonic cadences on the prolonged key-note (in the bass) after a period seems fairly ended.

Melodies of marked novelty or interest we cannot recall, although the work generally is melodious. The greatest fault however, of the opera, was excessive length, not merely as a whole, but length of almost every part, seeming as it were a chronic infirmity. It needs abridgement, concentration, pruning; especially for such undramatic mode of performance. The first of the three parts lasted more than an hour and a half, and it was a real refreshment when the chorus came in for the first time at the end of it. Miles Standish's first air: "Look at these arms," was long and wearisome, and empty. That could be spared, perhaps, to advantage. The tedium of the first part injured the impression of the second and third, which really seemed better written, more direct, sure, and to the purpose. Plainly the first part was overlabored; painfully and doubtfully worked out; the rest was written quickly and went more straightly to the mark. Here was skill gained upon the way, and this is certainly encouraging.

On the whole "Miles Standish" shows musical temperament and culture, a ready flow of ideas, whether original or not, a good deal of facility in the handling of instruments and voices, and poetic feeling and conception. Who has not heard many an opera, by idols of the day, that contained less to interest one or to be commended? But most of the popular operas, however false or trashy, show a certain dramatic skill and directness, which we shall fear that this new work wants, until we shall be convinced to the contrary by a performance on the stage. Mr. Kielblock has surely done himself no little credit; and we trust he will give the public a better opportunity to judge his effort, by producing it again in a somewhat abridged and condensed form.

CARL ZERRAHN.—We trust we do not need to remind any good music-lover of the Complimentary Concert to our excellent Conductor, which comes off in the Music Hall to-night. We shall say nothing of the public debt to him, which all acknowledge. But just look at the programme. Can we afford to lose a chance of hearing Beethoven's warm and love-inspired Fourth Symphony, and his great overture to Leonore; together with the Tannhäuser overture, the choice part-songs by the Orpheus Glee Club, and Mrs. HARWOOD's singing?

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The twenty-third concert, last Wednesday afternoon, offered the following selections, which a large audience appeared richly to enjoy:

1. Symphony. No. 9. (First time in this country.) Mozart.
2. Waltz. Die Flotten, (by request.) Lanner.
3. Overture. Uriel Acosta. Schindelmesser.
4. Cavatina, from Bellario. Donizetti.
Sung by Mr. C. R. Adams.
5. Polka. La Favorita. Strauss.
6. Soldier's Chorus. Prayer and Barcarole. From the North Star. Meyerbeer.
7. Galop. A Summer Night in Denmark. Lumbye.

The concert for next Wednesday is announced, we are sorry to say, as the last. Why not continue them indefinitely? Surely the public appetite has only grown with what it has fed on.

The Diarist Abroad.

BERLIN, FEB. 17. — Concert of LAUB, the violin virtuoso, aided by LIEBIG's orchestra, DRETSCHOCK, the pianist, and Fraulein HESSE, a young Swedish singer. Laub is certainly one of the greatest of violinists. In the general estimation he bore the palm completely away from Vieuxtemps, who had just been giving concerts in one of the theatres, not only in the character of the music he played, but in the execution, the deep feeling and beautiful tone of his playing. This evening the grand piece was Beethoven's Concerto, the others show pieces, among them a prelude by Bach, a sufficient proof that they were not mere show pieces. Of violinists whom I have heard but one is before him, Joachim. Even in this case, the difference—judging from recollections now of four years' standing—is one not of execution but of style; Joachim's style being of the grand and majestic order, Laub's of the more beautiful and elegant. Hence, on the whole, I had rather hear Joachim play the Concerto, because his conception of it happens to please my taste more; others would prefer Laub's. A small, quiet, unpretending man is Laub, full of music and transfusing all he plays with his own feeling; his tone delicious, his execution wonderful; in all respects a greater player than I have ever heard in America. He has had offers to induce him to come to America, but none of them were such as he could accept without positive loss, since a few months in Russia and Holland are worth more to him than has been offered for a year in our country.

Feb. 25. I hear from Leipzig that several American students, among them a young lady, have withdrawn from the Conservatory, choosing the loss of the tuition (which they have paid for a year in advance) rather than to remain connected with the institution. I can of course record no ex parte statement of the questions at issue, cannot decide as to the wisdom and propriety of the step which they have taken; but, granting the facts as represented to me, without hearing what the directors have to reply, it is their wisest course. Certainly grave charges are made, and such that no American student should come there to the school, especially a young lady, without ample inquiry made and a satisfactory answer received.

My personal observations in Leipzig four or five years ago led me to the views several times expressed in Dwight's Journal, that a young man or woman, who has already made considerable progress in music, would do better in all respects to make Berlin his or her place of study; while for quite young students, those who are at the early stages, the Conservatorium is the place—and this on the general ground of the advantages of pursuing a general course of study in a school with a corps of teachers over private instruction; just as I would have a young man in a law school a few terms before going into an office, so I would have a beginner in music in a music school at first. I wish, for the benefit of the many young men and women at home, who think of coming abroad to study music, that some one or more of those interested, would give the Journal the facts in the case, or at all events their statement, and thus give the other side an opportunity to reply if thought worth the while. For any young man or woman, who leaves home to go away three thousand miles and spend ten or twelve hundred dollars and two or three years' time, the question is one of grave importance.

March 4. In leaving Berlin a note is proper as to what our American musical students are doing. FAINE is still at work perfecting himself in organ playing and composition. Howe, of Brookfield, Mass., after overcoming the evils of acclimating himself to wet, gloomy, disagreeable winter weather, is taking up the organ with the energy which promises success; and PEASE, of Cleveland, O., is making rapid and excellent progress, I learn, in mastering the pianoforte. These are all the musical students, whom I saw, but I believe the number is to be increased in the course of the spring. A. W. T.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

LEIPZIG.—The operas performed in the month of January were: Santa Chiara, by the Duke of Gotha; "Merry wives of Windsor," Nicolai; "Jewess," Halevy; Zauberflöte, Mozart; Prophète, Meyerbeer; Freyshütz, Weber; Der Tempel und die Jüdin, Marschner; the "Vale of Andorra," Halevy; La Dame Blanche, Boieldieu; Belmonte und Constantza, Mozart; Don Juan, Mozart; Undine, Lortzing;—in all 12 operas in 12 performances.

Mme. Bürde-Ney sang at the 12th Gewandhaus concert a scena and aria by Beethoven, and Mendelssohn's Lorelei finale. The orchestral pieces were the overtures to Leonore (Beethoven) and to the story of "the fair Melusina" (Mendelssohn), and Schumann's first symphony (in B flat); also a concert piece for chorus and orchestra, called Frühlings-Botschaft (Message of Spring), by Gade.

In the 14th concert the selections were: Symphony No. 12, Haydn; Adagio and Rondo from Chopin's E minor Concerto, played by Fräulein Jenny Herling; Overture, Scherzo and Finale, by Schumann; Symphony, No. 4, Beethoven.—In the 15th Concert: overture (op. 115), Beethoven; Recitative and Aria from Carafa's Val de Chambre, and Schubert's Wanderer, by Herr Julius Stieckhausen; Spohr's 9th violin Concerto, by Herr Lauterbach, from Munich; Songs, by Robert Schumann; and Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony.

BERLIN.—At the last symphony concert of the Royal band, the music to Orpheus was performed. Notwithstanding the favorable manner in which it was received, I cannot call the choice judicious. Gluck's music is always beautiful, but the scenic effects are absolutely necessary. Those who had often heard the work within the same walls in its entirety, could not feel perfectly satisfied with the result. The whole opera would, I presume, have been given, were Mdle. Johanna Wagner not temporarily incapacitated from taking her rôle. The other pieces were Mendelssohn's magnificent overture to Ruy Blas, and Beethoven's second symphony. It need scarcely be added that everything was superbly executed. With such a band, and Taubert at its head, it could not well be otherwise.

The Dom-Chor has been giving three extra soirees, which have only served to strengthen my opinion as to the incomparable excellence of this renowned body of choristers. The chief director (Neithardt) is suffering from severe indisposition, and the choir may flatter itself that its second director (Herr von Herzberg) is no unworthy substitute. The following was the programme of the last concert:—

1. Gloria. . . . . Palestrina.
2. Crucifixus. . . . . Palestrina.
3. Agnus Dei. . . . . Caldara.

4. Sonata, Op. 29, G major. . . . . Beethoven.
 5. Requiem Aeternam. . . . . Nre. Jonell.
 6. Motet. . . . . J. S. Bach.
 7. Chorus. . . . . Melchior Frank.
 8. Motet. . . . . Schicht.
 9. Sonata, Op. 70 (Le Retour à Paris). . . . . Dusek.
 10. Ave Verum. . . . . Mozart.

A young composer had just been introduced to the public, whose future career, if rumor is to be credited, will be worth looking to. He is called Heinrich Bellerman, son of the professor of that name. He directed a number of his own compositions in the Sing-Akademie, the chief of which was a setting of Goethe's Mahomed.

More important for the musical world, however, than Bellerman's production, is Herr Blumer's new oratorio, Abraham, which was performed, for the first time, on Thursday last, and which is to be repeated this evening. A detailed account of the performance we must postpone till our next, and will dismiss it now by saying, that it has been unusually well received; in fact the critics are unanimous in its praise.

At the Royal Opera nothing new. Graf Redern's Christine was, however, given on Sunday, for the third time, with the substitution of Madame Köster for Mdle. Wagner as the heroine. The change has given great satisfaction; and will in all probability save the opera from a doom we most sincerely believe it does not deserve. At the Victoria Theatre, Mdle. Artot continues to attract full houses. Il Barbiere has given place to Rigoletto, in which Signor Carrion is very effective. There is a sad want of good male singers at the opera, particularly of tenors and basses.—Corr. London Musical World, March 8.

VIENNA.—Two main stays of sound musical taste in this city are the "Philharmonic Concerts," and "Hellmesberger's Quartet Soirées." The latter are said to be models in their kind, both in selections and in execution. The Philharmonic Concerts are given by the orchestra of the opera under Carl Eckert's direction. Their selections have been mainly from well-known classical works, as symphonies of Mozart, Mendelssohn, and especially Beethoven. But Schumann, says the Signale, is the name of greatest musical influence in Vienna.—Schumann, who 20 years ago was only known there as the husband of the wonderful pianiste Clara Wieck. The programme of the third Philharmonic Concert contained Schumann's Overture, Scherzo and Rondo, op. 52; and Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony. Something from Handel was to be given the next time.

Clara Schumann gave three subscription concerts here in March. She is still as uncompromising as ever in the classical purity of her programmes. On the first evening she played her husband's D minor Trio (with Herren Hellmesberger and Röver); Beethoven's Sonata in C, op. 53; and R. Schumann's series of little pieces called the Carnaval (Scènes mignonnes). The intervals were filled up by songs of Schubert and Schumann, sung by Fräulein Krauss.

In the third of Herbeck's "Gesellschafts-Concerts," Liszt's Prometheus Symphony provoked a warm battle between the clappers and the hissers. The most opposite thing possible, Mozart's G minor Symphony, was placed in the same programme. . . . Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was soon to be brought out at the Court theatre.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE was to open with Italian Opera on the 10th of April. These are the attractions held up in the manager's prospectus:

ENGAGEMENTS.—Mdle. Piccolomini (her farewell nights previous to her final retirement from the stage). Mdle. Vaneri, Madame Laura Baxter, Mdle. Maria Brunetti (from the Grand Opera Paris, her first appearance in this country), and Madame Alboni; Mdle. Lotti della Santa (her first appearance at Her Majesty's Theatre), Mdle. Dell'Anese, Mdle. Nardi, and Madame Maria Cabel (Prima Donna of the Opera Comique, Paris); Madame Borghi Mamo (her first appearance in this country,) and Mdle. Titiens; Signor Mongini, Signor Belart, Signor Corsi, Signor Mercuriali, Signor Soldi, Signor Giuglini, Signor Everardi (of the Imperial Italian Operas of Vienna and St. Petersburg, his first appearance in this country), Signor Aldighieri, Signor Fellar, (his first appearance,) and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi, (of the Regio, Turin, La Pergola, Florence, &c.); Signor Gossier, Signor Castelli, and Signor Violetti. Directors of the music, Composers and Conductors—Mr. Benedict and Signor Ardit. Principal Violins—Herr Molique, and Mr. Henry Blagrove. Leader of the Ballet—Signor Bolilli (Musical Director for the Theatre Bologna.) The Military Band of the Grenadier Guards, under the direction of Mr. D. Godfrey. Suggestore—Signor Fontana. Regisseur—Signor Grus. The carefully selected and highly trained Chorus under the direction of Signor Vaschetti. The Corps de Ballet will include several additions from the continental theatres.

It is the intention of the management to produce during the season the following:—Weber's grand romantic opera of Oberon, which has been for a long time in active preparation, and will be produced on a scale and with a completeness worthy of this great work. The minor as well as the principal parts will be effectively filled. The scenery and dresses are being prepared with great care, and will present features of special interest. The whole will be produced under the immediate superintendence of J. R. Planché, Esq., Author of the Libretto, by whom several changes and modifications have been made, while the whole of the original music has been carefully preserved. The recitative expressly arranged by M. Benedict, pupil of the composer of this great work. Beethoven's Fidelio, Leonora, Mdle. Titiens. A new and original opera by Maestro Campana, in which Mdle. Piccolomini will appear. Rossini's opera of Otello.—In consequence of the enthusiastic reception accorded to Mme. Borghi Mamo, at the Italian Opera in Paris, the above opera will be produced early in the season, with the following cast:—Otello, Signor Mongini; Rodrigo, Signor Corso; Elmiro, Signor Vialetti; Iago, Signor Everardi; Desdemona, Mme. Borghi Mamo. And about the middle of May, Rossini's Semiramide, with the following powerful cast:—Semiramide, Mdle. Titiens (her first appearance in that character); Arsace, Madame Alboni (her first appearance this season); Idreno, Signor Belart; Oreo, Signor Vialetti; and Assur, Signor Everardi. Mozart's Le Nozze di Figaro, with an unprecedented cast. Also Weber's opera of Der Freischütz, in which Signor Mongini and Mdle. Titiens will sustain the principal characters. Mdle. Brunetti will arrive at the end of April, and make her first appearance at the early part of May, in Verdi's opera of Rigoletto. Madame Alboni will make her first appearance about the middle of May, as Arsace in Semiramide. Mdle. Titiens will appear on the opening night Tuesday, April 10, in conjunction with Signor Giuglini. Madame Borghi Mamo will make her first appearance in this country on Thursday, April 12, as Leonora, in La Favorite. Madame Marie Cabel (from the Imperial Opera Comique, Paris,) will appear during the season in several of her favorite characters. The season will commence on Tuesday, April 10, when will be performed (for the first time at this theatre) Flotow's admired opera of Martha. Lionello, Signor Giuglini (his first appearance this season); Plumkett, Signor Vialetti; Lord Triestino, Signor Sebastian Ronconi; Nancy, Mdle. Vaneri; Lady Henrietta, Mdle. Titiens (her first appearance this season). On Thursday, April 12th, La Favorite. Fernando, Signor Giuglini; Alfonso, Signor Everardi (his first appearance); Baldassare, Signor Vialetti; Leonora, Mdle. Borghi Mamo (her first appearance). On Saturday, 14th April, will be performed Verdi's opera of Il Trovatore, Manrico, Signor Giuglini; Ferrando, [Signor Vialetti]; Conte di Luna, Signor Aldighieri; Azucena, Madame Borghi Mamo; Leonora, Mdle. Titiens.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA.—The season closed with March, and with continued success of Lurline. In a valedictory address of the managers (Louisa Pyne and Wm. Harrison) their achievements are summed up as follows:

"In three seasons we have produced four English operas and one operetta by native composers, namely—The Rose of Castille and Satanella, by Mr. Balfe; Victorine, by Mr. Alfred Mellon; Romance, by Mr. Henry Leslie; and Lurline, by Mr. Vincent Wallace. Also Martha and Dinorah, and a répertoire to whose merits the public approbation has been the best test.

"Again we request English composers, who have works complete, or in a state of preparation, to acquaint us with the same, in order that we may make our arrangements accordingly.

"We have been the means of introducing to the English operatic stage the following English artists: Miss Parepa, Miss Corelli, Miss Pilling, Miss Thirlwall, Miss Fanny Cruise, Mr. Santley, Mr. Ferdinand and Glover (an artist whose love we much deplore), Mr. Patey, Mr. Grattan Kelly, Mr. Wallworth, Mr. Honey, &c., &c. During the three seasons we have expended, for artists, authors, rent, &c., the sum of £79,788.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Though I sing. (Tra la la.) Gordigiani. 25

One of Gordigiani's popular Neapolitan Songs, one of the songs that is heard sung and hummed in the streets of gay and sunny Naples, full of life and mirth.

The Flowers. Ballad. Sücher. 25

Adapted to the beautiful melody of "Loreley." Very easy.

God bless the sailor on the sea. B. Covert. 25

Will have a large sale, like the same author's fine song, "Jangle's on the stormy sea."

This heart of mine. (Das arme Herz) Reichardt. 25

A gem. This is a song of that class which Stigall renders so finely.

On the mountain's airy summit. Kücken. 25

A joyous melody after the Tyrolean pattern, for voices of moderate compass. Will do for very young beginners.

By the banks of the Genesee river. Song and chorus. R. S. Taylor. 25

A good minstrel song with an effective chorus.

Across there at the window. Song with Violoncello (or Flute or Violin or Cornet) obligato. Mähring. 25

A charming little song, first introduced by Mrs. Harwood at Mr. Kieberg's concert a fortnight ago, and repeated by her to-night at Zerrahn's benefit. Just the thing to delight everybody. Easy for voice and instruments.

Instrumental Music.

Victory Polka. J. Wright. 10

Reminiscences militaires. Polka brillante. C. W. Sanderson. 25

Marion Polka. L. O. Emerson. 25

Le Billet doux Polka Masurka. H. Prince. 50

Come into the garden, Mand. Transcription. Brinley Richards. 40

A charming arrangement of Balfe's popular song, which has met with as much favor in England as the song itself.

Books.

THE NEW GERMANIA. A collection of the most favorite Operatic Airs, Marches, Polkas, Waltzes, Quadrilles, and Melodies of the day. Arranged in an easy and familiar style for four, five, and six instruments. By B. A. Burditt. 1,25

A very desirable collection of instrumental music; one that the musical community have long required, and one for which the thousands of small bands and amateur clubs throughout the country will be very thankful. The Melodies are of that class which the great mass of the people, both as performers and listeners, at once adopt as their own and stamp as "favorites." They are very finely arranged, and, as the title indicates, in a style easy, familiar and acceptable to all. Mr. Burditt has been long and favorably known as the leader of one of the best Bands in this city, and as a composer and arranger of this class of music. His long experience has enabled him to determine correctly as to what was wanted in a collection of this kind, and how it was wanted; he has therefore acted understandingly in the preparation of this volume.

MUSIC A LANGUAGE. — SONATA IN E FLAT BY BEETHOVEN.

My Dear Friend,—In my last letter to you I made the statement, that music, though speaking to our feelings directly, without the aid of the understanding, and in its expression not necessarily following a logical order, (as shown in the G major Sonata, op. 14, No. 2), may yet depict emotions in an order so logical, that the understanding may reduce them to words. Such works present the closest union of the feelings and the understanding, and by thus summing up the principal and ruling powers in the nature of man, show us the Art of Music in its highest and ultimate development.

Such a work we have in the E flat major Sonata, op. 81, by Beethoven, which he entitled "Les Adieux, l'Absence et le Retour." The origin of it, or rather the time and ruling events in Beethoven's life leading to it, are not known to me. But the meaning is nevertheless clear, though we are not able to prove how the work was rooted in Beethoven's life. A speedy publication of his life, for which the "Diarist" has been collecting materials so long and with so much indefatigable zeal might help us to find out its connection with Beethoven's own experience. Fortunately we do not need such an explanation. The poet speaks to us in Nature's own tones, unmistakeably; and our sympathy as well as our understanding are equally interested in the development of the beautiful work.

The Sonata opens with a thoughtful Adagio, two-four time, E flat major, which is the Introduction. Its first two measures contain the principal motives of the first and second movements of the Sonata. The first three tones (in the intervals of a Third, a Fifth, and a Sixth) are the music to the title of the movement: "Lebewohl," fare thee well. This motive we shall meet frequently in all the various gradations from loving tenderness to bitter anguish. M 2 in inversion we shall find again as the principal motive of movement two. This introduction, beginning cheerfully, immediately changes to plaintive questions, as if the loving woman were asking: "Must you go; can not you stay with me here, where arms of love embrace you?" It closes pianissimo.

You may remember an engraving, representing a young wife tying the white ribbon around the arm of her Huguenot husband, who is about leaving her, never to return. There you have these 16 measures represented by the hand of the painter. It is the same sad, loving face, tenderly looking up to the man of her heart; our poet made it speak her love and anguish.

In the first two measures the Allegro, 2-2 time, bursts forth in bitter grief, calmed down in trusting and loving chords in m 3 and 4. Measures

5-15 express the loving emotions, that chase away that first grief, which however, is to return presently. M. 16-18 lead to a mournful duet of the lovers which in both parts repeats the motive first of the introduction, changing in m 30-33 to assuring tenderness. Half in grief and half in love m 34-41 represent the mixed feeling so natural at parting, and in m 42-49 the part closes, followed in 50-53 by that first motive leading back to the beginning. After the repetition follows the second part, m 54-95, which is shorter than usual, and, like the second part of the last movement, quiet instead of being full of motion and increased life. The reason is obvious. With artistic taste and true to nature the poet here represents the height of grief, as in the last movement the sum of bliss, both of which are silent, by soft, sweet sighs, and by happiest, tenderest forgetfulness of self in the embrace of each other in the last movement. Hence the character and size of the second parts of both movements. Thus this second part consists of the first motive accompanied by the second, which in the Introduction and in the second movement is so expressive of grief and sorrow, mostly on diminished seventh chords. Only in measures 74 and 76 the Soprano sighs out a sweet lament, and in 77-79, diminishing from a forte, the single assuring phrase in this part occurs, similar to m 1-4. The rest to m 93 is grief, sighing, almost sobbing. After two leading over measures the third part repeats the first to m 147 entire, and in m 148-166 the m 1-11 of the same part come in again, when they are followed by the Coda m 167-241. The violence, the bitterness, the desolation of grief are yet moderated, and so represented in this movement, by the presence of the departing friend. And the painful emotions are charmed away by the hope of his return. He is not going to leave forever; these eyes shall yet rest on his beloved face, these arms shall yet embrace the dear form, this heart yet beat against the heart of the returning friend. And so sweet hope mingles with the parting "Lebewohl," fare thee well. This the Coda says, when that first motive is accompanied by cheerful, loving runs now in the bass, now in the treble. The pen despairs of describing all the shades of feeling, which the music sings out in most perfect truthfulness. Not even the inspired poet were able to fill us with those emotions, which the tones excite in every sympathetic heart. And thus, without attempting any further description, I leave it to you, my dear friend, to feel the love and the sorrow, the doubts and the assurance, which the tone-poet sings out in sweetest tones, and which will wake an echo in your own bosom. I remark in conclusion, that Beethoven with perfect consciousness and fitness, makes strange chords mingle, as those farewells mingle in one accent though uttered by two voices. You will at once see these Dominant and Tonic chords sounding together in m 18-20. Critics (they severely remarked of course on this violation of harmonic laws, when the work was first published) do not always feel the truth of nature. The feeling, sympathetic heart does.

It would be equally useless to attempt a description of the second movement of the Sonata, headed, "Die Abwesenheit (l'Absence)," Andante espressivo, C minor, 2-4 time. It is not even necessary to state the two elements that make up the movement, utter desolation of grief and tenderest, most loving remembrance of the absent friend. The meaning is obvious. And yet it takes a heart well skilled in bearing ill, a heart that had to suffer bitterest anguish at the hands of Fate, a heart rich in experience and in sorrows, to feel all the grief, all the love, that speak to us in this movement. Alas! he had suffered much himself. Alone, with his soul burning with love for a being, he might call his own; alone, after he had loved so deeply and tenderly, with no one to share his joys, to bear his troubles with him: a lonely man and well versed in sorrows, he might write such a lay. Here is a counterpart to his "Adelaide" or to the Allegretto from the eighth Symphony. In m 1-36 those contrasting emotions are described. The principal motive of the movement fills the m 37-42.

These last six measures lead over without a stop to the last movement entitled "Das Wiedersehen (Le Retour)" in 6-8 time, Vivacissimamente in E flat major. An introduction m 1-10 ascending and descending on the Dominant-seventh chord in quickest, impetuous runs fitly represents the whirl of an overwhelming joy at meeting again. A simple motive of three notes alternating on a few chords, now sung by the Soprano, then by the Basso, the latter accompanied by a graceful figure in the Soprano in m 11-28 and runs on the Tonic and Dominant chords in m 29-36 picture the loving joyous emotions of the re-united couple. Short tones on two chords m, 37-44, much like joy too full for coherent speech, represent the feeling naturally following the first outburst of blissful happiness, that namely of half doubtful, half assured certainty. "Is it you, yourself again?" they seem to ask. As if sobbing with very bliss, the Soprano in short and tender cries accompanies the same chords in m 45-52. Here a melody of simplest structure, counting two measures only, enters, which represents the feeling of being one-in-one again, sweetly, dreamily. It is a duetto, the voices proceeding in contrary motion, and is accompanied by a trill in the middle in m 53-56. A cadence on quick runs m 57-60, leads to the same sweet melody m 61-64, followed by the same cadence, this time in the basso, and is succeeded by a phrase calling back the tender longings of the time of separation most feelingly, m 69-72. Four measures, melody and harmony the same as in those sweet measures 84 and 85 from "Adelaide," on the words: "One day, O wonder, on my grave a flower will spring from the ashes of my heart," follow, an expression naturally of the same loving emotions; and in m 77-81 strong runs form a satisfactory close to the first part.

The second part of necessity assumes a more quiet character, since the first and third parts of this movement are so full of motion. It begins in m 83—88 with similar doubts and reassurance, as we found in m 37—44 of the first part, leading over in a most simple and loving succession of chords m 89—94 to the same sweet melody we found in the first part m 53—56. In m 104—110 the second part closes and is followed by the third, which in more animated treatment repeats all of the first part to m 177. In this m the Coda begins poco Andante, repeating in m 177—185 the motive of m 11 in various harmonic changes, simple and in loving thirds; m 186—191 bring a variation on the same motive. It is a thoughtful, blissful reverie as it were; and lovingly, as if a symbol of the happy reunion, in contrary motion, yearning for each other, the chords ascending and descending towards each other in thirds and fourths pause on the dominant-seventh in 191 poco ritardando, whence in the original quick tempo the piece comes to a happy close in m 197.

Here we have a poem of the most perfect truthfulness to nature, in noblest expression describing a succession of emotions as they necessarily follow and derive from, one another. So two hearts feel in actual life at parting, in separation and on their blissful reunion again. There is a psychological necessity in the succession of those feelings; and this series may be represented in words or it may form a subject for the brush of the artist or the chisel of the sculptor.

This work is one of those, as I said at the beginning of the letter, that show us the two sides of the nature of man, sentiment and understanding in closest transubstantiation, in oneness; one of those boundary stones of the Art, to overstep which is impossible.

I might have chosen for illustration almost any of the Quatuors of Haydn and one of the last by Beethoven; or a Symphony by Mozart, such as for instance the lovely first, contrasting it with the third or fifth or seventh or ninth of Beethoven. But not knowing whether they would be as accessible to you as these Sonatas, I made them serve my purpose.

In the next letter we may try to find the elementary forms made use of to express a sentiment, and speak of the manner in which to find them, to make them apparent to the eye and through it to the understanding. Meanwhile I am, as ever, your friend,

G. A. SCHMITT.

Review of Marx's Beethoven.

Ludwig van Beethoven. Leben und Schaffen. Herausgegeben von Adolph Bernhard Marx. 2 vols. 8vo. Berlin, 1859. pp. 379, 389.

Beethoven died March 26, 1827, and thirty years passed away without any satisfactory biography of him. The notices and anecdotes of Seyfried, (1832,) Wegeler, and Ries, (1838,) the somewhat more extended sketch by Schindler, (1840, second edition 1845,) and what in various forms, often of very doubtful veracity, appeared from time to time in periodical publications, musical and other, remained the only sources of information respecting the great master, and the history of his works, available to the public, even the German public. Wegeler's "Notizen" are indispensable for the early history of the composer; Schindler's "Biographie," for that of his later years. Careful scrutiny has failed to detect any important error in the statements of the former, or in those of the latter, where he professedly speaks from personal knowledge. Schindler is one of the best-abused men in Germany,—perhaps has given sufficient occasion for it,—but we must bear this testimony to the value of his work, unsatisfactory as it is. Seyfried and Ries give little more than personal reminiscences of a period ending some twenty-five or thirty years before they wrote. The one is always careless; the other died too suddenly to give his hastily written anecdotes revision. Both must be corrected (as they may easily be, but have not yet been) by contemporaneous authorities. Their errors are constantly repeated in the biographical articles upon Beethoven which we find in the Encyclopædias, with one exception, the article in the "New American," published by the Appletons.

A life of Beethoven, founded upon a careful digest of these writers, combined with the materials scattered through other publications,—even though no original researches were made,—was still a desideratum, when the very remarkable work upon Mozart, by the Russian, Alexander Oulibichef, appeared, and aroused a singular excitement in the German musical circles through the real or supposed injustice towards Beethoven into which the hero-worship of the author had led him. We had hoped that now some one of the great master's countrymen would give us something worthy of him; but the excitement expended itself in pamphlets and articles in periodicals, in which as little was done for Beethoven's history as was effected against the views of Oulibichef.

Another Russian, however, Wilhelm von Lenz, came to the rescue in two works,—"Beethoven et ses trois Styles," (2 vols. 8vo. St. Petersburg, 1852,) and "Beethoven, eine Kunststudie," (2 vols. 12mo. Cassel, 1855). A very feeble champion, this Herr von Lenz. The first of his two works—in French, rather of the Stratford-at-Bow order,—consists principally of an "Analyse des Sonates de Piano" of Beethoven, in which these works are indeed much talked about, but not analyzed. The author, an amateur, has plenty of zeal, but unluckily, neither the musical knowledge nor the critical skill for his self-imposed task. We mention this book only because the second volume closes with a "Catalogue critique, chronologique, et anecdotique," in which the author has, with great industry and care, and for the first time, brought together the principal historical notices of Beethoven's works, scattered through the pages of the books above noticed and the fifty quarto volumes of the "Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung."

The first volume of "Beethoven, eine Kunststudie" is a "Leben des Meisters," a mere sketch, made up from the same works as the "Catalogue," with a very few additions from other sources. As a biographer, Lenz fails as signally as in his capacity of critic. Much original matter, from one living so far away, was not to be expected; but he has made no commendable use of the printed authorities which he had at hand. His style is bombastic and feeble; there is neither a logical nor a chronological progress to his narrative; moreover, he is not always trustworthy, even in matters personal to himself;—at all events, a very interesting account of a meeting between him and Mendelssohn, at the house of Moscheles in London,—apropos of nothing,—has called out a letter from the latter in a Leipzig musical journal, in which the whole story is declared to be without foundation. In our references to Lenz, we shall consider his "Catalogue" and his "Leben des Meisters" as complements to each other, and forming a single work.

Lenz's "Beethoven et ses trois Styles" was avowedly directed against Oulibichef, and called out a reply from that gentleman, with the title, "Beethoven, ses Critiques et ses Glossateurs," (8vo. Paris and Leipzig, 1857,) in which poor Lenz is annihilated, but which makes no pretensions to biographical value. It contains, indeed, a sketch of the master's life; it is but a sketch, so highly colored, such a mere painting of Beethoven as he existed in the author's fancy,—not in real life,—as to convey a most false idea of him and of his fortunes. The introduction is an admirable sketch of the progress of music during the first twenty-five years of the present century,—a supplement to his famous view of modern music in his work upon Mozart. His analyses of such of Beethoven's works as met his approbation are masterly and unrivalled, save by certain articles from the pens of Hoffmann and our own writer Dwight. With the later works of the composer Oulibichef had no sympathy. Haydn and Mozart had given him his standards of perfection. We can forgive Beethoven, when at times he rises above all forms and rules in seeking new means of expression; Oulibichef could not.

But it is not endless discussions of Beethoven's works which the public—at all events, our public—demands. We wish his biography,—the history of his life. What has been given us does but whet the appetite. We wish to have the many original sources, still sealed to us, explored, and the results of this labor honestly given us. None of the writers above-mentioned have been in a position to do this, and their publications are but materials for the use of the true biographer, when he shall appear.

It was therefore with a pleasure as great as it was unexpected, that we saw, some months since, the announcement of the volumes named at the head of this article. They now lie before us. We have given them a very careful examination, and shall now endeavor to do them full justice, granting them much more space than has yet been accorded to them in any German publication which has come under our notice, because out of Germany the reputation of the author is far greater than at home,—whether upon the old principle, that the "prophet is not without honor," etc., we hope hereafter to make clear.

Some particulars respecting Dr. Marx may find place here, as proving that from no man, perhaps, have we the right to expect so much, in a biography of Beethoven, as from him. We draw them mostly from Schilling's "Encyclopædie der gesammten musikalischen Wissenschaft," Vol. IV., Stuttgart, 1841,—a work which deserves to be better known in our country. It is worthy of note, that in this work, of which Mozart fills eight pages, Handel, Bach, Haydn, and Beethoven seven to seven and a half each, Gluck six and a quarter, Meyerbeer four, and Weber four and a half, Marx, eighteen years since, occupied five.

Adolph Bernhard Marx was born at Halle, Nov. 17, 1799, and, like so many of the distinguished musicians of recent times, is of Jewish descent. He studied at the University of his native city, choosing the law for his profession, but making music the occupation of his leisure hours,—the well-known contrapuntist, Türk, being his instructor in musical theory and composition. "He [Türk] soon saw whom he had before him, and told Marx at once that he was born to be a musician."*

Soon after finishing his legal studies, Marx removed to Berlin, as the place where he could best enjoy the means of artistic culture. "For one quite without fortune, merely to live in a strange city demands great strength of character; but to go farther and fit one's self for a career and for a position in the future, which even under the best auspices is of very difficult attainment, and beside all this, to have others dependent upon him for the necessities of life,—what a burden to bear! . . . By a very intellectual system of instruction in singing and in composition, and, at a later period (1824—31,) by editing the 'Berliner Allgemeine Musik-zeitung,' and several theoretical and practical musical works, he earned the means of subsistence. Never was a periodical more conscientiously edited. It was for Marx like an official station, and his seven years upon that paper were in fact a preparation for the position of Public Teacher, to which in 1830 he was appointed, in the University at Berlin, after having declined a judicial position offered to him, with a fair salary, in one of the provinces. Honorably has he since that period filled his station, however great the pains which have been taken in various quarters that it should not be said of him, 'Virtus post nummos!'"**

"The diploma of Doctor of Music Marx received from the University at Marburg; and thereupon (?) obtained the greatest applause for a course of lectures, in part strictly scientific for the musician, and in part upon the history of music, its philosophy, etc.; also, as Music-Director of the University, he has brought (1841) the academic choir into such a flourishing state, both as to numbers and skill, as to be adequate to the most difficult music."†

Again we read,—"We remember, that, some time since, Fétis, at Paris, pointed out Marx as the one who had introduced the philosophy of Kant into music." Were this so, so much the more credit to Marx, who, at that time, we are informed, had never studied the works of the philosopher of Königsberg, and his basing music upon the Kantian philosophy is therefore but a proof of the profundity of his genius.

From the same article we extract the following list of his productions:—1. A work on Singing, in three parts; the second and third of which "contain throughout admirable and novel remarks." 2. "Maigrass" (Maygreeting). "This pamphlet, humorous and delicate, yet powerfully written," calls attention to certain novel views of its author in regard to music. 3. Articles in the "Cécilia," a musical periodical. 4. Essay on Handel's works. 5. A work on Composition. 6. Several biographies and other articles in Schilling's Encyclopædia,—indeed, all the articles signed A. B. M." 7. Editions of several of Bach's and Handel's works. To these we may now add his extensive treatise upon Musical Science, in four volumes, his "Music in the Nineteenth Century," and the work which is now before us.

*Article in Schilling.

†Ibid.

Of musical compositions we find the following noticed:—1. Music to Goethe's "Jery und Bätely,"—which, in theatrical parlance, was shockingly damméd;—but then "its author had made many enemies as editor of the 'Musikalische Zeitung,' and the singers and actors embraced this opportunity of revenge." 2. Music to the melodrama, "Die Rache wartet," (Vengeance waits,) by Willibald Alexis, the scenes of which are laid in Poland at the time of Napoleon's fatal Russian expedition. "This background was the theme of the music, which consisted of a little more than the overture and entr'actes, but was held by musicians of note to be both grand and profound. The character of the campaign of 1812, especially, was given in the overture with terrible truth of expression. Still, however, the work did not succeed." 3. "Undine's Greeting," text by Fouqué, with a festive symphony, composed on the occasion of the marriage of the present Prince Regent of Prussia. This was also damned,—but then, it was badly executed! 4. Symphony,—"The Fall of Warsaw,"—still manuscript. "The music paints most touchingly the rash, superficial, chivalrous character of the Poles, their love of freedom amid the thunder of cannon, their terrible fall in the bloody defeat, their solitary condition on strange soil, the awful judgment that fell upon that people." We are sorry to add, that the Berlin orchestras will not play this work,—preferring Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven. 5. A Choral and Organ Book,—"one of Marx's most interesting works." 6. "Nahib,"—a series of songs, the music of which "is gentle, tender, and full of Oriental feeling." 7. "John the Baptist," an oratorio,—twice performed by the University choir in one of the churches of Berlin. "A great charm is found in the peculiar sharpness of characterization which distinguishes this music. The solos and choruses, being held throughout in spirited declamation,—the music not being aggravated in conventional tone-masses, but developed vigorously after the sense of the text,—are distinguished from those in the works of recent composers." Unfortunately for Marx, the public preferred the solos and choruses of such recent composers as Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, and Schumann to his. A few songs and hymns completed the list of his works at that time.

"At present," (1841,) says our authority, "Marx is laboring upon an oratorio, 'Moses,' for which he long since made studies, and which in its profound conception of character will have but few equals."

The "Moses" was long since finished, and was performed in several places; but the public has not proved alive to its merits, and it fares no better than did Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in its nonage.

We have perhaps quoted somewhat too largely from the article in Schilling; but have thought so much necessary to give the reader the basis of the great reputation which Marx has, particularly in England and the United States;—for, singular as the fact may appear, we are unable to recall the name of any young composer who has appeared and gained any considerable degree of success, since Marx began to teach, whom he can claim as his pupil. Most of the younger generations are from the schools of Hauptmann, Haupt, Dehn, the Schneiders, and the Vienna and Prague professors. Marx's reputation, then, is that of an author,—a writer upon music.

There is one fact, however, worthy of mention in regard to the article from which we have quoted, which, while it exhibits the modesty of Marx,—modesty, the ornament of true greatness,—may (or may not) add weight to the extracts we have made from it,—namely, that the article was written for Schilling by Marx himself.

We have, then, a man of three-score years, whose youth and early manhood fell in the period of Beethoven's greatest efforts and fame; a musician by profession, and composer, but, through "the opposition of singers and musicians and the scandalous journalism" of Berlin, forced from the path of composition into that of the science and literature of the art; for thirty years lecturer on the history and philosophy of music; professor of the art in the first of German universities, a position, both social and professional, which gives him command of all the sources of information; dweller in a city which possesses one of the finest musical libraries in the world, that, too, in which the bulk of the Beethoven papers are preserved,—a city, moreover, in which more than in any other the more profound works of the master are studied and publicly performed. Certainly, from no man living have we the right to expect so much, as biographer of Beethoven, as from this man.

We have no extravagant ideas of the value of the so-called Conversation-Books of Beethoven. We are aware that they seldom contain anything from the hand of the master himself,—being made up, of course, of what people had to say to him; but one hundred and thirty-eight such books—though in many cases but a sheet or two of foolscap doubled together, generally filled with mere lead-pencil scribbling, now by his brother, now by the nephew, then by Schindler or the old housekeeper, upon money matters and domestic arrangements, but often by artists, poets, and literary men, not only of Vienna, but in some cases even from England, and in one from America—must contain a great mass of matter, which places one amidst those by whom the master was surrounded, makes one to "know his goings-out and his comings-in," and occasionally facts of high importance in the study of his character, and the circumstances in which he spent his last years. For some twelve years these books have been in Berlin and at the disposal of Marx. The numerous files of musical periodicals and the mass of musical biography and recent musical history preserved in the Royal Library must be of inestimable value to the writer on Beethoven,—a value which Marx must fully appreciate, both from his former labors as editor, and his more recent ones as contributor of biographical articles to Schilling's Encyclopædia.

As we take up this new life of Beethoven, then, the measure of our expectations is the reputation of the author, plus the means, the materials, at his command. And certainly the first impression made by these two goodly volumes is a very favorable one; for, making due allowance for the music scattered through them with not too lavish a hand, by way of examples, we have still some six hundred solid pages of reading matter,—space enough in which to answer many a vexed question, clear up many a dark point, give us the results of widely extended researches, and place Beethoven the Man and the Composer before us in "Leben und Schaffen,"—in his life and his labors.

In the first cursory glance through the work, we were struck by an apparent disproportion of space allotted to different topics, and have taken some pains to examine to how great an extent this disproportion really exists. We find that in the first volume, four works,—the First, Second, and Third Symphonies and the opera "Leonore" or "Fidelio" occupy 136 of the 375 pages; in the second, that the other five Symphonies and the "Missa Solemnis" fill out 123 of the 330 pages. Bearing in mind that the works of Beethoven which have Opus numbers—not to speak of the others—amount to 137, and that, in some cases, three and even six compositions, so important as the Rasoumowsky Quartets, for instance, are included in a single Opus, the disproportion really appears very great. We notice, moreover, that just those works which are most familiar to the public, which have for thirty years or more been subjects of never-ending discussion, and which one would naturally suppose might be dismissed in fewest words,—that these are the works which occupy so much space. What is there so new to be said of the "Heroic Symphony" that fifty pages should be allotted to it, while the ballet "Prometheus," still strange to nearly every reader, should be dismissed in three?

We find it also somewhat remarkable that Marx thinks it necessary to give his own notions of musical form to the extent of nineteen pages, (Vol. I. pp. 79 et seq.) preparatory to his discussion of the greater works of the master, and yet is able to condense the history of Beethoven's first twenty-two years—the period, in our view, the most important in making him what he was—in sixteen! We have not space to follow this out farther, and only add, that, were this work a mere catch-penny affair by an unknown writer, we should suspect him of "drawing out the thread of his verbosity" on topics where materials are plenty and talk is easy, in preference to the labor of original research on points less known.

In reading the work carefully, two points strike us in relation to his printed authorities: first, that the list of those quoted by Lenz in his "Catalogue" and "Leben des Meisters" comprises nearly all those cited by Marx; the principal additions being the works of Lenz, Oulibichef, and A. B. Marx,—the latter of which he exhibits great skill in finding and making opportunities to advertise;—and secondly, that, where the Russian writer, through haste, carelessness, or the want of means to verify facts and correct errors, falls into mistakes, the Berlin Professor generally agrees with him. As it is impossible that a gentleman who for nearly thirty years "writes himself, in any bill, warrant, quitance, or obligation," Extraordinary Professor of a great German University, should simply adopt the labors of an obscure Russian writer without acknowledgment, we can only suppose these resemblances to be coincidences. These coincidences are, nevertheless, so numerous, that we may say in general, what Lenz knew of the history of the man Beethoven and his works is known to Marx,—what was unknown to the former is equally unknown to the latter. Marx, however, occasionally quotes passages from Schindler, Wegeler, and Ries at length, to which Lenz only gives references. We will note a few of the coincidences between the two writers.

Here is the first sentence of the biography:—

"Ludwig van Beethoven was born to his father, a singer in the chapel of the Electoral Max Franz, Archbishop of Cologne, Dec. 17, 1770." (Marx, Vol. I. p. 4.) Beethoven was fourteen years old when this Elector came to Bonn. Max Franz is confounded with Max Friedrich,—a singular mistake, since Wegeler writes the name in full. It may, however, be a typographical error, or a lapsus penne on the part of Marx. We give him all the benefit of the doubt; but, unluckily, we read on p. 12, that the Archbishop, "brother of Joseph II.," called the Protestant Neef from the theatre to the organ-loft of the Electoral Chapel,—this appointment having in fact been made four years before the "brother of Joseph II." had aught to do with appointments in that part of the world. Lenz confounds the two Electors in precisely the same manner.

Both Lenz and Marx (p. 9) relate the old exploded story of the child Beethoven and the spider. The former found it in the "Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung," and probably had not authorities at hand to correct it. Had Marx sent to the Library for Disjournal's "Arachnologie," the work which he gives as his authority, he would have found, that, not Beethoven, but the French violinist Berthoume, was the hero of the anecdote, as, indeed, is also related in Schilling's Encyclopædia, not many pages after Marx's own article on Beethoven in that work.

That Lenz should misdate Beethoven's visit to Berlin is not strange; that Marx, a Berliner, should, is. Nor is it remarkable that Lenz knows nothing of Beethoven's years of service as member of the Electoral orchestra at Bonn; but how Marx should have overlooked it, in case he has made any researches into the composer's early history, is beyond our comprehension.

Schindler has mistaken the date of certain letters written by Beethoven long before he had any personal intercourse with him, the notes to Julia Guicciardi, which he dates 1806. Both Lenz and Marx follow him in the date; both quote Beethoven's words, that the lady in question married Count Galenberg before the departure of the latter to Italy; both coincide in overlooking the circumstances related in the "Leipziger Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung," that, before June, 1806, a grand performance of music, composed and directed by Gallenberg, took place at Naples in honor of Joseph Bonaparte; proof sufficient that Beethoven could not in July of that year have addressed the lady in these terms: "Mein Engel, mein Alles, mein Ich!"

Both Marx and Lenz relate the following anecdote. Haydn, meeting Beethoven, praised the Septet of the latter; upon which the young man exclaimed, deprecatingly, "Ah, it is far from being a 'Creation'!" To which Haydn replied, "That you could not have written, for you are an atheist!"

That the absurdity of making Beethoven, then a man of thirty and supposed to be possessed of common sense, hint at any comparison of a piece of chamber-music with one of the grandest of oratorios, and that, too, to the author himself, should not have struck Marx, is strange; nor is it less so, that, in the course of his researches, he has not met with the correction of the story, by the late Alois Fuchs of Vienna.

In fact, the ballet "Prometheus," in which the progress of man from a state of rude nature to the highest culture and refinement is depicted, and the "Creation," were both given for the first time within a few weeks of each other. The affinity of the subjects is clear, and the remark of the young man, "Ah, dear papa, it is far from being a 'Creation'!" is only natural. "No," said Haydn, "it is indeed not a 'Creation,' nor do I think its author will ever reach that!"

In the dates given by Marx to Beethoven's compositions he generally coincides with Lenz, in his "Catalogue," particularly when the latter is wrong, and when he differs from him, he is as apt to be wrong as right. Any person who has both works at command may easily verify this remark.

But we cannot dwell longer on this point.

The Diarist Abroad.

VIENNA, MARCH 22.—A few days since I had what may be called a musical holiday. In the morning I was at the room of one of the finest pianists of Vienna, although he does not set himself up as a virtuoso. Some members of the great orchestra were there and the business was to try a few pieces of chamber music and select one for a concert. Of the pieces played, one is well worth attention by our Quintette club, if still unknown in Boston. It is a Quintet for Pianoforte, violin, viola, violoncello, contrabass, by Schubert, op. 114. The first movement is not remarkable, though good; the second is an Andante, not very deep or grand, but of exceeding beauty; the third a very fine Scherzo; fourth, variations on the "Forelle," exquisite; the finale (Allegro giusto) a worthy close to the work. Schubert's fault of spinning out his movements too long for the musical idea contained is not at all prominent in this work, which is one that I think would become a favorite — perhaps already is — in Boston.

At midday I went to the opera house to hear Handel's "Israel in Egypt." The choir was piled up on the stage; the huge orchestra, nearly all string instruments, in the usual place. Where I sat the choruses sounded smothered and dead; but notwithstanding this, I could fully sympathize with an American friend who now heard an oratorio for the first time in his life, and whose voice choked and tears ran, as he, in the intervals, endeavored to express his feelings at the effect of those mighty combinations of tones. The choruses were sung by a young society, which has not yet attained full command of such music — but in spite of all drawbacks it caused "my soul to mount upon the wings of eagles." Argue as the Bachists may, Handel and Beethoven are still for me the two greatest of all the composers.

In the evening, at Herr Ferdinand Luib's, I heard the little Julia Svoboda, of whom I have before spoken, play the pianoforte again. She is so small that she has to rest her feet upon a stool when playing. I discussed with Mr. Wessely the question whether her great execution, her power and delicacy, her musical conception of the works played, or her extraordinary memory, is her strong point, and we were alike unable to decide the problem. Of the pieces which she played as from memory, I remember Beethoven's Sonata, op. 27, No. 1, his Polonaise, op. 89, a Gigue by Mozart and one by Bach, an Allegro by Handel, Schumann's piece "Am Abend," and two beautiful pieces in modern style by a young composer, Jungmann, who was present, viz., a "Gracioso" and "Spanier Händchen." These are all I remember. Then we had divers things for four hands, and two movements of Beethoven's E flat Concerto for pianoforte. For this latter the little girl had the notes before her, but seldom looked at them. I advised Mr. L. to pay Boston and New York a visit with her — which I certainly should not do if she had nothing but mechanical dexterity.

Two or three years since this Journal contained a notice of MICHAEL GLINKA's death. OULIBICHEFF thus speaks of him and of his Russian opera.

"Der Freyschütz filled our young (Russian) musicians with enthusiasm, and our first operas, a medley of devil scenes and popular melodies, were the prelude to the master work of Michael Glinka, "Life for the Czar," one of the greatest productions of our century, as I dare believe, and in general one of the most important forward steps in dramatic music. In this work it was not alone his purpose to combine the dramatic and popular song, as Weber had done, without melting the two into one, but to characterize two different nations in giving the melodies from the beginning to the end, even in the most affecting tragic situations, their proper polish and Russian coloring. This is a problem, which at the time when I was engaged upon my Life of Mozart, I considered incapable of solution, and yet Glinka has solved it with a talent and happy result, all the more extraordinary because no one had written, who in any respect can be considered as his model. The work is therefore a new creation and its author a genius. The Russian composer never reached his brilliant success by following the steps of Weigl in his "Swiss Family;" means insignificant in their nature were intolerable to his artistic soul, and little events could have found no proper place in the grand framework of his plan. On the contrary, Glinka chose the broadest forms of modern music, and proved himself equally great as a melodist, instrumentist and contrapuntist; and in all showed himself more thoroughly a Russian, than any other on our stage; and for the first time our national music was adequate to the historic grandeur of the nation and the moral greatness of the people."

This passage is from Oulibicheff's work on Beethoven, which, though very interesting reading, gives a shockingly distorted view of the great German composer, both in his character and his history.

I shall be surprised if my illness costs me less than 20 ducats, if it is even as little. With the help of God, if one keeps one's health let the devil take the money! Mislinetscheck*, who has just paid us a visit, has the first opera for the Carnival of 1772, to do at Milan.

P. S. of Wolfgang.—I am truly sorry for poor Martha, who still continues ill, and I pray every day for her return to health; tell her from me not to agitate herself, and to eat a great many salt things. Apropos! Have you given my letter to Robini? You have said nothing about it; when you see him tell him he has quite forgotten me. I cannot write better than this, as my pen is made for making notes, not for letters. I have got fresh strings to my violin, and I play every day. I only tell you this because my mother wished to know if I still played on the violin. I have had the honor of going alone at least six times to different churches, and assisting in some magnificent ceremonies. Meanwhile I have already composed four Italian symphonies, besides five or six songs, and a motet.

Does your M. Balordo come often? and does he still honor you with his interesting discourses? and Monsieur Charles Noble, of Vogt, does he still condescend to listen to your insupportable voices? Tell Mr. Schidenhofen to help him often to compose minuetts, or else he shall have no more bon-bons. My duty would be, if I had time, to inflict on MM. de Moëlle and Schidenhofen a letter, but I have not a minute to spare. I pray them then to excuse me, and reserve myself the honor for another time. My sole amusement consists in the somersaults I permit myself from time to time. Italy is a country for making one sleep, and one always feels sleepy in it.

We are living here in the house of the Marshal Pallavicini in a most princely manner; we have a valet and a footman always at our orders; the first sleeps in our ante-chamber, so as to be always within call; we have the coolest rooms next the Sala terrena. The young Count, who is exceedingly well brought up, and has much talent, is the best of friends with Wolfgang, who loves him tenderly. They never allow me to stand, they insist on my being seated on one chair, with my leg supported on another. Indeed, to-day, in the chapel, during mass, which is performed every day at noon, two chairs had been thus arranged for me. The young count, who is only the same age as Wolfgang, is already Chamberlain to the Emperor, and he assists in the mass, after which they say the chapel, the litanies, the Salve Regina, and the De Profundis.

Wolfgang goes out in the carriage with the old countess and her son, I with the old count. We shall stay here until my leg is quite healed.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—I am still living, and always gay; to-day I had a wish to ride on a donkey; it is the fashion in Italy, so consequently I thought I must try it. We have the honor of knowing a certain Dominican, who passes for a saint; as for me I don't believe a word of it, because I see him take at breakfast, first a good cup of chocolate, and then on the top of that, a large glass of Spanish wine. I have had the honor of eating in the company of this saint, who, besides drinking freely during the repast, finished it up with a large glass of the strongest wine, two good slices of melon, peaches, pears, five cups of coffee, a plate of little cakes, and a lemon ice. Perhaps he did all this on a system of "mortification," but yet I should have some trouble to believe that; it would be too much at a time, and then, besides his dinner, he takes too good care of his supper.

At noon we were at mass in the chapel in the castle. You may certainly prepare two beautiful golden relic boxes for your husband and son, as we shall certainly be saints by the time we come back. My friends must forgive me for being such a poor correspondent. To give credit is not to cancel a debt—better late than never—are two proverbs that come as excuses for my idleness; and then, in travelling, one has a thousand things to occupy one's time. My books and my collection of music are most notably augmented. Everything is getting too small for Wolfgang; the silk rolled round his diamond ring has been unwound, only a little wax remains; his limbs have become larger and stronger; he no longer has any voice for singing, neither high notes or low ones, not even five pure notes. This vexes him, because he can no longer sing his own compositions, which he was very fond of doing.

Musical Correspondence.

VIENNA, JAN. — The Christmas and New Year holidays I have just spent with dear friends in Berlin and in Dresden, and have by this opportunity heard the renowned Berlin and Dresden operas and concerts; of course to a very limited extent, yet that little will I chronicle. Here in Vienna, the cradle of music and of musicians, we are continually told that one must go to Berlin to hear good music well played and sung; the taste of the Viennese is low and the standard of the musicians accordingly. I was curious to see and hear in the great Prussian capital.

Christmas evening we went to the very handsome opera-house, to hear Don Juan; for though we were warned that the singers were old and pretty poor, we still thought that this great opera would offer sufficient enjoyment, through its orchestral music, its concerted pieces and its choruses, in short through its intrinsic beauties. You will hardly believe that we had a very stupid time, yawned and longed to go away. I think TAUBERT, of whom we hear so much, directed; but if not, DORN, the other Kapellmeister, is also renowned. The orchestra played and the singers sang and the leader led, but, with one or two exceptions, they performed their parts with as little life and feeling as is possible. The orchestra had not a piano or a forte apparently; nothing was shaded, no diminuendo or crescendo was to be heard; the leader looked as if he were going to sleep; the choruses and concerted pieces were most slovenly given; the Don Juan, HERR SALOMON, dawdled about the stage; the Zerlina, Frau TYCZEK, was awkward, romping, and terribly vulgar, with no idea of decent singing; the Elvira was most melancholy to behold, voiceless and lifeless; the Governor, a poor old blind man, who should have given up singing long since (want of a strong, effective voice is in this part death to it); the Masetto miserable; the Ottavio well-meaning but entirely ineffective and misplaced in such a character; the Leporello very vulgar, but not much better than the others; and lastly the Donna Anna, Frau KÖSTER, very good indeed. This was indeed the single point which saved the entire performance from damnation before any other than an infatuated and self-admiring Berlin audience. Frau Köster conceives this part, as indeed "Fidelio" and all others, to my knowledge, with great understanding and fire. Her voice, it is true, has suffered much with years, and yet I was surprised to find so little difference between the present time and seven years ago. Yes, she was very excellent indeed, and that is about all that I can say for Don Juan in Berlin.

We saw one ballet, which was very pretty and very well put on the stage; and we heard and saw Così fan tutte, of Mozart; it was better, but again Frau Köster was the only redeeming feature of the evening. The singers in Berlin have become old in service, and have not been replaced by new. They have just engaged a new tenor, with a great voice it is said, and have, besides those already mentioned, JOHANNA WAGNER, still great without doubt, and HERR FORMES, a tenor brother to Carl Formes. These two must be good, as perhaps a few others; but the want of life and care in orchestra and in chorus is not for a moment to be pardoned. It proves great neglect on the part of the management and of the leaders, Taubert and Dorn.

We went to hear LIEBIG's orchestra one afternoon with your old Berlin correspondent, but were forced to go away from want of room. The hall was jammed with little tables and chairs, and was for the greater part, filled with ladies knitting and drinking coffee or chocolate. The little that we heard was very good, though Liebig ought to put more life into his orchestra. The programme was long and very excellent; the playing very precise; all that one needed was more musicians and more life. Liebig does a deal of good in Berlin by his Symphony concerts; in that respect Berlin has a great advantage over Vienna.

In Dresden we saw some tableaux, with music of the great masters and with declamation; saw a little comedy, with DAVISON, one of the first German actors, and heard "Abu Hassan," a little opera of Weber's; it is very pretty and characteristic. Another evening we saw EMIL DEVRIENT, also a leading German actor, who has trodden English boards, and Frau BAYER-BUERSCH, (the best German actress to my knowledge and ranking next to Rachel, I think), in a comedy of Freytag's (the author of Soll und Haben). Die Journalisten, as it is called, was put upon the Dresden stage in 1853, was excellently played and received then, and has apparently remained a favorite comedy to the present day. It is given now and then here too. Why should not some one translate it for the stage at home? for it would certainly please.

Lastly we heard Rienzi, one of Richard Wagner's earliest operas, I think; it was excellently played and sung. The Dresden orchestra proved itself to us far better than that of Berlin; but I very much doubt, if either of them can equal (at all events not more) our Kärthner-theater orchestra. The old tenor, TICHATSCHKE, a man of fifty and more, sang with a beauty and a fire, which hardly any one is able or will soon be able to rival. Mitterwürger, also an old singer, sang the baritone part. Frau KREBS-MICHLESI, the wife of the opera director, Krebe, took the mezzo-soprano part, and Frau KRALL sang Rienzi's sister charmingly. The whole performance was excellent; Mitterwürger is an old singer, but always pours much feeling and understanding out with his beautiful voice, added to which he is an excellent actor. Frau Krall is a quite young and to me a new singer; she has a very fair soprano voice, sweet and warm, with considerable power, though a little thin in her highest notes. Of the opera "Rienzi" I shall take an early opportunity to speak in detail.

We also heard a concert given by MAXSFELDT's orchestra at the Linkesches Bad (a great hall on the right bank of the Elbe, in a suburb). The programme was very long and excellent; it was as follows:

1. Overture characteristique. . . . . Beethoven.
2. Aria from Hans Hellwig. . . . . Marschner.
3. Die Werber Waltz. . . . . Lanner.
4. Variations. Op. 80. . . . . Beethoven.
5. Overture. "Night Sounds" from Ossian. . . . . Gade.
6. Finale from Don Juan. . . . . Mozart.
7. Overture to Armida. . . . . Gluck.
8. Symphony No. 7. (A). . . . . Beethoven.
9. Overture to Elisa. . . . . Cherubini.
10. Allegro from the Military Symphony. . . . . Haydn.
11. Flowers of Fancy. Waltz. . . . . Gungl.
12. Ella Polka. . . . . John Strauss.

No one could easily find fault with this programme, and the execution of it was capital. J. L.

NEW YORK, APRIL 16.—Last week the double opera season opened. After a couple of months of operatic destitution, we are suddenly flooded by a great inundation of opera. Prima donna march in upon us in hordes, and opera singers chirp along our streets like crickets upon a very cricketed hearth.

It's the funniest thing in the world to note the bearing of the two opera managers towards each other. ULLMANN is a perfect St. Simeon Stylites of dignity. He mounts upon a towering pillar of conscious power and pride, and claiming to superintend the legitimate opera, of New York, does not bestow a word of notice, even an expression of contempt, upon the new comers at the Winter Garden.

At this latter establishment MAX MARETZKE has fairly entrenched his forces. He claims to be a sort of opposition to monopoly opera. You know Marezek cut his throat a year or so ago. I don't mean he severed his jugular with a razor, but he cut his operatic throat by a sharp speech on the stage of the Academy, after one of his operatic seasons, when he took occasion to say some severe truths about the stockholders. Of course the stockholders couldn't stand this. They paid once for their seats, but now are to all practical purposes the most defunct of dead-heads. "Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned," and earth no more unrelenting demon than your snubbed dead-head—especially if he be rich, and feels it is rather mean to be one. So the wrathful subscribers or stockholders never forgave the verbose Marezek.

Of course Marezek would have proffered the Academy, but, as he couldn't get it, he suddenly became impressed with the great advantages of the Winter Garden and so pitched his tents there.

Ullmann opened his campaign last Monday, with PATTI, BRIGNOLI, SUSINI and FERRI, in the Barber. Immense crowd, excellent performance, great applause and volleys of bouquets.

Marezek opened his campaign Wednesday, with the GASSIERS and ERRANI in Lucia. Gassier and his wife are good, popular singers and were well received, but the attendance was rather poor. Errani the new tenor has a sweet but worn voice, with power, and a good method. He belongs to the class of second-rate tenors, along with Sbriglia, Stefani, Lorini and others. The same night Ullmann produced Don Pasquale, in which Patti sang and acted and looked charmingly, and Brignoli gave the sorenade in an utterly unsurpassable style. The favorite tenor is now at the very zenith of his popularity and power. He has for five years been the most admired tenor in the country, and has survived triumphantly the rivalry of many new comers of greater fame.

Thursday night the Gassiers and Errani sang at the Winter Garden in Sonnambula. Friday night Don Pasquale was repeated at the Academy, to not so good a house. On Friday night at the Winter Garden, FABBRI made her debut in Traviata.

Fabbri is a German lady, far from an infant in years, and with a voice of great power. Her real name is Mulder, and her husband, Richard Mulder, a pianist of some eminence in Germany, conducts the orchestra when she sings. In acting Mrs. Mulder uses the intense French melodramatic style, and consequently created a greater sensation in the last act than in the previous ones, her style, both of figure and manner, being too heavy for the light, fanciful gaiety of the Violetta of the first act. In the dying scene she was painfully elaborate in all the "make up" and in the coughing, hand-clutching and other peculiarities of a consumptive. She also sang this act throughout rather sotto voce, as though her very voice were impaired by her illness; an idea that is certainly appropriate to the situation, although it precludes her from making any of those startling points in which Gazzaniga was so effective. Fabbri is quite good, very original, and will appear to better advantage. To-night she appears in Ernani with STIGELLI.

The engagement of this tenor will be a great card for Marezek, for Stigelli is deservedly popular, though he will not draw an audience like Brignoli. Stigelli did not like the idea of playing second fiddle to the "handsome tenor." He complained that he was only brought forward when Brignoli was sick or tired, and so he would rather leave. Ullmann shrugged his shoulders and let him go, and so Marezek snapped him up. The indomitable Max certainly is not niggardly in making engagements. He has, besides Fabbri and Gassier, secured the services of FREZZOLINI, who sings on Wednesday in Lucrezia, with Miss WISSELER, the Philadelphia contralto. He will give a series of German operas in which Stigelli, Mrs. Mulder (alias Signora Inez Fabbri) Mrs. Van BERKEL and WEINLICH will take part. The first of these operas will be Flotow's Stradella. Marezek advertises it in the German papers only, and affectingly appeals to the Teutonic population of New York to support this attempt to realize the long cherished idea of a German opera in New York. But the majority of our Teutons are more addicted to lager, and Hoym's Theatre, than to the music of even the German composers.

At the Academy, in the meantime, Ullmann and Strakosch are preparing novelties. Little Patti is as delightful as ever, but still there must be something new; so a Signora PANTI, from Lima, will shortly make her debut in Trovatore, with ADA PHILLIPS, who has improved while in Havana, they say, and will sing in Favorita before the end of the season. It is thought that the management will bring out Verdi's Nabucco, if any new opera be produced this season.

Of course the German critics will be rampant at the idea of another dose of Verdi. TROVATORE.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 16.—I send you the programme of CARL GABRTNER's third classical soiré of the present season. He was assisted by CHARLES JARVIS, Jr., the most promising pianist of our latitude, and by Mr. CHAS. SCHMITZ, violoncellist.

1. Grand Sonata, for Piano and Violin, Op. 20. Dedicated to the Emperor Alexander I. .... Beethoven.
2. Song: Wanderer. .... Schubert.
3. Polonaise, for Piano, Op. 22. .... Chopin.
4. Concerto, No. 8, Violin. .... De Beriot.
5. Grand Trio: Piano, Viol. and Cello, Op. 97. Beethoven.

This really excellent soirée took place last Thursday evening, and afforded unqualified delight to the rather limited circle of connoisseurs assembled. Gaertner is a highly cultivated musician, whose penchant is toward the old masters, and whose efforts to awaken an interest here, for the solid works of these, are entitled to the grateful appreciation of all those who cherish a love for the purest styles. His violin performance on this occasion showed a true sense of Beethoven's individuality, as well as of the emotions which may be supposed to have prompted him in the composition of the Sonata, and of the fine Trio. Gaertner has one fault in his rendering of such compositions; namely, a lack of that mental composure which is so essential to a proper development of rhythmic effects. He is excitable, and at times splashes the smoothly flowing current of melody.

In other compositions, such as De Beriot's Concerto, in the second part of the programme, this restless excitability is not so much amiss. Altogether Gaertner's achievements elicited the warmest praise. Not less were the auditors gratified with the piano performance of Mr. CHARLES JARVIS, of whom I made a slight mention to you in a former letter. Indeed, his conception of Chopin's spirituality and poetry, as evinced in his rendering of the Polonaise, Op. 22, was, of itself, sufficient to substantiate the most flattering auguries of his abilities. Mr. Jarvis's manner and style are essentially like those of Thalberg—quiet, graceful, and displaying singularly liquid manipulation; eschewing, at the same time, all oscillations of the body, or undue motion of the arms. The very sight of his performance is a pleasure. Add to this, that his appreciation is keen and that his execution never fails of exactitude in fingering, as well as in power and rapidity when necessary, and you will begin to realize that we have a pianist, who is an honor to the city. His repertoire is not circumscribed by any individual inclinations toward certain composers or styles, but comprises, literally, everything that is worthy of the student's attention. I have heard him play Bach's and Clementi's fugues; Beethoven and Mozart sonatas and symphonies; all of Thalberg's fantasias; the compositions of Wilmers, Dreyshock, Stephen Heller, and Liszt; all of Chopin's Valses, Preludes, and Polonaises; the piano-forte works of Mendelssohn, Schumann, and others; in short, I have seen him wandering through all the flowery fields of art, and picking up its beauties with an æsthetic discrimination, which has excited not only my own admiration, but that of all those who know him well. He has furthermore, been studying harmony, diligently, under the guidance of Dr. LEOPOLD MEIGNEN, who reports the progress of his pupil to be exceedingly rapid.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB (from Boston,) are displaying their posters, and several portraits. I think, from present appearances, that they will be successful here. MANRICO.

NEW YORK, APRIL 16.—I regret that I can merely send you the programme of the last Chamber Concert, as indisposition prevented my attending. The fifth of the series takes place to-morrow evening, when Sig. STIGELLI is announced to sing.

1. Quartet in E minor, Op. 8. .... Mendelssohn.
William Sear, Wm. Doshier, M. Rayer, and Ch. Branner.
2. Duet, from "Der Freischütz" ..... Weber.
The Misses Gellie.
3. a. Au Bord d'une Source,
b. Air de Don Juan, transcrip. } ..... Liszt.
William Sear.

4. Sonata in D minor, (Piano and Violin) ..... Gade.
S. B. Mills and Wm. Doshier.
5. Duet—"Ich wollt' meine Lieb" ..... Mendelssohn.
The Misses Gellie.
6. Fantasia in F minor. .... Chopin.
S. B. Mills.

On Saturday night we had MASON's second Soirée. It gave great satisfaction to an audience just large enough to fill the smaller of Chickering's pretty concert rooms, which is preferable to the larger one on account of being more quiet. But though the audience was small, it was quite as appreciative a one as graces all these concerts. The programme was excellent. Mozart's D minor Quartet was so beautifully played that one could only regret that it was the only one that we were to hear. The Trio in D major, which ended the list, was also rendered in an admirable manner. These were the two pièces de résistance. The minor numbers were two songs by a Madame de LUSAN, and solos by Messrs. MASON and THOMAS. The vocal pieces were "Voi che sapete" and Schubert's Ave Maria; Madame de Lusana has a fine voice, but hardly more cultivation than is common to industrious amateur singers. She sang with considerable taste, however, except occasionally indulging in the abominable habit of inserting ornaments which the composer never meant to have sung in his piece. Mr. Mason played a Nocturne and a Barcarolle and Ballade of his own, besides a "Danse Rustique" in answer to an encore; all pretty, striking pieces, vastly superior to and more valuable than the flood of "Fantasias," "Brilliant Variations," etc., which inundate the musical world. The most interesting number of the programme was certainly Bach's Chaconne, very ably interpreted by Mr. Thomas. I remember recording the impression received from the same piece, as played by the same artist, in one of my letters some years ago. It was only renewed on this occasion. It is a wonderful composition, of which familiarity with it alone could give one a just appreciation. Mr. Thomas does his best to make the listener understand it—he brings out the finest points, and plays the whole with remarkable fire and spirit. He is decidedly one of the best violinists we have in the city. —t—

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 18.—An exhibition of the splendid organ, just erected in the church of the Holy Trinity, Rittenhouse Square, by the Messrs. Hook of your city, took place last evening. Need I add that the audience were delighted with this noble specimen of that successful firm's handiwork? You have already published a schedule of its stops, &c. I can assure you of its immense power, faultless action, and voluminous diapasons. Its powers were splendidly tested by a number of our leading organists. Mr. JOHN A. DARLING, who is to preside over the instrument, led off with an original Marche religieuse, with pedal obligato. The construction of this piece displayed a knowledge of harmony, such as cannot fail to make the young composer acceptable as an organist, so the members of that church, and to lovers of solid organ playing, generally. The Marche, barring a little flurry in several movements, was finely performed.

Then followed Mendelssohn's overture to Athalie, superbly executed by Prof. H. G. THUNDER, who subsequently furnished an impromptu arrangement of several themes from Donizetti's Polinto, which delighted a majority of the audience. Mr. Thunder's achievements in this line display an intimate acquaintance with the resources of the organ, and fine talent for the production of dramatic effects.

MICHAEL H. CROSS, organist of the Arch Street Baptist Church, and a performer of much celebrity, entertained the audience with an original fantasia, on an air of Dr. Arne's, abounding in brilliant execution and fine combinations. Mr. Cross possesses an agile finger, exquisite taste, and that calm self-possession, so essential to satisfactory organ performances. After him, FRANCIS T. S. DARLEY, of the Calvary Presbyterian Church, proceeded to improvise upon the popular old melody, Adeste fideles. After ingeniously disguising its time-honored strains in harmonic sequences, modulations and suspensions, the devotional movement, borne upon the full power of the organ, finally burst grandly upon the spacious interior of the massive edifice, in all its beauteous simplicity. Prof. BENJ. CARR CROSS next assumed the seat, and successfully interwove some very florid solo passages with occasional bursts of solid harmonies, upon the great organ. This gentleman has been for many years identified with the progress of music in our city. Besides being one of our ablest teachers, he has successfully filled divers organ situations with great credit, and has led, successively, the quondam Philharmonic Society, and now the Handel and Haydn.

Thus, you will perceive, Mr. Hook's noble instrument had its qualities fairly tested, last evening. There was but one expression, that of unqualified admiration. MANRICO.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—Continuation of Opera, Der Freyschütz, piano-forte arrangement.

Concerts.

COMPLIMENTARY TO CARL ZERRAHN.—The concert, (Saturday evening,) was a genuine success. The Music Hall was full of people and enthusiasm; the programme excellent; and the bronze Beethoven seemed to look down over the heads of the orchestra approvingly, as much as to say that this was one of his occasions: did not the opening and concluding pieces make it so?

1. Symphony No. 4, (D flat major,) ..... Beethoven
2. "Der frohe Wandersmann" ..... Mendelssohn
Orpheus Glee Club.
3. Aria: "Ah! con lui," from the opera "Saffo," ..... Pacini
Mrs. Harwood.
4. Overture: "Tannhäuser" ..... R. Wagner
5. "Hüte Dich," ..... Girschner
Orpheus Glee Club.
6. Song: "Across there at the window," ..... Möring
(With Violoncello obligato, by Wulf Fries.)
Mrs. Harwood.
7. Overture: "Leonore," (No. 3,) ..... Beethoven

The only drawback was the necessary absence (from the city), of several important members of the orchestra, (the first clarinet, first oboe, first bassoon, &c., the latter being replaced by a violoncello). The substitutions both weakened the strings,—already too weak for that great crescendo near the end of the Leonore overture, or for the doubly divided violinism of the Tannhäuser,—and disturbed somewhat the usual smooth and perfect fusion of the warm tone-colors, in a piece in which reed instruments have so much individual prominence. Under these circumstances the Symphony was more expressively brought out than one knowing them could have dared to expect. The slow movement was particularly enjoyed. It was a happy thought to give us just this Symphony, this warm and glowing one, the tenderest and loveliest of the nine, inasmuch as it had not been played during the whole past year. It reminded us of the many-sidedness of Beethoven. After more frequent hearings of the fifth and seventh, it was like Romeo and Juliet after Lear or Hamlet. The audience listened entranced by its beauty. And so they did to Leonore, with its more exciting and dramatic progress. The trumpet part was excellent.

What was most wanting was a body of strings equal to the grand proportions of the musical design. The Tannhäuser overture was still keenly relished; and it was placed happily in contrast with the Symphony and other pieces.

We never heard the Orpheus voices sound so well together. They were uncommonly well blended, and free from dull or harsh sounds. They took the house by storm, and were not let off without additional contributions. Mrs. HARWOOD's selections were in the best range of her fresh and beautiful voice, and she sang them exceedingly well.

Mr. ZERRAHN must have felt gratified and cheered by this general and hearty turn-out; and we are glad to learn that the concert was not without solid material benefit. May it suggest to him, with no illusive confidence, the policy of still continuing in good works another year. We understand that the musicians have held several meetings with a view to organizing a Philharmonic Society, which will place the matter of Symphony concerts, we hope, on a more permanent and profitable footing.

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—This week we have had the twenty-fourth and last of the Wednesday Afternoon Concerts. "Classical" and "popular" were mingled in the following proportions:

1. Symphony, No. 4. . . . .Mozart
2. Walts, "Philomela". . . . .Strauss
3. Reminiscences of Flotow's "Martha". . . . .Heinecke
Germania Band.
4. Overture. Yelva. . . . .Reisiger
5. Potpourri. From "Les Huguenots". . . . .Meyerbeer
6. Scenes and Aria. From "Macbeth". . . . .Verdi
Germania Band.
7. New Gallop. "Ever of Thee." (First time. . . . .Zerrahn

We heard only the Symphony, which proved to be that greatest one of Mozart's, by some called the "Jupiter," in C. It was rather too grandiose a work, and too full of contrapuntal complication for so small an orchestra when put to extra shifts to supply absent reeds, &c., and therefore did not sound as well as usual. These Concerts have done us one great service this winter. They have added three to our old stock of three (the best and best known) Mozart Symphonies. And if the new acquaintances are not as great works as the "Jupiter," and those in G minor and in E flat, they have been at least positive acquisitions of beauty and imaginative genius. One or two of them have made a very decided impression and will be called for frequently in future. Such concerts are just the right occasions for bringing forth some of the obscurer works of men of real genius.

The audience this time was very large, so that late comers could not drop into seats without some searching. This would seem to show that the "Union" are leaving off just as the tide is turning in their favor. The musicians probably have earned small wages by these concerts thus far; but they cost little; and in long continuance, and frequent, lies the gain of such popular and simple enterprises. Now bright Spring days invite the young crowds out, and what place so pleasant for an afternoon hour or two as the Music Hall?

THE DRAYTONS.—The "Parlor Operas" of these two capital singers and actors are continued nightly at the Melodion. They need only to be known to conquer the reserve of Boston; and they now attract such audiences, in point of numbers and refinement, as they really deserve. Mrs. Drayton proves herself more and more a charming singer—in spite of hoarseness—and one of the cleverest, gracefulest and most versatile of actresses for such nice little pieces. Mr. Drayton has one of the richest of baritone voices, sings with taste and feeling, and has a manly, hearty, humorous way withal. All their pieces are amusing, but do not fail to see "Love's Labor Lost."

ARTISTS' RECEPTION.—The third and last of these occasions, which took place in Bumstead Hall, on Wednesday evening of last week, was the most successful and delightful of the three. The hall was beautifully decorated with evergreens and the greatest profusion of flowers; the green brought out the other beauties of the hall, especially those hanging baskets of light, most happily; the display of paintings and sculpture was uncommonly interesting; the lighting admirable; and the company, crowding floor and galleries, one of the finest that could be collected. The character, intellect, and beauty of Boston could scarcely have been better represented.

The stage end of the hall made a fine appearance, with the colossal Venus of Milo for a central figure in front, and a copy of the Faun of Praxiteles (which Hawthorn has just made so interesting), Brackett's grand bust of John Brown, and works of Ball Hughes, Stephenson and others upon either side. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, on the stage, embowered, discoursed whole scenes of Don Juan and other choice music. Paintings and drawings invited one within the recess. We had scarcely a chance to look at half of the fine paintings on the walls. Among those which did awaken in us a desire to see them often were "Maud Muller" and "Pocahontas" in Ames's warm and glowing colors; a couple of very striking Italian scenes by Brown; a most beautiful "Dawn in Tuscany" by Miss Clarke; a fine little landscape by Mrs. Darrah; several of the best productions we have yet seen by Champney, Ordway, Williams, Morioiler, and others; a charming little crayon picture of a child, the "Street-sweeper," if we remember rightly, by Staigg; and an elaborate allegorical drawing, called "Charon" (founded on a modern Greek poem), by Neffen.

The artists did the right thing in letting the ornaments and works of Art remain, over the next evening, for a promenade concert given by the Quintette Club. The concourse of people was not quite so thick, and there was better opportunity to see the pictures.

These "Receptions" have been productive of great good, immediate and permanent. They bring the artists into pleasant and direct relations with their proper public; make the doings of the artists known and educate the Art-lovers; and they have set beautiful and refreshing examples of a mode of social intercourse in which not fashion and folly, but the Muses themselves preside, and in an atmosphere as free and recreative as it is mentally inspiring.

OPENING OF A NEW ORGAN. On Friday afternoon, April 14, there was a large assemblage in King's Chapel, eager for a first hearing of the Organ which has just been built by Messrs. SIMMONS & WILLCOX, to take the place of the venerable instrument which has stood there over a hundred years. The diapasons, mixtures, and some other pipes of the old instrument have always been admired, and time had only mellowed them. These pipes have been wisely retained and incorporated in the new work, of which the contents are as follows:

Compass of Pedal, from C1 to d—27 notes.
GRAND MANUAL. *1. Contra Diapason, 16 ft, 56 pipes. 2. Open Diapason, 8 ft, 56 pipes. *3. Stop'd Diapason, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 4. Hohl Flute, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 5. Viola da Gamba, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 6. Quint, 5 1/3 ft, 56 pipes. 7. Octave, 4 ft, 56 pipes. 8. Flute Octavante, 4 ft, 56 pipes. *9. Twelfth, 2 2/3 ft, 56 pipes. *10. Fifteenth, 2 ft, 56 pipes. *11. Mixture, 4 ranks, 224 pipes. 12. Trumpet, 8 ft, 56 pipes.
SWELL MANUAL. 1. Bourdon Bass, 2. Bourdon Treble, 16 ft, 56 pipes. *3. Open Diapason, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 4. Stop'd Diapason, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 5. Viol d'Amour, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 6. Octave, 4 ft, 56 pipes. 7. Flute Harmonique, 4 ft, 56 pipes. *8. Mixture, 3 ranks, 168 pipes. 9. Contra Trumpet, 16 ft, 44 pipes. *10. Trumpet, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 11. Oboe, 8 ft, 56 pipes. *12. Clarion, 4 ft, 56 pipes.

CHOIR MANUAL. 1. Eolian, 16 ft, 56 pipes. 2. Dulciana, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 3. Keraulophon, 8 ft, 56 pipes. *4. Stop'd Diapason, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 5. Dolce, 4 ft, 56 pipes. *6. Flute d'Amour, 5 ft, 56 pipes. 7. Mixture, 2 ranks, 112 pipes. 8. Cornu di Bassetto, 8 ft, 56 pipes. 9. Contra Fagotto, 16 ft, 44 pipes.

PEDAL. 1. Open Bass, 16 ft, 27 pipes. 2. Bourdon Bass, 16 ft, 27 pipes. 3. Quint Bass, 10 2/3 ft, 27 pipes. 4. Violoncello Bass, 8 ft, 27 pipes. 5. Posuone Bass, 16 ft, 27 pipes.

The case of this Organ and the stops designated in the foregoing description by an asterisk, were made in London, A. D. 1755, by Adam Smith, and were renovated, transposed, and incorporated in this instrument built by Messrs. Simmons & Willcox, from a specification prepared by F. C. Loring, Esq.

The trial consisted of vocal pieces by a select choir, and of organ selections and improvisations. In the latter Mr. WILLCOX showed to great advantage the many very beautiful and powerful stops of the instrument, as well as his own rare skill in combining them. The reeds and flutes were singularly sweet and individual in their quality. And there was no lack of richness, grandeur, good proportion, prompt speaking, and ready control of the full forces of the multitudinous instrument. It is in all ways worthy of the high reputation of these makers.

Among the selected pieces were the "Pastoral Symphony" from the "Messiah"; an organ Fantasia and Fugue, by Hesse, (played by Mr. WILLCOX and Mr. HOWARD, organist of the Chapel), and the overture to Zampa. The latter, we must say, seemed to us peculiarly unfitted for the organ.

We know not when or where we have heard so satisfactory specimens of quartet choir singing as on this occasion. The choir of the Chapel and of St. Paul's were united, consisting of Mrs. FOWLE, Miss WHITEHOUSE, soprani; Mrs. SHATTUCK (Miss Humphrey) and Miss CLOUTMAN, contralti; Messrs. ADAMS and STONE, tenors, and Messrs. BALL and UDERWOOD, basses. The Motet by Haydn, Insane et vance curae, with eight voices, was a very interesting composition, anticipating in one place one of the striking effects of modulation in Mendelssohn's "Rain Chorus." Spohr's sextet: "As pants the hart;" the Quartet from "Elijah": "O come every one that thirsteth, and a Veni Sancte Spiritus, by Deitch, were also admirably sung. For solos, Mrs. Fowle sang "With verdure clad," and Mr. Adams: "If with all your hearts" (from "Elijah"),—both to great acceptance.

A GOOD DISTINCTION. The April number of the Crayon has the beginning of an admirable article entitled "Thoughts on Poetry and its Varieties," by JOHN STUART MILL, one of the most profound and philosophical of English writers, whether he discuss economical and moral problems (witness his treatise upon Liberty, which ought to be republished here), or problems of Poetry and Art. In this article he makes a distinction between Poetry and Eloquence, which, as he applies it also to Music, strikes us as singularly suggestive and to the purpose in its bearing upon present controversy. He says:

Poetry is the natural fruit of solitude and meditation; eloquence, of intercourse with the world. The persons who have most feelings of their own, if intellectual culture has given them a language in which to express it, have the highest faculty of poetry; those who best understand the feelings of others, are the most eloquent. The persons and the nations, who commonly excel in poetry, are those whose character and tastes render them least dependent upon the applause, or sympathy, or concurrence of the world in general. Those to whom that applause, that sympathy, that concurrence are most necessary, generally excel most in eloquence. And hence, perhaps, the French, who are the least poetical of all great and intellectual nations, are among the most eloquent; the French, also, being the most sociable, the vainest, and the least self-dependent.

If the above be, as we believe, the true theory of the distinction commonly admitted between eloquence and poetry; or even though it be not so, yet if, as we cannot doubt, the distinction above stated be a real bona fide distinction, it will be found to hold, not merely in the language of words, but in all other language, and to intersect the whole domain of Art.

Take for example, music: we shall find in that art, so peculiarly the expression of passion, two perfectly distinct styles; one of which may be called the poetry, the other the oratory of music. This difference, being seized, would put an end to much musical sectarianism. There has been much contention whether the music of the modern Italian school, that of Rossini and his successors, be impassioned or not. Without doubt, the passion it expresses is not the musing, meditative tenderness, or pathos, or grief of Mozart or Beethoven. Yet it is passion, but garrulous passion—the passion which pours itself into other ears; and therein the better calculated for dramatic effect, having a natural adaptation for dialogue. Mozart also is great in musical oratory; but his most touching compositions are in the opposite style—that of soliloquy. Who can imagine "Dove sono" heard? We imagine it overheard.

Purely pathetic music commonly partakes of soliloquy. The soul is absorbed in its distress, and though there may be bystanders, it is not thinking of them. When the mind is looking within, and not without, its state does not often or rapidly vary; and hence the even, uninterrupted flow, approaching almost to monotony, which a good reader, or a good singer, will give to words or music of a pensive or melancholy cast. But grief taking the form of a prayer, or of a complaint, becomes oratorical; no longer low and even, and subdued, it assumes a more emphatic rhythm, a more rapidly returning accent; instead of a few slow equal notes, following one after another at regular intervals, it crowds note upon note and often assumes a hurry and bustle like joy. Those who are familiar with some of the best of Rossini's serious compositions, such as the air "Tu che i miseri comforti," in the opera of "Tancredi," or the duet, "Ebben per mia memoria," in "La Gazza Ladra," will at once understand and feel our meaning. Both are highly tragic and passionate; the passion of both is that of oratory, not poetry. The like may be said of that most moving invocation in Beethoven's "Fidelio"—

"Komm, Hoffnung, lass das letzte Stern Der Müde nicht erblicken;"

in which Madame Schröder-Devrient exhibited such consummate powers of pathetic expression. How different from Winter's beautiful "Paga fui," the very soul of melancholy exhaling itself in solitude; fuller of meaning, and, therefore, more profoundly poetical than the words for which it was composed—for it seems to express not simple melancholy, but the melancholy of remorse.

If, from vocal music, we now pass to instrumental we may have a specimen of musical oratory in any fine military symphony or march; while the poetry of music seems to have attained its consummation in Beethoven's Overture to Egmont, so wonderful in its mixed expression of grandeur and melancholy.

Paris.

The Grand Opéra continues to be one of the greatest points of attraction, and, the success of Pierre de Médicis—La Pierre de Médicis, as some of its now-admirers call it—has gone on increasing. M. Bonnehée, who filled the part of Julien de Médicis, is about to take a holiday of two months duration, on account of the state of his voice, and will be succeeded by M. Dumestre. The Semiramis, of Rossini is to be given in September, not in June, as was first said. The two sisters Marchisio will make their debut in this opera, and M. Obin, I believe, will play the part of Assur. Next year the Tannhäuser of Richard Wagner will be given. As Richard Wagner is the musician of the "future," it is not to be wondered at that this opera is spoken of so long ere it will be given. The Galathée of Victor Massé, still keeps good her ground at the Opéra-Comique, and though the part of Pygmalion seems to me utterly unsuited to the voice of Mlle. Wertheimer, Mad. Cabel is such a favorite that the little opera always goes off triumphantly, with a never-failing encore for Mad. Cabel in the drinking song, "Verse encore ce vin généreux." Before M. and Mad. Faure leave the Opéra-Comique, M. Faure-Lefèvre is to play the principal part (Rita) in an unedited work of Rossini's, the libretto of which is written by M. Gustave Vaëy. Afterwards M. Faure is engaged to sing at Covent Garden with Madame Miolan-Carvalho in the Pardon de Ploërmel. Madame Faure, they say, is going to St. Petersburg; meanwhile several revivals are projected at this Opéra, amongst others, Le Jugement de Midas, by Grétry, and Masaniello of Carafa. At the Théâtre-Lyrique, Madame Carvalho, who was most warmly received on her re-appearance in Philemon et Baucis, will enjoy a little rest if they bring out, as they talk of doing, the Fidelio of Beethoven, Mad. Viardot performing the principal part. The Crociato, of Meyerbeer, was given last night at the Opéra.

When I think of all the concerts given lately, I hold my pen poised in the air with despair—where and with whom to begin, and where shall I end or what select. So that to mention two or three is all that one can do: I will begin with the one given at the Tuilleries. The first of these concerts d'artistes was composed of the artists from the Opéra-Comique, the second of those from the Italian Opéra, and the third of the artists of the Grand-Opéra; the selections of pieces were from Pierre de Médicis, Guillaume Tell, Les Huguenots, Vêpres, Trouvère, and Herкуланum; the pianist was M. Hans Bulow, and Franc-homme, on the violoncello, was clever as he always is. Meanwhile the Emperor's private concerts go on wonderfully, and some two or three "bright particular stars" attract considerable admiration and attention. Haydn's Seasons was the principal performance in the programme of the concert given on Sunday by the Conservatoire. The performance both instrumental and vocal, was in every way worthy the work, though Roger, who had come from Belgium expressly to sing at it, was already beginning to feel the effects of the influenza, that has since prevented his singing at a concert at Amiens, which has been put off in consequence. At Brussels, Roger was received in the warmest manner; and one representation, got up entirely in honor of him, brought in a sum of 6,000 francs.

The second concert for the performance of modern music for piano and voice was given last Wednesday, in the Salle Beethoven. The rooms were crowded. The programme was exclusively (as regards instrumental music) reserved to the modern classical style—that is to say, modern music written in the style of the ancient masters. Fifteen pieces on the piano were given, and the three last, performed by M. Louis Dronier, were as warmly applauded as if the young virtuoso had given them at the commencement of the evening. M. Padlike, in the andante of the fourth concerto of Herz, and Fissot, in the prêre of Stephen Heller, deserve especial mention, also the vocal part of the programme was ably interpreted by Mlle. Renaury, M. Richer Cremon, and M. Bieval. Mlle. Pleyel gave her second concert on Monday, and her playing of the Serenade of Mendelssohn, the Fleur de Lilouff, the Truite of Stephen Heller, and the Etudes of Jules Cohen, was admirable. Tagliacico's singing and Sighicelli on the violoncello completed the programme.—Corr. London Musical World, March 28.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—At the second concert, on Monday week, there was even a better programme than at the first:—

PART I.—Overture, "Isles of Fingal"—Mendelssohn. Aria, "O del mio dolce ardor"—Stradella. Concerto in E flat, pianoforte—Mozart. Aria, "Penna alla patria"—Rossini. Pastoral Symphony—Beethoven.

PART II.—Overture, "Masaniello"—Auber. Chorus, "Away, the morning freshly breaking"—Auber. Song, "The first violet"—Mendelssohn. Fantasia, violin, "Hongrois"—Ernst. Aria, "Robert, toi que j'aime"—Meyerbeer. Hungarian March—Berlioz.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The instrumental pieces last Monday were from Beethoven, and the song from Mr. W. Chappell's Popular Music of the Olden Time. A better programme has been seldom presented:—

PART I.—Grand Septet, in E flat major, Op. 20—Beethoven. Song, "Bally in our alley," 1620. Song, "Oh! the oak and the ash," 1650. Sonata, in E major, Op. 109, for Pianoforte Solo (First time)—Beethoven.

PART II.—Romance, in G major, Op. 40. Violin Solo (First time)—Beethoven. Song, "At her cottage door," 17th Century. Song, "Kitty, dear Kitty," 1806. Grand Sonata, in A, Op. 47, for Pianoforte and Violin—Beethoven.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR.—The third concert was one of the best ever given by the choir. The programme (the first part of which was unusually interesting) is worth citing:—

PART I.—The Forty-third Psalm, "Judge me, O Lord." For an Eight-Part Choir. No. 2, Op. 78—Mendelssohn. Motet for Quartet and Chorus, "Source of all light"—Hauptmann. Sonata for Pianoforte, in D minor, No. 2, Op. 29—Beethoven. Motet, "Pater noster"—Meyerbeer.

PART II.—Madrigal, "Sweet flowers"—T. A. Walmisley. Vocal Duet, "When birds are singing"—Henry Smart. Part Song, "Welcome, Spring"—Henry Leslie. Air, "O Nanny, wilt thou gang with me?"—harmonized by Harrison. Part Song, "Home"—Benedict. Countryman's Song—Dr. Rimbauld. Fantasia, Pianoforte, on Airs from "Maritana"—W. V. Wallace. Part Song for Male Voices—J. L. Hatton. Madrigal, "In the merry spring"—Ravencroft. Part Song, "Oh! who will o'er the downs"—R. L. Pearsall.

Hauptmann's "motet"—clever and well written as it is—was placed at great disadvantage in coming immediately after Mendelssohn's Psalm, an incomparable masterpiece, and executed in the most finished style imaginable. Meyerbeer's impressive setting of the Lord's Prayer, a sacred composition in the strictest application of the term, was not so well sung, the voices dropping more than a tone before the conclusion, and the intonation not being always perfect. It was, nevertheless, encored.—London Musical World, March 31.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The last two concerts, Saturday the 17th and Saturday the 24th instant, did not present any novel points of interest. At the former the instrumental pieces comprised Haydn's symphony in B flat, and the overture to Melusina (Mendelssohn) and the Flauto Magico (Mozart). Madame Sainton-Dolby and Miss Paropa were the vocalists, and M. Sainton played two solos of his own composition on the violin. The ladies were encored severally in Mr. Balfe's ballad, "The green trees whispered low," and the cavatina from Victorine, "Oh, bright were my visions;" and M. Sainton was loudly applauded in both his performances, chiefly in his Lucresia Borgia. There was a good attendance.

At the concert, last Saturday, Mr. Augustus Manns, not satisfied, let us suppose, with the reception accorded at the concert on the 10th instant, to Robert Schumann's symphony in B flat, introduced it a second time, and announced in the programme its repetition as by "special desire." This, no doubt, referred to a few individuals, lovers of the music of Robert Schumann, who, with great philanthropy, would convert all to their own way of thinking. The symphony did not much improve on closer acquaintance. [So says the London Musical World.]

THE SONG FESTIVAL: A Compendium of Music of every variety; Psalmody, Songs, Ballads, Duets, Trios, Quartets, Gleees, Sacred and Operatic Choruses, suited to the wants of Choirs, Singing Classes, Glee Clubs, Musical Conventions, Chorus Societies, and the Drawing-Room. By Virgil C. Taylor. 50

When this work appeared—some months ago—the most devoted friends and admirers of Mr. Taylor's music would hardly have dared to predict for it a success so flattering as its increasing popularity and constantly extending use has already established. If any one feature may be specified as particularly characterizing the work, it may be said of it—there are no pieces contained in it designed only to "fill up" the book—each piece has a specific character, which renders it difficult to decide which, if any, could be dispensed with.

Of the Psalmody department, while there are many tunes of a plain and easy form which come within the scope of singers but of ordinary attainments to execute, we feel constrained to say, we doubt whether, in the same space, the book can be found, which contains as many gems, of a strictly classical and artistic make, as this. The most fastidious Quartet choirs of city churches would hardly desire anything in the shape of Psalmody more intrinsically select and beautiful than the tunes Lawren, Reeves, Jernold, Piper, Dexter, Bodstein, Yinton, and others similar; while the Secular department is again equally choice in its varied contributions of Songs, Duets, Trios, Quartets and Choruses, both of the Oratorio and Operatic order. The Quartet, "Moonlight on the Sea," is not only a rare production, even among its many competitors in the work, but is a composition upon whose merits may justly be based the claim of celebrity for its author to a degree challenging comparison with the most brilliant efforts of European composers. To commend music of such a character to the numberless musical societies through the country who are in quest of that which is truly desirable, is but an act of public good; as, not only the very existence of all such associations depends, in part, upon the perfection of the music performed, but the general advancement of the cause of music will be in correspondence with the salient qualities of that which is practiced, the character of which will go to form the public taste.

The familiar arrangement of "Joy! Joy! Freedom to-day," in the Opera Chorus Book, from "The Gipsy's Warning," will be found in the "Song Festival," in a new and attractive garb; in place of the too lengthy and slow Trio for Tenors and Bass in A flat in the original, Mr. Taylor has substituted a most brilliant duet; together with other changes and alterations, which render the piece, according to his version, one of the most stirring and popular choruses of the Opera kind extant. Without extending our notice of the work unduly, we will call attention to but one more piece, the last in the book and extending over nine pages, "The Song makes Fresh the Weary." The style of this Chorus is eminently operative throughout. The first movement being an Allegretto in six-eight time, and followed by a Tenor Solo in A flat, accompanied by a Trio for male voices. This latter portion of the piece not only excels anything else from Mr. Taylor's pen in the book, but in point of elaborate structure as well as classical music, is hardly surpassed—by anything of a similar strain—by the standard operas of the day.

In view of the unusual merits of this work, it is but expressing what a universal cultivated musical taste, upon becoming acquainted with its true character, would heartily endorse, to say, that the diffusion of a musical literature like that composing the pages of the "Song Festival," is the planting of seed in musical soil, which will not only prove prolific of an abundant harvest, but will be preeminently instrumental in refining and elevating the musical taste of the country to a most desired degree.

Leonora.

From ELISS POLKO's "Musikalische Märchen, Phantasien und Skizzen;" translated by FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

"A victory over the heart is great,—
I honor the brave who wins it;
But he who conquers by means of his heart,
From me gains the loftiest honor!" —SCHILLER.

The merry inhabitants of Vienna, busily, restlessly as they hasten from one day to another, fond of change although they may be, have displayed in one particular manner a true seriousness and depth of feeling; I mean, in their sympathy with their great musicians. The Viennese is, and always was, as proud of every one of them, as of his being, and of his Prater. If the Viennese did not always take care that their dear Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven possessed full purses and comfortable dwellings, we must not blame them for it; every true Viennese has enough to do to take care of himself. But every one of them rejoices from the bottom of his heart, when he hears a piece by one of his darlings, wishes "long life" to them (with the glass in his hand, be sure!) and would swing his hat to the earth, if either of these renowned men fell in his way. Don't smile; for even that is a great deal! How many lofty spirits in commonplace bodies go past men, and no one gives them a kind glance, or even a "thank you" for what they have created. And yet such glances and thanks penetrate the soul like a spring sunbeam, and no man, however high he may tower above the rest, can live without them, and not suffer from the want.

In the uncommonly fine month of June of the year 1822, at the same hour of the afternoon, a man might have been seen walking up and down the so-called "water-glacia," from whose path every one moved respectfully. This lonely promenade came neither earlier nor later; always at the same hour; neither heat nor rain caused him to accelerate his pace; slowly, proudly, and securely he walked on, his glance turned earthwards, his hands crossed behind him. Thick grey hair hung roughly round the thoughtful forehead; he did not trouble himself, if the wind tossed it about or drove it over his eyes. No one could pass him by unmarked; the stamp of the extraordinary was visibly imprinted on his brow; the power of genius drew a glory around his bended head. Every child could say "that is LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN, who has made such splendid music," and would cease playing, stop the ball that was rolling under the Master's feet; hide his whip, or knock down his humming-top, when the grave man passed by. Old and young, high and low, stepped aside, or greeted him respectfully, without hoping that the greeting would be returned.

Charcoal carriers, bending under heavy burdens, stopped patiently until the wonderful dreamer had passed; each and all honored him in his own manner. Just at that time, the Viennese felt more interest than ever in the venerated apparition; Beethoven had finished his first and only opera "Leonora," (he afterwards named it "Fidelio") some months before, and had so far obstinately refused to bring it out. Stubborn, deaf to all entreaty, he kept the precious score locked up in his desk. "I cannot find the Leonora I want," said he to his friends, who untiringly besought him to produce the work. "To be sure, there are plenty of songstresses, but not the one for me. My Leonora shall not fling out a single trill, or break her neck over senseless runs; neither will she change her dress ten times; she need not even be exceedingly handsome; but something she must have besides her voice, and what that something is I will not tell you, for you would only laugh at the 'mad' Beethoven more than ever. Let the opera rest, and don't trouble yourselves about it!" But his impatient friends would not let it rest; they worried the great musician every day, sent him one songstress after another, and at last began to get seriously angry. Beethoven waited patiently. One evening, however, some visitors came hastily in, and told him wonderful things about the first appearance of a young songstress, with whom all Vienna was enraptured. She was the daughter of the great actress, SOPHIE SCHROEDER, not yet seventeen; she had lately come with her parents from Hamburg to Vienna, where they talked of settling. As Mozart's Pamina, every one had been delighted with her voice and figure; a great future was prophesied for her; all this was told to the Master, and then they said that every one hoped this fair hand would bring the hidden treasures of his last work to light. Then Beethoven cried out: "What? trust my jewel to a child, a creature just from school? I think you must be dreaming, or else curiosity has robbed you of your senses. No, Ludwig van Beethoven did not compose his Leonora for a thing of seventeen! But I am tired of all this annoyance, and I declare to you, once for all, that I will burn my opera, if any one asks me another question about it!"

His anger was so imposing, his eyes blazed so resolutely, his voice grumbled so deeply, and so many storm-clouds gathered on his broad forehead, that his friends slid off without a word; and from that time the Master no longer heard the name "Leonora" forever ringing in his ears. It had happened for some time, that the great master, on his return from his daily walk, met, at a little distance from the city, a fair-haired young girl. She usually wore a simple white dress, a plain straw bonnet, and a dark red shawl. Like all who were in the habit of meeting the composer, she stepped respectfully aside; but she did so with a peculiar grace, at the same time fixing her great eyes on the master's face. Those were eyes that had power to bind and set free! eyes that could wake up a dreaming soul, attract, and hold it fast! eyes of very dark blue, with thick lashes and brows, eyes of impassioned gravity, and fathomless depth. Only the dreamer Beethoven could have so long withstood the fixed glance of such eyes; many times he passed by the young girl without observing her. Her delicate lips trembled as he strode by; it seemed as though she wished to speak, but could not; she looked after him with a mixture of admiration and pain, and then returned slowly back to the city. One day, toward five o'clock in the afternoon, a heavy storm blew up. The thunder rolled nearer, lightning began to pierce the clouds, the birds fluttered anxiously around, and every one out hurried to reach a shelter. Gusts of wind blew at intervals, but as yet no rain fell to cool the sultry air. Just then Ludwig van Beethoven, looking like a prophet, was returning from his walk. With his head upraised, his brow clearer than ordinary, he seemed to enjoy the fine spectacle. He surely understood the sublime speech overhead, for he smiled when the thunder rolled, and looked undazzled at every flash of lightning. For him the roaring of the storm was the mighty trumpet tone of a great symphony of Nature; the wind that tossed his hair, seemed almost to bear him aloft; the grave man then raised his arms in a glad, silent enthusiasm, and it seemed as if he was expecting an angel to visit him on the path of the lightning. Oh, that the angel would bring a gigantic harp, so that he might storm forth those sublime conceptions, that now filled his soul to overflowing! Indeed, Beethoven really thought he saw an angel before him; a form clad in white stood near; he stared at it, expecting a miracle. But the supposed angel tremblingly stretched out her hands to him, murmured a few unintelligible words, and looked imploringly in his face. He gazed astonished at a pale girl. This charming face and figure impressed him like a remembrance; surely he had seen her before? Probably in a dream? He could not be certain. "Child," said he at last, kindly, "you should not be out in such weather. Are you belated, or have you lost your way?"

"I was only going to you," she answered with a mild and yet firm voice.

"To me? and what did you desire from me?"

"Your—Leonora!"

Beethoven drew back. "Who are you?"

"Wilhelmina Schröder. I have come here several days with this prayer, but never before dared to breathe it."—"And did you not see what a cloud was gathering? Are you not afraid?"

"I only fear one thing; that my prayer will be denied!" The master answered not a word—he looked friendly into the eyes of the maiden. She did not cast them earthwards, but, blushing warmly, she returned his glance with one as firm. Then seizing her little hand with his strong grasp, Beethoven breathed deeply, and quietly said: "Take courage, and come and see me to-morrow my child; I think I have found my Leonora. But now, let me conduct you home."

She took his arm with a beating heart, glowing cheeks, and a happy smile; the fulfilment of her wish was approaching. The storm had broken, the flashes of lightning were fainter, and the rain was beginning to fall. At the city gate, Beethoven handed the young girl with fatherly care into a passing hackney-coach, and Wilhelmine Schröder gave him her mother's address. With childlike enthusiasm she kissed the master's hand as she bade him farewell; he turned to go. But he must look back once more—and then he saw the young girl's charming face turned towards him from the carriage window. Pale with emotion, her serious young brow overshadowed with waving golden hair, she bowed to him, while her magical eyes looked their farewell. Ludwig van Beethoven felt a soft warmth stream over his heart; a happy, yet melancholy presentiment thrilled him; he thought to himself: "This woman will shed another ray of sunshine over my path, but it will be the last!"

And on the following morning, the young songstress, WILHELMINA SCHROEDER, stood near Beethoven at the piano. The score of his "Leonora" lay open before them. He explained to her the text of the opera in a few words, then passing over the first numbers, for Jaquino and Marcellina he hummed Leonora's part in the quartet, "Tis marvellous to me," beating time with one hand, and accompanying with the other. The young girl followed every tone with deep attention. At the trio, "Well done, my son," her blue eyes lit up gloriously; but when the fine tone-painting of the great air, "Monster, whither hastenest thou," was unfolded to her, a thrill of emotion ran through her whole being. With every number the young listener's admiration increased, the master grew more enthusiastic, and she scarcely noticed that the voice, which carried these noble things through her ear to her soul, was harsh and broken. She did not know, that at the duet of the second act, "Now quickly on, the grave dug freshly," the tears were rolling down her cheeks; she did not raise her eyes from the inspired composer, whom she venerated with all her heart. What a picture the frame of that poor room contained in these two figures, of grave and glorious autumn, and of smiling spring! The master in his fur-bordered dressing-gown, with glowing eyes and expressive brow, buried in his own creation, and but occasionally glancing up seriously to his young listener; the maiden, her face, with its pure lines, glowing redly with spring freshness, while sunbeams seemed to play in the hair that waved along her cheeks, and was gathered in a low knot behind. Beethoven went on faster and faster; his hand hurried over the keys. "Now comes the moment of highest emotion," said he; "in it is collected every ray from the other parts of the opera. Observe this cry, my child, for here is the place to show whether I am deceived in you or not." And now, with thrilling enthusiasm, he intoned that famous cry, "first kill his wife!" Now Wilhelmine Schröder first fully comprehended what a gigantic gift it was, for which she had stretched out her hands. Pleasure and fear alternately filled her breast. "First kill his wife!" This cry re-echoed through her soul; she heard nothing more, and the brilliant finale went by her like a dream. But when Beethoven rose, closing the score, she said, solemnly: "Give me your blessing, before I venture on this attempt, so that I may succeed in it!" She bowed her head, the master thoughtfully laid his hand on her fair locks, and a smile of satisfaction played over his face, like an autumn sunbeam. Before the young girl slept that night, she folded her hands, and closed her morning prayer with these words: "O God, let me become such a Leonora as he has dreamed of, so that I may bring one more joy to his heart."

Some weeks after this scene, WILHELMINA SCHROEDER made her first appearance in the opera of "Fidelio" at Vienna, and became the embodiment of that highest ideal of heroic love, which Beethoven's genius had created. The composer sat in a small, dark box near the stage. Alas, the powerful and pleasing tones that streamed from the young singer's breast penetrated but in part to his already almost closed ear; but he saw the glow and inspiration of her expressive face, he saw the impassioned eyes, the abandonment and enthusiasm that awakened so much delight in the audience, that their applause, in its outbreak, resembled the roaring of an ocean. The second act proceeded; the faithful wife descended to the gloomy dungeon, reached out the bread to her starving husband, ran through every degree of soul-martyrdom, until that wonderful point of light, that mighty outcry, "First kill his wife!" Beethoven rose feverishly when the chord was struck, his breath was suspended, he trembled all over, and his eyes hung on the lips of the songstress. A second only, she seemed to hesitate, then drawing herself up, in truly sublime beauty, the now famous B flat thrilled through the souls of her electrified hearers, in a tone vibrating with the loftiest passion. And, as if endowed with miraculous power, this strong, soulful tone broke through all barriers, and penetrated, like a missionary of light, to the closed ear of the master. Suddenly all seemed clear within him, golden tone-waves streamed over his soul; his Leonora sang and sounded aloud; in the glorious overpowering B flat that he heard, the whole seemed mirrored, as all things may be reflected in one clear drop of water. Nameless joy, unbounded satisfaction filled his heart; he had not been disappointed in his Leonora! Long buried wishes, long slumbering hopes arose as from the repose of death, and looked smilingly at him. But body and soul were only inured to sorrow: the sudden feeling of overpowering joy subdued the man, strong only in suffering and resignation; Ludwig van Beethoven sank back, almost fainting. This representation of "Fidelio," was indeed the last, but probably also the brightest sunbeam that fell on the gloomy path of the great composer. But what was that "something," which Beethoven wished the representative of his Leonora to possess, and which he found in the young girl's blue eyes?

Wilhelmine Schröder made "Fidelio" famous, all over the world. How is it possible for any one, who has once heard her matchless personation of Leonora, ever to forget her? Hundreds of songstresses have sung Leonora since; but which of them took the soul captive like her?—Was no one, then, so handsome as WILHELMINA SCHROEDER DEVRIENT? Had no one so powerful a voice, or such captivating grace?—Charming women clothed themselves in the shabby male attire of Fidelio; splendid voices sang the air, "Monster, whither hastenest thou?" Mistresses of the art of representation lavished all their strength on this creation; but did the outcry, "First kill his wife!" ever ring half so sublimely, so thrillingly, from any lips, as from those of that fair-haired woman? And why was it so?—Wilhelmine Schröder Devrient possessed the rare charm that overcomes and conquers the world; that mysterious gift, which, in our prosaic, cold-blooded days, is fast becoming a tradition; that costliest earthly treasure, that fairest blessing of Heaven,—a warm heart!

Review of Marx's Beethoven.

The English or American reader, whose only biography of Beethoven has been the translation of Schindler's work by Moscheles, will be pleased to find scattered through Marx's two volumes a number of interesting extracts from the "Conversation-Books." These are not always given exactly as in the originals, although the sense is proved intact. For instance, (Vol. I, p. 341,) speaking of the original overture to "Leonore,"—afterwards printed as Op. 138,—Marx says, "It shows us, as in a mirror of past happiness, a view of that which is hereafter to reward Leonore and raise Florestan from his woe. Yes, Beethoven himself is in theory of this opinion. In his Conversation-Books we read the following:—

"Aristotle, in his 'Poetics,' remarks, 'Tragic heroes must at first live in great happiness and splendor.' This we see in Egmont. Wenn sie nun [so] recht glücklich sind, [so] kommt mit [auf] einem Mal das Schicksal und schlingt einen Knoten um ihr Haupt [über ihren Haupte] den sie nicht mehr zu lösen vermögen. Muth und Trotz tritt an die Stelle [der Reue] und verweigen sehen sie dem Gesckicke, [und sie sehen verweigen dem Gesckicke,] ja, dem Tod in's Aug'."

The words in brackets show the variations from the original; they are slight, but will soon be seen to have significance.

Again, Marx says, (Vol. II, p. 214, note,) "In one of the Conversation-Books Schindler remarks, 'Ich bin sehr gespannt auf die Charakterisirung [der Sätze] der B dur Trio. . . . Der erste Satz trümt von lauter Glückseligkeit [Glück und Zufriedenheit]. Auch Muthwille, heiteres Tändeln und Eigensinn [mit permission — Beethovenscher] ist darin.' [Should be "und Eigensinn (Beethovenische) ist darin, mit Permission."]

On page 217 of the same volume is part of a conversation between Beethoven and his friend Peters, dated 1819. The Conversation-Book from which it is taken is dated, in Beethoven's own hand, "March and April, 1820."

But enough for our purpose, which is to prove that Marx knows nothing of the Conversation-Books from personal inspection, although he always quotes them in such a manner as to impress the reader with the idea that the extracts made are his own. Now, 1st, all his extracts are in the second edition of Schindler's "Biography;" 2d, all the variations from the original are found word for word in Schindler's excerpts; 3d, the first of the above three examples, which Marx takes for an expression of Beethoven's views, was written by Schindler himself, for his master's perusal! But though a biography give us nothing new in relation to the hero, still it may be of great interest and value from the manner in which well-known authorities are collected and digested, and the facts presented in a picturesque, fascinating, living, narrative. Such a work is Irving's "Goldsmith." Such a work is not Marx's "Beethoven." It is neither one thing nor another,—neither a biography nor a critical examination of the master's works. It is a little of both,—an attempt to combine the two, and a very unsuccessful one. Biography and criticism are so strangely mixed up, jumbled together,—anecdotes of different periods so absurdly brought into juxtaposition,—chronology so oddly abused,—that one can obtain a far better idea of the man Beethoven by reading Marx's authorities than his digest of them; and as to his works, those upon which we want information, which we have no opportunity to hear, which have not been subjects of criticism and discussion for a whole generation,—on these he has little or nothing to say.

But the extreme carelessness with which Marx cites his authorities is worthy of notice; here are a few examples.

Vol. I, p. 13. Here we find the well-known anecdote of Beethoven's playing several variations upon Righini's air, "Vieni Amore," from memory, and improvising others, before the Abbé Sterkel. Wegeler is the original authority for the anecdote, the point of which depends upon the fact that the printed variations were a composition by Beethoven. Marx here and elsewhere in his book attributes them to Sterkel.

Ib. p. 31. Speaking of the pleasure Van Swieten took in Beethoven's playing of Bach's fugues, and of the dislike of the latter to being urged to play, Marx quotes as follows: "He came then (relates Ries, who became his pupil in 1800) back to me with clouded brow and out of temper" etc. To me,—Ries—a boy of sixteen,—and Beethoven already the composer all of whose works half a dozen publishers were ready to take at any prices he chose to fix! Ries relates no such thing. Wegeler does, but of a period five years before Ries came to Vienna; moreover, he relates it in relation to Beethoven's dislike to being urged to play in mixed companies, the fact having no relation whatever to Van Swieten's weekly music-parties.

Ib. p. 33. Beethoven is now twenty-five. "At this time, as it seems, there has been no talk of ill health." Directly against the statement of Wegeler.

Ib. p. 38. The Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 15, "Probably commenced in 1800, since it was offered to Hoffmeister, Jan. 5, 1801." He relates from Wegeler, that Beethoven wrote the finale when suffering violently from colic. How is it possible for a man to overlook the next line, "I helped him as much as I could with simple remedies," and not associate it with Wegeler's statement that he himself left Vienna "in the middle of 1796"? This fixes the date absolutely four or five years earlier than Marx's probability. He is equally unlucky in his reading of the letters of Hoffmeister; for the Concerto offered him Jan. 5, 1801, was not this one, but that in B flat, Op. 19.

Ib. p. 186. The Sonata, Op. 22, "Out of the year 1802." If Marx will turn to the letters to Hoffmeister again, he will find this Sonata offered for publication with the Concerto.

Ib. p. 341. "Schindler, who, however, first became acquainted with Beethoven in 1808, and first came into close connection with him in 1813." Compare Schindler, 2nd ed. p. 95. "It was in the year 1814 that I first became personally acquainted with Beethoven." In 1808 Schindler was a boy of thirteen years, in a Gymnasium, and had not yet come to Vienna.

Vol. II. p. 36. Sonata, Op. 57. "The finale, as Ries relates, was begotten in a night of storm"; and on this text Marx discourses through a page or two. Ries relates no such thing.

Ib. p. 179. "Once more, relates Schindler, the two (Goethe and Beethoven) met each other," etc. For Schindler, read Lenz.

Ib. p. 191. "The Philharmonic Society in London presented to him . . . a magnificent grand-pianoforte of Broadwood's manufacture." Schindler says expressly, "Presented by Ferd. Ries, John Cramer, and Sir George Smart." Cannot Marx read German?

Ib. p. 329. We give one more instance of Marx's method of citing authorities,—a very curious one. It is an extract from a letter written to the Schotts in Mayence, signed A. Schindler, containing an account of Beethoven's last hours, and published in the "Cäcilia" in full. Here is the passage:—

"When I came to him, on the morning of the 24th of March, (relates Anselm Hüttenbrenner, a musical friend and composer, of Grätz, who had hastened thither to see Beethoven once more,) I found his whole countenance distorted, and him so weak, that, with the greatest exertions, he could bring out but two or three intelligible words." Anselm Hüttenbrenner!

Throughout these volumes we find a certain vagueness of statement in connection with the names of musicians with whom Beethoven came in contact, which raises the question, whether Marx has no biographical dictionary in his house, not even a copy of Schilling's Encyclopædia, for which he wrote so many biographies, and "indeed all the articles signed A. B. M."? At times, however, the statements are not so vague. For instance,—in the anecdote already referred to, Marx makes the two Rombergs and Franz Ries introduce the "fifteen-year-old virtuoso" to Sterkel,—that is, in 1785 or '86. At that date, (see Schilling,) Andreas Romberg was a boy of eighteen, Bernard a boy of fifteen; moreover, they did not come to Bonn, until 1790, when Beethoven was nearly twenty years old. In 1793-4 Marx makes Schenck "the to him [Beethoven] well-known and valued composer of the 'Dorfbarbier,'" which opera was not written until some years later. In 1815 died Beethoven's "friend and countryman, Salomon, of Bonn, in London." It is possible that Beethoven may have occasionally seen Salomon at Bonn, but that violinist went to London as early as 1781, after having then been for several years in Prince Henry's chapel in Berlin.

These things may, perhaps, strike the reader as of minor importance, mere blemishes. So be it then; we will turn to a vexed question, which has a literary importance, and see what light Marx throws upon it. We refer to Bettine's letters to Goethe upon Beethoven, and the composer's letters to her, the authority of which has been strongly questioned. Marx gives them, Vol. II. pp. 121-135, and we turned eagerly to them, expecting to find, from one who has for thirty years or more lived in the same city with the author, the questio vexata fully put to rest. Nothing of the kind. He quotes them from Schindler with Schindler's remarks upon them, to which he gives his assent. As to the letters of Beethoven to Bettine, he has not even done that lady the justice to give them as she has printed them, but rests satisfied with a copy confessedly taken from the English translation! Of these Marx says, "These letters—one has not the right, perhaps, to declare them outright creations of fancy; at all events, there is no judicial proof of this, no more than of their authenticity—if they are not imagined, they are certainly translated . . . from Beethoven into the Bettine speech. Never—compare all the letters and writings of Beethoven which are known with these Bettine epistles—never did Beethoven so write. . . . If he wrote to Bettine, then she has poetized [überdichtet] his letters, and she has not done even this well; we have in them Beethoven as seen in the mirror Bettine." He adds in a note, "In the highest degree girl-like and equally un-Beethoven-like are these constant repetitions: 'liebe, liebe; liebe, liebe; liebe, liebe; gute; bald, bald!'"

What does Marx say to this beginning of a letter to Tiedge: "Jeden Tag schwebte mir immer folgende Brief an Sie, Sie, Sie, immer vor"? Or to these repetitions from a series of notes written also from Toplitz in the summer of 1812? "Lieben Sie wohl, liebe, gute A." "Liebe, gute A., seit ich gestern." etc. "Scheint der Mond. . . so sehen Sie den kleinen, kleinsten aller Menschen bei sich," etc.

And so on this point Marx leaves us just as wise as we were before. There is a gentleman who can decide by a word as to the authenticity of these letters of Beethoven, since he originally furnished them for publication in the English translation of Schindler's "Biography." We refer to Mr. Chorley, of the "London Athenæum." Meanwhile we venture to give Marx's opinion as much weight as we think it deserves, and continue to believe in the letters; more especially because, as published by Bettine herself in 1848, each is remarkable for certain peculiarly Beethoven-like abuses of punctuation, orthography, and capital letters, which carry more weight to our minds than the unsupported opinions of a dozen Professors Marx.

Justice requires that we pass from merely biographical topics, which are evidently not the forte of Professor Marx, to some of those upon which he has bestowed far more space, and doubtless far more labor and pains, and upon which, in this work, he doubtless also rests his claim to our applause.

On page 199 of Vol. I. begins a division of the work entitled by the author "Chorische Werke." In previous chapters, Beethoven's pianoforte compositions—sonatas, trios, the quintet, etc., up to Op. 54, exclusive of the concertos for that instrument and orchestra—have been treated. In this we have a very pleasing account of the gradual progress of the composer from the concerto to the full splendor of the grand symphony.

"The composer Beethoven," says Marx, "was, as we have seen, also a virtuoso. No one can be both, without feeling himself drawn to the composition of concertos. These works then follow, and in close relation to the pianoforte compositions of Beethoven, with and without the accompaniment of solo instruments; and to them others, which may just here be best brought under one general head for notice. From them we look directly upward to orchestral and symphonic works. To all these we give the general name of 'choral' works, for want of a better, a term which in fact belongs but to vocal music, and is exceedingly ill adapted to a part of the compositions now under consideration. The term, however, is used here as pointing at the significance of the orchestra to Beethoven."

Marx's theory of Beethoven's progress, taking continually bolder and loftier flights until he reaches the symphony, must necessarily be based upon the chronology of the works in question,—a basis which he adopts, but evidently, in the case of two or three of them, with some hesitation; yet the theory has too great a charm for him to be lightly thrown aside.

We will bring into a table the compositions which he is now considering, together with the dates of their composition, that we may obtain a clearer view of their bearings upon the point in question.

Concerto in C for Pianoforte and Orchestra, op. 15. 1800. (See p. 38.)
Concerto in B flat, op. 19. 1801.
Concerto in C minor, op. 37. Not dated.
Six Quatuors for Bowed Instruments, op. 18. Published in 1801-2, but "begun earlier."

Quintet, op. 29. 1802.
Septet, op. 20. Not dated.
Prometheus. Ballet, op. 43. Performed March 28, 1801.
Grand Symphony, op. 21. 1799 or 1800.
Grand Symphony, op. 86. Performed 1800.

A glance at the dates in this table throws doubt upon the theory; the doubt is increased by the consideration that all these important works are, according to Marx, the labor of only three years! But let us turn back and collect into another table the pianoforte works which are also attributed to the same epoch.

Pianoforte Trio, op. 11. 1799.
Three Pianoforte Sonatas, op. 10. 1799.
Two do. do. op. 14. 1799.
Adelaide, Song, op. 49. 1798 or '99.
Sonata for Piano and Horn, op. 17. 1800.
Sonata Pathétique, op. 13. 1800.
Christus am Oelberg, Cantata, op. 85. 1800.
Quintet, op. 16. 1801.
Sonata, op. 22. 1802.
do. op. 26. 1802.
do. op. 28. 1802.

From this list we have excluded works which Marx says were published (herausgegeben) during these years, selecting only those which he calls "aus dem Jahre,"—belonging to such a year.

Marx himself Vol. I. p. 246 et seq. shows us that the works above-mentioned, dated 1802, belong to an earlier period; for in the "first months" of that year Beethoven fell into a dangerous illness, which unfitted him for labor throughout the season.

We have, then, as the labor of three years, three grand pianoforte concertos with orchestra, six string quartets, a quintet, a septet, a grand ballet, and two symphonies, for great works; and for minor productions,—by-play,—nine pianoforte solo sonatas, one for pianoforte and horn, a pianoforte trio, a quintet, the "Adelaide," and the "Christ on the Mount of Olives," a productiveness (and such a productiveness!) not surpassed by Mozart or Handel in their best and most marvellous years.

But these twenty-eight works, in fact, belong only in part to those three years. The first concerto was finished before June, 1796; the second in Prague, 1798; the third was performed late in the autumn of 1800. A performance of the first symphony is recorded at least ten, of the second at least three months before that of the ballet. As this, the "Prometheus," was written expressly for Viganò, the arranger of the action, it is not to be supposed that any great lapse of time took place between the execution of the order for and the production of the music. In fact, Marx has no authorities, beyond Lenz's notices of the publication of the works in the above lists, for the dates which he has given to them; none whatever for placing the works of the first of our lists in that order; certainly none for placing Op. 37 before Op. 18, Op. 29 before Op. 20, and Op. 43 before Op. 21 and Op. 36. And yet, at the close of his remarks upon the septet, Op. 20, we read, "Each of the compositions here noticed" (namely, those in the first list down to the septet) "is a step away from the pianoforte to the orchestra. In the midst of them appears the first (!) orchestral work since the chivalrous ballet, to which the boy (?) Beethoven in former days gave being. It was again to be a ballet, 'Gli Uomini di Prometeo.'" Then follow remarks upon the ballet, closing thus: "On the 'Prometheus' he had tried the strength of his pinions; in the first symphony, 'Grande Sinfonie,' Op. 21, he floated calmly upon them at those heights where the spirit of Mozart had rested."

No, Herr Professor Marx, your pretty fancy is without basis. Chronology, "the eye of History," makes sad work of your theory. Pity that in your "researches" you met not one of those lists of the Electoral Chapel at Bonn, which would have shown you that the young Beethoven learned to wield the orchestra in that best of all schools, the orchestra itself!

Three chapters of Book Second (Vol. I. pp. 239-307) are entitled "Helden Weihe," (Consecration of the Hero,) "Die Sinfonie Eroica und die ideale Musik," (The Heroic Symphony and Ideal Music,) and "Die Zukunft vor dem Richterstuhl der Vergangenheit" (The Future before the Judgment Seat of the Past). Save the first fourteen pages, which are given to Beethoven's sickness in 1802, the testament which he wrote at that time, and some remarks upon the "Christ on the Mount of Olives," these chapters are devoted to the "Heroic Symphony," its history, its explanation, and a polemical discourse directed against the views of Wagner, Berlioz, Oulibichef, and others.

The circumstances under which this remarkable work was written, the history of its origin and completion, are so clearly related by Ries and Schindler, that it seems hardly possible to make any great blunder in repeating them. Marx has, however, a very happy talent for getting out of the path, even when it lies directly before him.

"When, therefore, Bernadotte," says he, "at that time French Ambassador at Vienna, and sharer in the admiration which the Lichnowskis and others of high rank felt for Beethoven, proposed to him to pay his homage to the hero [Napoleon] in a grand instrumental work, he found the artist in the best disposition thereto; perhaps such thoughts had already occurred to his mind. In the year 1802, in autumn, he put his hand already to the work, began first in the following year earnestly to labor upon it, and, with many interruptions, and the production of various compositions in the mean time, completed it in 1804."

From this passage, and from remarks in connection with it, it is clear that Professor Marx supposes Bernadotte to have been in Vienna in 1802-3, and to have ordered this symphony of Beethoven. Schindler's words, when speaking of his conversation with the composer in 1823, on this topic are, "Beethoven erinnerte sich lebhaft, dass Bernadotte wirklich zuerst die Idee zur Sinfonie Eroica in ihm rege gemacht hat" (Beethoven remembered distinctly that it really was Bernadotte who first awakened in him the idea of the "Heroic Symphony"). On turning to the article on Bernadotte in the "Conversations-Lexicon," we find that the period of his embassy embraced but a few months of the year 1798.

It seems to us a very suggestive and important fact toward the comprehension of Beethoven's design in this work, that the conception of it had been floating before his mind and slowly assuming definite form during the space of four years, before he put hand to the composition. Six years passed from the date of its conception before it lay complete upon the table, with the single word "Bonaparte" in large letters at the top of the title-page, and "L. Beethoven" at the bottom, with nothing between. And what, according to Marx, is this product of so much study and labor? A musical description of a battle; a funeral march to the memory of the fallen; the gathering of the armies for their homeward march; a description of the blessings of peace. A most lame and impotent interpretation! Marx somewhere says, that Beethoven never wrought twice upon the same idea; hence the funeral march of the Symphony cannot have been originally intended in honor of a hero,—we agree with him so far,—for this task he had once already accomplished in the Sonata, Op. 26. But then, if the first movement of the Symphony be a battle-piece, how came its author to compose another, and one so entirely different, in 1812?

How any one, with the recollection of Beethoven's fondness for describing character in music, even in youth upon the pianoforte,—with the "Coriolanus Overture" before him, and the "Wellington's Victory at Vittoria" at hand,—and, above all, with any knowledge of the composer's love for the universal, the all-embracing, and his contempt for minute musical painting, as shown by his sarcasms upon passages in Haydn's "Creation,"—can suppose the first movement of the "Heroic Symphony" to be in the main intended as a battle-picture, passes our comprehension. It may be so. It is but a matter of opinion. We have nothing from Beethoven himself upon the point, unless we may suppose, that, when, four years later, he printed upon the programme, at the first performance of the "Pastoral Symphony," "Rather the expression of feeling than musical painting," he was guarding against a mistake which had been made as to the intent of the "Eroica."

We have no space to waste in following Marx, either through his exposition of his battle theory, his explanations of the other movements of the Symphony, or his polemics against previous writers. His programme seems to us little, if at all, better than those which he controverts. Instead of this, we venture to offer our own to the reader's common sense, which, if it does not satisfy, at least shows that Marx has not put the question forever at rest.

"Rather the expression of feeling than musical painting" seems to us a key to the understanding of this, as well as of the "Pastoral Symphony." Mere musical painting, and the composition of works to order—as is proved by the "Wellington's Victory," the "Coriolanus Overture," the music to "Prometheus," to the "Ruins of Athens," the "Glorreiche Augenblick," to say nothing of minor works, such as the First and Second Concertos, the Horn Sonata, etc.—Beethoven could and did despatch with extreme rapidity; but works of a different order, for which he could take his own time, and which were to be the expression of the grand feelings of his own great heart,—the composition of these was no light holiday-task. He could "make music" with all ease and rapidity; and had this been his aim, the extreme productiveness of the first years in Vienna shows that he might, perhaps, have rivalled Father Haydn himself in the number of his instrumental compositions. His difficulty was not in writing music, but in mastering the poetic conception, and finding that tone-speech which should express in epic progress, yet in obedience to the laws of musical form, the emotions, feelings, sentiments to be depicted. Hence the great length of time during which many of his works were subjects of meditation and study. Hence the six years which elapsed between the conception and completion of the "Heroic Symphony."

Beethoven passed his youth near the borders of France, under a government which allowed a republican personal freedom to its subjects. He was himself a strong republican, and old enough, when the crushed people over the border at length arose in their terrible energy against the King, to sympathize with them in their woe, perhaps in their vengeance. What to us is the horrible history of those years was to him the exciting news of the day; and it is not difficult to imagine the changes of feeling with which he would follow the political changes in France, the hopes of humanity now apparently lost in the gloom of the Reign of Terror, and now the rising of the day-star, precursor of a glorious day of republican freedom, in the marvellous successes of the cool, determined, energetic, stoical young conqueror of Italy, living, when Bernadotte fired his imagination by his descriptions of him, with his wife, the widow of Beauharnais, in a small house in an obscure street of the capital.

To us, then, the first movement of the "Heroic Symphony" is a study of character. In the "Coriolanus Overture" we have one side of a hero depicted: here we see him in all his aspects; we behold him in sorrow and in joy, in weakness and in strength, in the struggle and in victory,—overcoming opposition, and reducing all elements of discord to harmony and order by the force of his energetic will. It may be either a description of Napoleon, as Beethoven at that time understood his character,—we are inclined to this opinion,—or it may be a more general picture of a hero, to which the career of Napoleon had furnished but the original conception. The second movement is to us the wail of a nation ground to the dust by the iron heel of despotism.—France under the old regime.—France in the Reign of Terror.—France needing, as few nations have needed, the advent of a hero. The scherzo, with its trio, is not a form for minute painting of how the hero comes and saves; nor is this necessary; it has been sufficiently indicated in the first movement. We hear in it the awakening to new life, from the first whispers of hope, uttered mysteriously and with trembling lips, to the bright and cheering expression of a nation's joy,—not loudly and boisterously,—(Beethoven never gives such a language to the depths of happiness.)—in the exquisite passage for the horns in the trio. We agree with Marx in feeling the finale to be a picture of the blessings of that peace and quiet which the hero once more restores,—but peace and quiet where liberty and law, justice and order reign.

One fact in relation to the finale of this symphony has caused Professor Marx no little trouble. The movement is a theme and variations, with a fugue, and was published by Beethoven as a "Theme and Variations for the Pianoforte" (Op. 35, dedicated to Moritz Lichnowsky. The theme is from the finale of the "Promethens." Now what could induce Beethoven to make this use of so important a work, as such a finale to such a symphony, is to our Professor a puzzle. It troubles him on page 70, (Vol. I.) again on page 212, and finally on page 274. The same theme three times employed—he may say four, for it is one of the six "Contredances" by Beethoven, which appeared about that time,—and the third time so employed! Lenz happens to have overlooked the fact,—and so has Marx,—that the Variations for the Pianoforte, Op. 35, were advertised in the "Leipziger Musikalische Zeitung," already in November, 1803. How long Beethoven had kept them by him, how long it had taken them to make the then slow journey from Vienna to Leipzig, to be engraved, corrected, and made ready for sale, we are not informed. A very simple theory will account for all the phenomena in this case.

A very beautiful theme in the finale of "Prometheus" is admired. Beethoven composes variations upon it, and, to render it more worthy of his friend Lichnowsky, adds the fugue. The work becomes a favorite, and the theme being originally descriptive of the happiness of man in a state of culture and refinement, he decides to arrange it for orchestra, and give it a place in the new symphony. How if Lichnowsky proposed it?

A large proportion of the three chapters under consideration, as indeed, of many others, is directed against Oulibichef,—"Oulibichef-Thersites," as he names him in the Table of Contents. The very different manner in which he treats this gentleman, throughout his work, from that in which he speaks of Berlioz, Wagner, Lenz, is striking; but Oulibichef is dead, and cannot reply. Some of the Russian's contrapuntal objections to the "Heroic Symphony" are well answered; but, as we are satisfied with the poetic explanation of the work by neither, we must confess, that, after the crystalline clearness of Oulibichef, the muddy wordiness of Marx is not to edification.

We turn now to the chapters devoted to the opera "Leonore," afterwards "Fidelio,"—one of the most interesting topics in Beethoven's musical history. Here, at length, we do find something beyond what Ries and Schindler have recorded,—no longer the close coincidence in matters of fact with Lenz; indeed, the account of the changes made in transforming the three-act "Leonore" into the two-act "Fidelio" we consider the best piece of historic writing in the volumes, the one which gives us the greatest number of new facts, and most clearly and chronologically arranged. It is really quite unfortunate for Professor Marx, that Professor Otto Jahn of Bonn gave us, some years since, in his preface to the Leipzig edition of "Leonore," precisely the same facts, from precisely the same sources, and in some cases, we had almost said, in precisely the same words. The "coincidence" here is striking, as we cannot suppose Marx ever saw Jahn's publication, since he makes no reference to it. In the errors with which Marx spices his narrative occasionally, the coincidence ceases. Here are some instances. According to Marx, one reason of the ill success of the opera at Vienna, in 1805-6, was the popularity of that upon the same subject by Paer. The Viennese first heard the latter in 1809. Again, at the first production of the "Fidelio," in 1814, Marx says, the Leonore Overture No. 3 was played because that in E flat was not finished. Seyfried says expressly, the overture to the "Ruins of Athens." Marx speaks of the proposals made to Beethoven in 1823 to compose the "Melusine," and still another text, and so speaks as to leave the impression, that, from the "fall of the opera" in 1806, the composer had purposely kept aloof from the stage. Does the Professor know nothing of Beethoven's application in 1807 to the Theater-Direktion of the imperial playhouses, to be employed as regular operatic composer? of the opera "Romulus?" of his correspondence with Koerner, Rellstab, and still others? It appears not.

We must close our article somewhere; it is already, perhaps, too long; we add, therefore, but a general remark or two.

To many readers Marx's discussions of Beethoven's last works will be found of interest and value, though written in that turgid, vague, confused style, "words, words, words," which the Germans denominate by the expressive term, Geschwätz. This is especially the case with his essays upon the great "Missa Solennis," and the "Ninth Symphony."

We cannot rise from the perusal of this "Life of Beethoven" without feeling something akin to indignation. Were it a possible supposition, we should imagine it to be a thing manufactured to sell, and, indeed, in some such manner as this: The labors of Lenz taken, without acknowledgment, for the skeleton of the work; Wegeler, Ries, Schindler, and Seyfried at hand for citations, where Lenz fails to give more than a reference; Oulibichef on the table to supply topics for polemical discussion; a few periodicals and papers, which have come accidentally into his possession, to afford here and there an anecdote or a letter; the works of Professor A. B. Marx supplying the necessary authorities upon points in musical science. As for any original research, that is out of the question. Why stop to verify a fact, to decide a disputed point, to search out new matter? The market waits, the publisher presses, so, hurry-scurry, away we go, and the book is done! Seriously, such a book, from one with such opportunities at command, is a disgrace to the institution in which its author occupies the station of Professor.

When Schindler wrote, Johann van Beethoven, the brother, and Carl van Beethoven, the nephew, were still alive, and feelings of delicacy led him to do little more than hint at those domestic and family relations and sorrows which for several years rendered the great composer much of the time unfit for labor, and which at last brought him to the grave. When Marx wrote, all had passed away, who could be wounded by a plain statement of the facts in the case. Until we have such a statement, none but he who has gone through the labor of studying the original authorities, as they exist in Berlin, can know the real greatness, perhaps also the weaknesses, of Beethoven in those last years. None can know how his heart was torn, how he poured out, concentrated all the love of his great heart upon his adopted son, but to learn "how sharper than the serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child." Nothing of all this in Marx. He quotes Schindler, and therewith enough. Long as this article has become, we have referred to but the more important of the passages which in reading we marked for comment; enough, however, we judge, to show that the biography of Ludwig van Beethoven still remains to be written.

The New Singers.

FREZZOLINI—FABBRI—Miss WISSLER.

(From the Tribune.)

The Winter Garden—or, in other words, the Spring Opera-House—appears to be made for Madame Frezzolini, and Madame Frezzolini for the Winter Garden. Within its graceful and sonorous lesser circles there has been given a memorable entertainment in the production of the opera of Lucrezia Borgia, Madame Frezzolini administering the dulcet decoctions of music and arsenic. All that Rossini and Donizetti and Verdi have said of Madame Frezzolini and her poetic style, will be found to be true in seeing this performance. We do not claim for her the voice she had fifteen years back. But she is a great artist—with the great traditions of Italian singing—traditions established before it was found politic to spoil good and sustain bad voices by two cornets and three trombones playing in unison with it—the traditions of style which came down from classic heroisms, from the divine Greeks—without which we would be a compound of snifle and angle, devoid of grace or manners—of a style which personates the entire artist, in dress, port, action, gesture, as well as in refined pronunciation of language and of sympathetic musical utterance. The genius of Italy lies in circles. What distinguishes her painting as well as music is this line of grace. The transcendental analogies, about which yet nothing has been written, show that Italian grace is a unit of all things. The poetry is half music, and so the composer has but half duty to perform. The very structure of the verse forbids the jagged, halting, which some other languages incite to music. When an artist is educated up to the point of giving this verse and this music, has an aristocratic bearing necessary to lyrical representation—and now that Madame Rachel is dead—is the best dressed woman on the stage—there ensues an entertainment worth seeing and listening to—one which we can speak of positively, though the voice—as in the case of Ronconi—is not in its first youth.

To represent an historical duchess is no joke. The artist must look one to begin with. So does Madame Frezzolini. Her bearing is superb. In that regard she has no equal on the lyrical stage, and we question if on any stage. It has no pretense, no swagger—and the new rich woman can swagger as well as the man—but it has the inherent breadth and style of unconscious good breeding and nobility. This is one phase of her acting. Another is her exquisite delicacy of poetic and musical phrasing. Every line is a study. In these days when men are called composers, and critics praise them, who have not the first idea of vocal divisions and symmetries without which music is disheveled rubbish, when so-called artists, whether singers or public speakers, are turned out with eccleebion speed and sputter, it is satisfactory to find the perfect appreciation by the auditory of the great artist in question. The character of Lucrezia Borgia is the very best for Madame Frezzolini. It is a pity she did not appear originally in it, but took that of La Sonnambula, which now is not her forte.

On the same occasion at the Winter Garden there appeared an American debutante, a Philadelphia young lady, Miss Anna Wissler, as the contralto. It is an abominable breeches part, in which no woman can exhibit any divinity, but is simply out of place from first to last. Miss Anna Wissler is a full, deep contralto voice, ranging from E below the line up for more than two octaves. This is, we believe, the second time she ever appeared on the stage. There is every reason to suppose that with the Italian method she already possesses, experience will place her in a superior position.

(From the Albion.)

To return to Mme. Fabbri, who is the town talk: Her debut in "Traviata" was unqualifiedly triumphant; she has since appeared in "Ernani," and the first enthusiastic impression has been more than justified. What are her especial merits? These;—she can sing better than any purely dramatic artist who has ever been to this country, and her voice is equal to any six of her predecessors. It is of astonishing volume, and the rarest quality. Her conception of a character, too, displays marked originality. In the "Traviata" she was different to any one else that we have seen in the same part. Without purposely avoiding the excellencies of Gazzaniga she more than equals them. To speak briefly and clearly, she is not only a remarkable singer, but an astonishing actress. The last act of the opera to which we have referred, has never been interpreted with so much pathetic earnestness. It was a sad and tender picture of the regrets and dying yearnings of a human creature conscious of a mis-spent life.

Madame Fabbri's voice is a pure soprano, particularly rich in the upper part, and somewhat less opulent in the lower. She has special vocal excellencies, such as the trill or shake; the clear execution of the ascending scale, and the knowledge of how to use the mezzo-voco. Facility is not a characteristic of a purely dramatic voice; emphasis and overwhelming power take its place. Madame Fabbri, who belongs entirely to the new school, is nevertheless remarkable for her facility. She has more than sufficient for its requirements, and her triumphs will undoubtedly extend to many works which are now regarded as purely lyrical. In the first act of "Ernani" on Monday, she created a perfect fuore, and in the third her voice rolled out in such magnificent volumes that after being called out twice, the finale had to be repeated.

On Wednesday Mr. Maretzek produced the somewhat familiar opera of "Lucrezia Borgia," and infused into it new life by an extremely effective distribution of the parts. Mad. Frezzolini was the heroine; Signor Errani the Gennaro, Miss Anna Wissler the Orsino, and Signor Gassier the Alfonso. Regarded simply as a reputation, Mad. Frezzolini is decidedly one of the best now before the public. Rossini wrote extatically about her powers, and Verdi showed his appreciation of them by composing the part of Leonore in the "Trovatore" expressly for their illustration. An objection to be urged successfully against Mad. Frezzolini must be based not on the question of reputation, but simply on the broad and universal grounds of voice. Much of the former splendor remains, but Mad. Frezzolini's organ no longer responds to the fervid impetuositics of dramatic art. Although still beautiful in quality, it is weak, especially in the lower register, where the best modern effects are now made. When we have said this (and even to cold criticism it is an ungrateful task) the worst is told. In every other point of view her reputation is as deserved now as it was ten years ago. She is so thoroughly and essentially an artist, that it is impossible for any one familiar with the secrets of the prison house to refrain from a burst of enthusiasm at the repeated feats of skill which, with careless grace, she performs. The Winter Garden being better adapted to her present powers than the Academy of Music, we notice an improvement in all that pertains to success; moreover, we are informed that the lady was sick when she appeared in Fourteenth Street, and is now well. Certainly her performance on Wednesday was better than any preceding one in our recollection. All the slow movements were superbly sung, with a delicacy of phrasing, and a nicety of emphasis, which left nothing to be desired.

Errani, of whom we have already spoken, was very good in this opera, and justified the high approbation expressed of him in the Havana papers.

The principal interest of the cast attached, of course, to Miss Wissler, who was not only a debutante but an American. Considering the latter circumstance, her reception was cold and distrustful; but, as the lady ultimately obtained a decided success, this circumstance will probably not disturb, but tend rather to brighten the pleasures of her triumph. We do not often hear a voice like Miss Wissler's—so full, so rich, and so distinct in character and color. The pure contralto voice like the baritone, is "trained up" so much in these days that it has become lost in the indistinguishable mazes of the mezzo-soprano. Alboni was unquestionably the purest contralto we have had in America, as she was the greatest artist. With the exception of this superb singer we can remember no one who could boast of the voice of Miss Wissler—which is magnificent, both in quantity and quality. The lady's debut in the part of Orsino was naturally a success, but it did not by any means exhibit her full capabilities. She will, we are persuaded, be heard to much greater advantage at the Matinée to-day. A first night with its hopes and fears, is a fierce ordeal for any one to pass through; doubly so for a young woman who sings for the first time before a strange audience and in a strange language. Miss Wissler appears to be a good artist, and already possesses much facility of execution. The compass of her voice does not appear to be great, and is limited in the upper part—stopping at G for practical purposes; in the lower it is remarkably full and equal. She has of course much to learn as a singer; and as an actress she has but taken her first lesson. All that she needs to know can be acquired easily under the manager with whom she is now engaged, and then we shall undoubtedly have to speak of one of the greatest of living contraltos.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, APRIL 23.—The opera war continues. During the past week the Academy of Music has relied entirely on the attractions of Miss PATTI, giving on Monday Lucia, and on Wednesday Sonnambula. Friday evening there was no opera.

The way of it was this. A month ago one Signora BANTI, a very beautiful prima donna as to looks, (though as to musical ability I cannot say,) arrived here on her way from Lima to Paris. She was engaged by Muzio to sing once at least, and if she pleased the public, she was to receive further engagements. Under these circumstances Banti awaited her debut. But it was postponed from day to day till last Friday night, when she was announced for Norma. Madame STRAKOSCH was sick however, and the opera was changed to Ernani, but in the evening the tenor MACCAFERRI was taken sick, and the Signora declining to sing with SCOLA, the house was closed, and numerous people went away in disgust.

But this was not all. Bills were posted announcing the indisposition of Signora Banti, as the cause of the disappointment. This aroused the ire of the lady's husband, and cards were published in the papers next day stating that Signora Banti was not indisposed, but was ready and willing to sing.

This Signora Banti is a native of Bologna, about twenty-three years old, and of an elegant stage presence. She is a pupil of the favorite tenor SALVI, who is now living in domestic repose at Bologna.

Ullmann announces for this week PATTI in Puritani and Martha, with ADELAIDE PHILLIPS in the latter opera. He has in rehearsal Rossini's "Moses in Egypt."

MARETZKE in the meantime has made several hits. His new prima donna, FABBRI, turns out to be a sensation singer with a powerful voice, enormous dramatic intensity and fair execution. But she is neither young nor pretty. She sang the other night in Ernani with STIGELLI, and made a great hit. In the second act her dress caught on fire from the footlights; but Stigelli extinguished it, and Fabbri with amazing presence of mind went on singing as though nothing had happened. Fabbri and Stigelli have since sung in Flotow's Alessandro Stradella, which was given in German to an immense and Teutonic audience.

Last Wednesday evening, we had a treat in the return to the stage of FREZZOLINI, who sang in Lucrezia. Her voice is much decayed, but she is such a consummate artist, such a noble actress, and so majestic in every form and gesture, that her performance was a splendid lyric treat—such as has been but seldom offered to our operatic public. Max Maretzek says of her: "Frezzolini is the greatest artiste ever heard in this country. You say she has no voice. I know she is but a ruin, yet we go to Athens and Rome to see ruins, and acknowledge them to be greater than all our modern architecture."

In my opinion, Frezzolini is a more satisfactory and enjoyable lyric singer than any of the loud-voiced sopranos that are now so popular. Gazzaniga, Cortesi, Fabbri are all good, but one act sung and acted by Frezzolini is better than a whole opera by any of those just named.

The sixth concert of chamber music takes place Tuesday evening at GOLDBECK'S Hall, with the following programme:

1. Trio in D minor, Op. 49. . . . . Mendelssohn
Miss Pauline Eichberg, Messrs. Doehler and Brannes.
2. Romance from "Louise Miller" . . . . . Verdi
Mr. W. H. Cooke.
3. L'illusion, Fantasia sur "Norma" (Flute) . . . . . Fuertstman
F. J. Eben.
4. Ballade in A flat, Op. 47. . . . . Chopin
Miss Pauline Eichberg.
5. Sonata in F minor. . . . . Saar
William Saar.

6. "Thou'st stole my heart away;" Ballad. .... Cooke
W. H. Cooke.
7. Rondo, (Op. poeth.) for 2 pianos. .... Chopin
S. B. Mills and William Saar.

The last Philharmonic Concert takes place on Saturday night; Beethoven's Ninth Symphony being the great feature. TROVATOR.

NEW YORK, APRIL 23. — We are almost overwhelmed with music, good music, and well interpreted, at the present time. Two opera troupes of equal attraction, and no end to the concerts. The past week brought us two of the latter that were charming — that of the Chamber Concert Union, and Mason's third. At the first Mr. GOLDBECK played a Trio, No. 2. of his own, which, at first hearing, was not as attractive as his first Trio, which we heard several times some years ago. Still, he is evidently an aspiring artist, and his works are full of ideas, though not always the most original ones. His playing, too, in this piece as well as a Rhapsodie of Liszt, was very fine. Mr. DOEHLER inaugurated a new violin — new in looks and decidedly new in tone — by playing a fantasia of Vieuxtemps. The young artist evidently took the greatest pains, but the crudeness of his instrument did not permit him to do himself justice. Mr. SAAR and Mr. BRANNES gave us three little pieces "im Volkston" by Schumann, for piano and violoncello, which seemed rather insignificant. The chief feature of the evening was the appearance of Signor STIGELLI, who was in excellent voice and mood, and sang as if he gave himself up entirely to the charm of the snug little hall and small though appreciative audience. He sang, as the programme announced, two of his own compositions, the "Tear" and "Isolina," both of the higher (not of the highest) order of modern songs; but the real enjoyment came when, in answer to vehement encores, he substituted the "Poet" and the "Fisher Maiden" of Schubert. Never before have these been sung in this country as he sang them. They made one long for the privilege of listening to Schubert's songs from him for just one whole evening.

And while upon this subject, i. e., Signor Stigelli, let me tell you of the new laurels he won by his representation of Stradella on Friday night. Contrary to the gloomy predictions of "Trovator," this opera proved a greater attraction to "our Teutonic population" than lager-beer and Hoym's theatre, and they had turned out in numbers sufficient to produce the largest audience that Maretzek's opera has yet drawn. Great, but good-natured disappointment was manifested when it was announced that Sig. Stigelli was suffering from a severe cold, but would nevertheless do his best to sing, and only craved the indulgence of the public. That this was no mere excuse, was painfully apparent at the commencement of the opera; but the artist managed his voice so skilfully, that before the third act, one had forgotten that any apology had been needed. The part is a fatiguing one, as there is much to do, and something most of the time; but instead of seeming worn out, the singer appeared only to have rubbed off the rust as he warmed up, and in the last scene he really surpassed himself.

FABRI is fast becoming a general favorite — her voice is uncommonly fine, and her acting so thoroughly artistic, that it makes one forget some slight deficiencies in her manner of singing. She seemed to enjoy her German part thoroughly, and though it does not admit of any very vivid action, she threw so much light and shade into it by her singing, her gestures, play of feature, etc., that she made the very most of it, and appeared quite charming. Her exterior, at first glance, is not prepossessing, her figure stout and heavy, and her face very plain; but she is never awkward in her movements, and her features are so mobile, so full of life and expression, that you soon find them more interesting and attractive than the most faultless outline could make them. The opera was, on the whole, well given. The other solo parts, the two robbers and the guardian, were in the hands of Messrs. MUELLER, QUINT and WEINLICH, who all did their best, though they are by no means first-rate singers. The first two were particularly good in their first duet, into which they infused all due humor and spirit, thus making it irresistibly comic.

On Saturday night we listened with the greatest pleasure to MASON & THOMAS' delightful Soirée. The choice of instrumental pieces was unexceptionable, and they were, for the most part, admirably played. Only in one passage in the Quintet, I think, did Mr. Thomas' violin sound rather harsh. The concert commenced with Schumann's Quartet in A major, op. 41; next came the Trio in C minor, op. 66, by Mendelssohn; and lastly, Beethoven's exquisite Quintet, op. 29. These were separated by a couple of vocal numbers by Mrs. MOZART, of whom I need hardly tell you that she has a beautiful voice, but not much method. Her choice was hardly fortunate; "O mio Fernando" did not suit the occasion as well as many other compositions of like character might have done; and "When the Swallows homeward fly," though very advantageous to the singer's voice, and a sweet melody, is entirely too hacknied to be sung at any public concert of the present day.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 28, 1860.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER. — Continuation of Opera, Der Freyschütz, piano-forte arrangement.

ELISE POLKO'S MUSICAL SKETCHES. — We have not, as a general thing, much partiality for romantic tales and fictions dressed up out of incidents (not always authentic) in the lives of great composers. Indeed we have for the most part little patience with such trash, and stand already editorially committed against the introduction of such into our columns, as being calculated to deceive, or to convey namby-pamby, sentimental and absurd impressions of the lives and characters of great and simple men. But there may be exceptions; nor is literal truth of history always essential to that more inward moral truth, the truth of mind and character, which may be conveyed through an imaginary picture or tissue of incidents and conversations. It all depends upon whether the romancer can do it well; can seize the spirit of his subject, and reproduce, if not the literal facts, at least the character from history that is to figure for a brief spell on his little stage. And we do not see why it is not quite legitimate to use the salient commonly reported traits or incidents of such lives as Gluck or Beethoven, for the nuclei of such little fictions as would in any case be worth the reading from their geniality and cleverness.

The little pieces which we have given lately, translated by Miss Raymond, from the German of Elise Polko (whether the name be any more real than her stories we know not), have seemed to us to fall within these conditions. They are not works of genius, to be sure; not very remarkable perhaps in any way. But they are clever; they are readable; they set forth the lives of some of the great masters, singers, artists, in an instructive and for the most part true light; preaching by example some of the truths of Art; holding up the true, the high, the noble as more worth and more attractive than the glittering shams of a to-day's success. It is understood that they are fancy pieces, and hence no one will look to them for biographical authority. Our friend the "Diariet," with that terrible memory of his, no doubt could riddle them full of holes — historical flaws, anachronisms, and what not. But take them for what they are, and are they not pleasant, and not altogether unprofitable reading? That which we print to-day, will be read with peculiar interest, after the reminiscences which have been called out by the decease of Mme. SCHROEDER-DEVRIENT.

Concerts.

OTTO DRESEL. — This gentleman, who has more of the artist in him, and more perhaps of what may fairly be called genius, than any of our resident musicians, has greatly tantalized those who knew this fact by his equally well-known insuperable aversion — almost Chopin-like — to playing in public. Yet on Friday evening of last week, he so far yielded to the desires of many of the good people of Cambridge, as to give a concert in Lyceum Hall, almost beneath the venerable elms of Harvard University. Classical Cambridge, by the way, should have a better hall for concerts; naturally one would imagine Cambridge one of the chosen haunts of chamber music, and of all music that goes by the name of classical.

As it was, there were some four hundred people collected, filling the room almost completely; and it was an audience to inspire an artist, containing as it did the President and many of the Professors of the College, with their families, with most of the cultivated society of Cambridge and a numerous delegation from Boston. We are the more moved to note the fact, in the hope that it may prove the forerunner of many such occasions henceforth in the old University suburb. There should be stated provision for this branch of culture there, with a good music hall, as well as noble libraries, museums and observatories. And we know of no artist who could make periodical, or at least occasional, visits to such a place with more inspiring influence than Mr. DRESEL, and of no body of the "sons of harmony" who could accompany him with greater certainty of welcome than our German ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB. At least so it proved on this occasion. — The programme was singularly appropriate and choice.

1. Chorus from Oedipus. .... Mendelssohn
2. Piano Solos. a. Duet. .... Mendelssohn
b. Hungarian March. .... Schubert
3. Four-Part Songs: a. In der Ferne. .... Robert Franz
b. Rheinwein Lied. .... Robert Franz
4. Piano Solo. Rondo, op. 18. .... Chopin
5. Chorus from Antigone. .... Mendelssohn
6. Piano Solos. a. Gondollera. .... Mendelssohn
b. Scherzo. .... Mendelssohn
7. Songs. a. Remembrance. .... Robert Franz
b. O welcome fair woods. .... Robert Franz
8. Piano Solo. Polonaise, (A flat,). .... Chopin
9. Chorus from Antigone. .... Mendelssohn

The three Greek choruses were certainly in place; they were greatly relished by the audience, and especially by the genial President, late Greek professor, whose administration might well signalize itself by the production some day of an entire tragedy of Sophocles, with Mendelssohn's noble music, by the students under his charge. His enjoyment would have been still more perfect, no doubt, had the choruses been sung in Greek instead of German. The singing was admirable; we know not when the Orpheus have acquitted themselves better; and that in spite of the cavernous place into which half of them were crowded and their voices shaded out of all proportion with the rest. It was pleasant to see some of our most scholarly Germans in the singing ranks. The part-songs by Franz are among the best things of the kind ever written, not yielding the palm even to Mendelssohn, and they were sung with life and understanding. Mr. KREISSMANN, too, their leader, was very happy in his rendering of the two beautiful Franz songs.

Mr. Dresel's playing of the piano pieces excited the greatest enthusiasm. The clearly contrasted, singing quality of the two voices in the Mendelssohn Song-without-words ("Duet"); the fiery, persistent on-sweep of Schubert's "March" (Liszt's arrangement?); the crisp delicacy of the fairy "Scherzo;" and above all, the dreamy, pure, poetic rendering of the "Gondola Lied," gave a rare variety of exquisite sensations. The larger pieces, by Chopin, were responded to as such music seldom is when played before so many people. Being recalled, Mr. Dresel only increased the appetite by playing, or rather causing the instrument to sing, his own charming little "Lullaby."

CHILDREN'S FESTIVAL.—Tremont Temple has been the scene, thrice over, during the past two weeks, of a crowded and interesting exhibition of choral training under the direction of Mr. EDWIN BRUCE. With four hundred masters and misses, the Bowdoin Street choir of seventy voices, the boys of the Church of the Advent, and good assistants in the solo department, and with a very good selection of operatic and popular music, he has furnished forth quite an enjoyable feast, which may serve at the same time as an encouraging landmark of the progress made in "singing among the million," under earnest, able teachers like himself. The chorus-singing of the four hundred children was certainly marked by a good deal of precision and of light and shade. Here is what was done:

1. Prayer. From "Mazaello".....Auber.
By the children.
2. Quartet. Lovely Night.....Chwatol.
Messrs. Adams, Howard, Gilbert and Wright.
2. Song.....
Mr. Adams.
4. Chorus. From "Lombardi".....Verdi.
By the children.
5. Aria. From the "Magic Flute".....Mozart.
Mr. Wright.
6. Trio. Magic Wave Scarf.....Barnett.
Mrs. Heywood, Messrs. Adams and Wright.
7. Anthem.....
By boys from the Church of the Advent.
8. Chorus. From "Wm. Tell".....Rossini.
By the children.
9. Cavatina. Anna Bolena.....Donizetti.
Mrs. Heywood.
10. Duet. From "Martha".....Flotow.
Messrs. Adams and Wright.
11. Chorus. From "Moses in Egypt".....Rossini.
By the children.
12. Solo. Piano.....
Mr. Baumbach.
13. Hail Columbia.....
By the children.

Musical Chit-Chat.

In the long review of Marx's work on Beethoven, which we copy in this and last week's number from the Atlantic Monthly, our readers will not be slow to recognize the hand of "A. W. T." Whether he do full justice to Marx or not, he certainly has made an interesting and a valuable article, and one which deserves a permanent place in company with so much other interesting Beethoven matter in the volumes of this journal. The review was written in May, 1859, and was by press of matter crowded out of the Atlantic until now. What is said in it about Marx having furnished the sketch of his own life in Schilling's Lexicon, is founded, we are assured, upon a printed statement signed by the editor of the Lexicon, Dr. Schilling himself.

The Concert Season here in Boston seems to have come to a full stop. The Orpheus Glee Club have been regaling the ears of the suburbans in various quarters, as Jamaica Plain, Brookline, Newtonville, &c. Last evening two of their principal sweet singers, the brothers SCHRAUBSTÄDTER, were to give a concert in the latter village, assisted by the Orpheus.

Our MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB have reaped unqualified praises—if nothing more material—in their southern tour. On the way they stopped to treat the Worcester people to one hearing. Brinley Hall was filled, and everybody ("Stella" says) delighted, especially with the Andante to the Fifth Symphony. Mrs. Long sang Gluck's Che farò, but her ballads appear to have been more appreciated. In Philadelphia they have played twice, and, after visiting Baltimore and Washington, were to return there and give a cheaper concert in the large Musical Fund Hall to-night. Here are the impressions of the Philadelphia Bulletin:

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of Boston, gave their first concert in Chickering's Saloon, last evening, and it is discreditable to Philadelphia taste, that the audience was small. Those that were present were delighted; the performance was pronounced perfect, and we are quite sure that no stringed quintet equal to this has ever been heard in Philadelphia. Mrs. Long sang in excellent style and was much admired.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, of Boston, gave their second concert in Chickering's Saloon, last evening. They played Beethoven's quintet in C, (op. 29); an andante from a posthumous quartet of Schubert's, and Mendelssohn's first quintet in A, (op. 18). Each piece was played in perfect style, and was warmly applauded. Mr. Schultze played on the violin a brilliant fantasia on themes from Lucrezia, by Sainton, and few solo players could have surpassed his performance. Mrs. Long has deservedly won the admiration of her hearers, as one of the best concert-singers in the country.

Another Soirée took place in the early part of this month, at the close of a term, at the Mendelssohn Musical Institute, in Pittsfield, Mass. Mr. EDWARD B. OLIVER, the earnest principal of the institution, is very careful always that his pupils sing and play no trash; witness the following programme, in the execution of which we are told that the young ladies surpassed all their previous efforts:

1. Fantasia and Sonata, Op. 11.....Mozart.
Misses A. F. Warner and E. C. Tombs.
2. Das Ständchen, (Serenade).....Schubert.
Miss M. A. Wilson.
3. Rondo Favorite.....Hummel.
Miss H. A. Carson.
4. Two-Part Song, Mai Glückchen, (May Bells.)
Misses Wilson and Warner. Mendelssohn.
5. Illustrations Dramatiques.....Ascher.
Miss A. F. Warner.
6. Terzette, L'Esperance, (Hope).....Rossini.
Misses Wilson, Warner and Tombs.
7. Cæcilian Walzer.....Strauss.
Misses Wilson, Carson and Warner.
- Grande Sinfonie Pastorale.....Beethoven.
Misses M. A. Wilson and M. W. Merrill.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

VIENNA.—Wagner's Fliegender Holländer (Flying Dutchman) is to be brought out at the Kärntnerthor Theatre with the following cast: Holländer, Hr. Beck; Dolland, Hr. Schmidt; Erick, Hr. Ander; cockswain, Hr. Mayerhofer; Senta, Frau Dustmann; Martha, Fr. Sulzer.

Leopold de Meyer gave a concert March 17, in the hall of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, with a formidable programme all his own; to-wit;

1. Grand Nocturne romantique, dedicated, &c., composed by L. von Meyer, and performed on two pianos by Fr. Theres Fily and the concert-giver.
2. Grande Fantaisie originale, composed and performed by L. von Meyer.
3. Lieder, sang by Fr. Frankenberg.
4. Das Zauberwürchen (the magic story), characteristic tone-picture, L. von Meyer.
5. Declamation.
6. a. La Mélantholie. b. Ein kind des Glücks (a child of fortune), L. von Meyer.

7. Aria, sung by Fr. Frankenberg.

8. Grand Duo in motives from Robert le Diable, composed by L. von Meyer, for two pianos.

The Italian Opera troupe, which opened on Easter Monday at the Theater an der Wien, consists of the following members: Prime donne: Mmes. La Grus, Lafon, Charton-Demeur; Contralto, Signora Tati; tenori: Graziana, Sarti, Bianchi, Ballerini, Lanneri; baritoni: Beneventano, Varesi, Fagotti; bassi: Benedetti, Rekitansky, Milesi, Macani; buffo, Fioravanti. Between April 9 and the middle of June, 46 performances will be given, and the following operas are promised: Don Juan, Siege of Corinth, Semiramide, Norma, Poliuto, Elisir d'Amore, Crispino e la Comare (Ricci), and Traviata. Salvi is the impresario.

At the Imperial Court Opera the pieces during the last week of March were: Monday, Leonore; Tuesday, Diana von Solange; Wednesday, The Jewess; Thursday, The Chinney sweep of London (ballet); Saturday, Trovatore.

Clara Schumann and Hans von Bülow are both in Vienna giving concerts. Of Leopold de Meyer a Vienna paper of March 19, says:

"He has lost nothing of the fire and energy of his delivery, nothing of the humor and freshness of his conception. His playing has still that elasticity and delicacy of touch, that wonderful fullness of tone, which have marked him as one of the foremost pianists. And he still holds his place in public favor. If we perceived any change in the artist, it was one for the better; it is a certain shadow of wild earnestness which mingles himself with his otherwise too bright tone-colors. This subdued tone is impressed upon his latest compositions, especially the piece La Melancholie. In his Polka-fantasia: 'A child of fortune,' on the contrary, he gives free reins to his old jovial humor."

WEIMAR.—An after-celebration of Mozart's birthday has taken place, when the performance began with a festival composition, with music and tableaux vivants, entitled Die Tonkunst und vier Deutsche Meister, by Dr. Julius Fabste. Then came Don Juan. The house was crammed, and the poem, as well as the suggestive and admirably arranged tableaux, was tumultuously applauded. When, at the last, the four stars, in which shone the names of Gluck, Beethoven, Mozart, and Weber, were visible on the horizon, when in poetical juxtaposition, the figures out of Iphigénie, Fidelio, Don Juan, and Preciosa, appeared beneath the sky, and the godlike, ever-youthful music of the Past was heard, we wondered whether, in another hundred years, the masters of the Future, now so often named, would be greeted and worshipped with equal enthusiasm.

The Oedipus in Kolonos, of Sophocles, was performed lately in the presence of the Grand Duke and the Duke of Altenburg. The choruses were finely rendered by the Gymnasial choir under music-director Montag. The noble music by Mendelssohn made a great impression. The part of Oedipus was read by Councillor Schöll, a thorough Greek scholar and translator of Sophocles. The other parts found satisfactory representatives in various ladies and gentlemen.

LEIPZIG.—C. Reinecke is named as the probable successor of J. Riets, appointed Hof-Capellmeister at Dresden. Nothing has yet been heard from Breslau on the subject.

HANOVER.—A letter to Vienna states that Meyerbeer's Dinorah, in spite of a splendid outfit, has made a complete fiasco here.

ULM.—A new opera, by Kühner, Das Käthchen von Heilbronn, has been received with favor.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The season opened on the 10th, starting at the same instant with the rival company at Her Majesty's Theatre, of which we have already given the prospectus. The Musical World says:

The prospectus of the Royal Italian Opera, besides announcing the re-engagement of most of the old favorites, promises two new singers of eminence, two operatic revivals of great importance, and one or two works that have not been heard before. Mlle. Lotti della Santa, and Mlle. Marai, no longer appear in the list of artists; but Mlle. Rosa Caillag, if report does not err, will more than atone for the loss of the former; while, if Mad. Miolan-Carvalho fills the part of Marguerite de Valois, in the Huguenots, and Mlle. Rosa Caillag that of Elvira in Don Giovanni, formerly sustained by Mlle. Marai, there will be nothing to complain of. Other contemplated changes will be equally for the better—as, for instance, Madame Penco, vice Mlle. Lotti, in Ninetta (Gazza Ladra), and M. Faure, from the Opéra-Comique, vice Signor Graziani, as Hoel (Dinorah), and if the Italian language and Italian music are familiar to him, vice Signor de Bassini, in Fernando (La Gazza Ladra). Mlle. Caillag and M. Faure are both unknown to the English public. The lady, it is true, appeared at one of the Philharmonic Society's performances last season, with very considerable success; but little can be predicted of her talent as a dramatic singer from this solitary exhibition in the concert-room. Mlle. Caillag comes from the Imperial Opera of Vienna, where she holds a distinguished post. She will make her first appearance in Fidelio. If M. Faure creates as favorable an impression at the Royal Italian Opera as at the Opéra-Comique, he can hardly fail to become a valuable acquisition to Mr. Gye's company.

Among the ladies we find two unfamiliar names, viz.: Mlle. Rappazzini and Mlle. Giudita Sylvia. Of these, knowing nothing of their antecedents, we can say no more than that the latter, a contralto, is to make her first essay with Madame Nantier-Didié's part in Dinorah, on the opening night, and that the former is entrusted with one of the subordinate characters in the same opera.

While on the subject of new comers, we may cite Signors Patriossi, Vairo, and Rossi, as baritones, or basses, about whom no rumors have travelled to cis-Alpine regions—unless, by the way, Signor Rossi should happen to be the gentleman who played Don Pasquale and other buffo parts at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1857 and 1858.

Madame Grisi "is engaged for twelve nights," which may be interpreted, that she is at length definitively to take leave of the stage. Why the prospectus does not speak more explicitly on this head, we are unable to say. Perhaps the remembrance of 1854 may have something to do with it. Before the Norma of Normas, the Lucrezia of Lucrezias, the Semiramis of Semiramides, the Anna Bolena of — (but space warns us to desist) abandons us forever, we should like to be assured of a competent successor. The prospectus further relates that "she will appear in those parts which have chiefly contributed to her great popularity, during her long-continued and brilliant career." Nevertheless, we find no mention of Ninetta (La Gazza Ladra), Elvira (I Puritani), Norina (Don Pasquale), Semiramide and Anna Bolena—to one and all of which, it will scarcely be denied, some of those laurels are due. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho is evidently intended to fill up the dreary vacuum created by the loss of Angiolina Bosio. Besides Dinorah, she is to appear as Rosina (Barbiere), and Zerlina (Fra Diavolo)—two of Madame Bosio's most renowned impersonations—in addition to Amina (La Sonnambula), and Marguerite de Valois (Les Huguenots). That Madame Carvalho will make an admirable Zerlina, and an admirable Marguerite, we cannot for a moment doubt, and only hope that her essays in Italian opera proper will be to match. Madame Penco, is not only put down for Ninetta (La Gazza Ladra), but for Lady Henrietta (Martha), Gilda (Rigoletto), and one of the two sisters in Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto. Madame Nantier-Didié, although (for reasons unexplained) she does not (at present at least) re-assume her favorite part of the Goat-herd in Dinorah, for which Meyerbeer graciously composed the new air, "Fanciulle che il core" retains her post as principal contralto. The name of Madame Tagliafico, too, re-appears as compraria.

The tenors are precisely the same as in 1859—Signors Mario, Tamberlik, Gardoni, Neri-Baraldi, Lucchesi—a strong and gallant company. The basses and baritones we have still to name are—Signors Graziani, Polonini, and Tagliafico, M. Zelger, and last, not least, Signor Ronconi.

The repertoire for the season embraces twenty-four operas, of which two are novelties and four revivals. The novelties are M. Flotow's Stradella, and M. Victor Massé's one-act operetta, Les Noces de Jeanette, under the Italian title of Le Nozze di Giannetta. In the former, Signor Mario will sustain the principal part, while the latter is to be produced especially for Madame Miolan-Carvalho—the original Jeannette at the Théâtre-Lyrique—and Signor Ronconi. The "revivals" include Beethoven's Fidelio, for Mlle. Caillag and Signor Tamberlik; Meyerbeer's Prophète, with Mlle. Caillag as Fides, Signor Tamberlik as Jean of Leyden, and ("perausunter") Madame Miolan-Carvalho as Bertha; and Cimarosa's Matrimonio Segreto. There is a report that M. Félicien David's Herculanum will be given; but respecting this we can state nothing definitively beyond the fact that M. David has arrived in London. Upon the revival of the Prophète the management is determined to expend all the means at its disposal. If, as is probable, the magnificence of former days is revived, Meyerbeer's grand lyric drama will be the most brilliant feature of the season. The cast of the Matrimonio Segreto includes Mesdames Miolan-Carvalho, Penco, and Nantier-Didié, Signors Ronconi, Gardoni, and Graziani. The ladies are well placed, and from Sig. Ronconi's Geronimo, great things may be expected.

Four grand concerts are announced—one, "at least," to take place in the New Floral Hall. At the second concert, Gluck's Orfeo will be performed, with costumes, scenery, and decorations.

"The full orchestra and chorus of the Royal Italian Opera," and Mr. Costa, as "director of the music, composer, and conductor"—these are items which speak for themselves.

Paris.

The wonderful C sharp of Tamberlik—the force, the passion with which he sends out this note—electrifies the public at the Italian Opera. Under the aspect of the terrible Moor he has once more made his appearance amongst us. And with the Borghini-Mamo as Desdemona, the success could not fail to be great. But in the Trovatore his voice comes out as pure and sweet as the notes of a flute. One can hardly imagine the wonderful tones to which, as the opera goes on, the voice will rise. Last night he was called on after the air of "Di quella pira," three times; he sang it twice. An accident which occurred in this Act threatened to bring the opera to an untimely end. Just as Tamberlik draws his sword to rush off and save his mother, whom he sees from the window they are preparing to burn on the pyre, Mad. Penco, who plays the part of Leonora, frantically implores him to stay. In approaching the foot lights in one of her movements, the long tulle wedding veil she had on took fire. Mad. Penco did not perceive it, but fortunately two of the chorus-soldiers threw themselves on their knees, gathering her dress round, and extinguished the flames. It was a moment of breathless excitement in the house; and poor Madame Penco was so overcome by terror and emotion, that before the curtain drew up for the last act, the stage-manager came on, and begged for a few moments' indulgence for her. As it was, she cut out the air "D'amor sul all'rosa." It was most fortunate for Mad. Penco that the dress she had on was a silk moure trimmed with ermine; for, had she worn a tulle dress, it would have been impossible to save her. There was some unknown person who performed the part of the gipsy mother; but it would be better to touch lightly on so painful a subject. Where were Madame Alboni and Borghini-Mamo? The revival of Galathee at the Opéra-Comique has brought nightly receipts of 5000 francs, so it is likely to be continued. Jocote, with M. Faure as the hero, has also been revived with entire success. Madame Miolan-Carvalho will appear in Philemon et Baucis.

The concerts are going on with unabated vigor. Last Thursday a Concert d'Artiste was given at the Tuilleries. MM. Tamberlik and Graziani; Mesdames Penco and Alboni. The Princess Clotilde presented Mdme. Alboni with a magnificent fan to replace a paper one she had made herself on account of the great heat. Alard played on the violin; Prudent, on the piano. The Concerts d'Amateurs at the Palace are still kept up, and equally successful. The Comte de Morny and the Préfet de la Seine are also giving concerts. Mad. Pleyel will give some more of her charming concerts. The Société de Jeunes Artistes gave, the other day, another of their concerts under the direction of M. Pas-de-Loup; it gave great satisfaction. The symphony by Charles Gounod, that in C major by Beethoven, and the overture to Semiramis were remarkably well performed. Faure sang the solo in the benediction scene of the flags in the Siege de Corinthe. Last Thursday the Salle Beethoven was the spot chosen for an excellent concert, in which MM. Brimer and Paldike greatly distinguished themselves. There is a great deal of talk about building a new Italian Opera, and not before it is wanted; anything more uncomfortable than some of the boxes it is impossible to conceive, and amidst all the wonderful improvements taking place, it would be impossible to leave this alone unregarded.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Does thy heart forgive me. (Ma d'ogno rio sospetto.) Terzetto. "Der Freischütz." 25

The beautiful slow movement in the parting scene of the second act, Agathe, Annette and Max taking part.

Do a good turn when you can. B. Covert. 25

Popular Song by the successful author of "Jamie's on the stormy sea," and other familiar ballads.

The Convent Belle. S. Lover. 25

A pretty, semi-comic ballad, sung by Mrs. J. H. Long as an encore piece. It always makes a hit.

Spring's invitation. Himmel. 25

A nice little poem set to a sterling melody of the old German composer Himmel. The song is well adapted for very young singers.

The Shady Lane. " 25

New songs from the pen of the always pleasing Glover.

The Fisher. Duet. F. Kücken. 25

A capital duet for two ladies' voices, which has long been a favorite in Germany. Easy.

Instrumental Music.

Mirth and dancing. Fritz Spindler. 30

A highly pleasing piece in waltz-time, with fresh striking melodies and a nicely varied accompaniment. It must please wherever it is played.

Dinorah Polka. Jean Weber. 50

A sparkling Polka on beautiful melodies from Meyerbeer's opera of "Pardon de Plotin," with a handsome vignette in colors, representing the heroine of this greatly admired opera.

O luce di quest'anima. Polonaise from "Linda." Brinley Richards. 40

My lodging is on the cold ground. " 40

Bolero in "Sicilian Vespers." " 40

Three of these charming Transcriptions for which Mr. Richards is so justly celebrated. The Bolero, which is the most pleasing vocal piece in the opera, and one of the most pleasing inspirations of Verdi, deserves particular mention. Piano-players will be glad to get a telling arrangement of this melody.

Prison Song, from "Trovatore," for 5 or 6 instruments, arranged by Burditt. 60

Wrecker's daughter Quickstep. " 60

New numbers of the set of the "National Orchestra," which is the best and most comprehensive collection of music for small bands, amateur bands especially.

EASY AND MELODIOUS STUDIES. F. Paderewski. 1,00

Throughout these exercises the left hand is provided with its full share of the work, most of them being strictly compositions in two parts. The practice of these exercises must produce such independence of the hands from each other, as will enable the pupil to readily master the easier compositions of Clementi, Dussek, &c. There is quite a variety of the simple forms of rhythms introduced into the exercises, and every movement marked by the metronome, the use of which instrument the author—a very successful teacher of the piano—strongly recommends, introducing arguments in favor of its employment with scholars, which are irresistible. The work is carefully written and to the purpose.

Beethoven's Music for the Opening of the National Theatre in Pesth.

There is a promise expressed or implied in some notes printed in this Journal upon the "Ruins of Athens," some two or three years ago, to return at some future time to the topic. If it be true that we are no longer to look to the energetic Carl Zerrahn for our feasts of grand Orchestral music, what better plan can be devised to supply the want next winter, than that often urged in our columns; viz., the combined strength of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Harvard Musical and the Music Hall Associations, to arrange and carry through a series of concerts combining vocal (choral) and orchestral music? For such a series of concerts the two works of which we are to speak are exceedingly well adapted, both from the character of the music and its great variety, and from the fact that neither would occupy too large a portion of an evening.

In 1811 the building of the New Theatre at Pesth, in Hungary, was so far advanced that no doubt existed as to its being ready for opening upon occasion of the public celebration of the birthday of the Emperor Francis in the February following. It was determined by the proper authorities to spare no efforts nor expense to make the occasion one of great magnificence, both in the celebration of the day and the opening of the Theatre. Accordingly in May, 1811, they applied to Kotzebue, then in the height of his reputation, to prepare a "Trilogie" or triple drama, upon subjects taken from the history of Hungary, adapted to the occasion. The first was to be a "Vorspiel," or prologue, in one act, with overture and choruses; the second a regular drama; the third an after-piece, also with instrumental and vocal music. For the music they applied to Beethoven, whose Overture to Collin's Coriolan, and dramatic music to Egmont were then fresh proofs of his vast powers in this department of his art. Both poet and composer accepted the commission without hesitation. Kotzebue was soon at the end of his task, and the plays were placed in the hands of Beethoven.

The title of the Prologue, is, "Ungarns erster Wohltäter" (Hungary's first benefactor) as found in Kotzebue's works; but the full title upon Beethoven's score of the music is: "König Stephan, Ungarns erster Wohltäter; Prolog in einem Aufzuge von Kotzebue, Musik von Ludwig van Beethoven, geschrieben zur Eröffnung des neuen Theaters in Pesth, am 9ten Februar, 1812." (King Stephen, Hungary's first Benefactor, a Prologue in one Act by Kotzebue, music by Ludwig van Beethoven, written for the opening of the new Theatre in Pesth, Feb. 9, 1812.) This Stephen — known in Austrian and Hungarian history as Saint Stephen — was born in 977 at Gran. His father having been baptized in 973, Stephen was educated in the Romish religion, after ascending the throne in 997, carried on the work of christianizing his people, and introduced a form of government, founded upon the forms of other European nations. Having married the sister of Henry II., then Emperor, that potentate was induced to recognize his brother-in-law as King of Hungary, the previous title having been that of "Herzog" or Duke. Afterwards, at the instance of Otto III., Pope Sylvester II. acknowledged and confirmed his new dignity and sent him a crown, which was placed upon his head with all due solemnity, at Gran, in 1001. It is this point in the history of Stephen, which is made the subject of the prologue.

Let us fancy ourselves in the theatre at Pesth on that evening, when it was first performed. It has been a general holiday, and the edifice is crowded to its utmost capacity with an audience in no disposition to listen to the deeper inspirations of a great master, whether poet or composer. Beethoven has understood this, and has therefore composed a light, stirring overture adapted to the occasion and to the slight drama — if it be worthy the name — which is to begin the performances of the evening.

The curtain rises. The scene is an open field near Pesth, upon which a lofty throne constructed of shields is seen, bearing Stephen with uncovered head. Another and smaller throne, adorned with green twigs and flowers, is near. A band of Hungarian nobles surrounds the prince. A thick mist forms the background of the scene. The prologue begins with a bass solo and chorus of men's voices, sung by the band of nobles:

No. 1, in C, 4-4, Andante maestoso e con moto.

Ruhend von seinen Thaten
Hat uns der Fürst herufen,
An des Thrones Stufen
Heil der Völker zu berathen;
Und im dichten Kreise
Sammelte uns der Held Nach der Väter Weise
Auf diesem freien Feld.

[Resting from his deeds,
The Prince hath called us,
Around the steps of the throne
To consult for the weal of the people;
And in close circle
Hath the hero gathered us,
After the manner of the fathers,
Hero on this free field.]

At the conclusion of the chorus Stephen rises and in twenty-eight lines of rhymed verse speaks of the conversion of his nation from idolatry to Christianity, through the efforts and influence of his father; during which speech the thick clouds in the background gradually disappear, leaving but a thin mist, through which the city of Pesth is darkly visible. The chorus pursues the thought:

No. 2, (for men's voices), C minor, then major, 4-4, Allegro con bri.

Auf dunkeln Irrweg in finstern Hainen
Wandelten wir am trüben Quell,
Da sahen wir plötzlich ein Licht erscheinen —
Es dämmerte — es wurde hell!
Und Sieh', es schwanden die falschen Götter,
Dem Tage wich die alte nacht;
Heil deinem Vater! unserm Retter!

Der uns Glauben und Hoffnung bracht.

[Through devious ways in darksome forests
We wandered by a troubled spring;
Then suddenly we saw a light appearing —
The morning dawned — the day grew bright!
And lo! the false Gods all had vanished,
And ancient Night gave place to Day;
Hail to thy father! our deliverer!
Who brought us this new faith and hope.]

Enter here a warrior announcing the defeat of the wild horde of the Moglut and the capture of their prince Gyula. A grand march in G from the orchestra to which Hungarian warriors come upon the stage conducting their heathen captives in fetters, with Gyula at the head, to the throne, at whose foot the trophies are deposited. Of course every spectator understands what now follows; viz., a dialogue in excellent stage, we do not say dramatic, poetry, between Stephen and the captive, in which the former conquers the latter by his kindness, &c. &c., descends from his throne, strikes off the fetters and gives him freedom. Of (stage) course, Gyula falls at the great man's feet, with "I am thine forever." Here now is an opportunity for some one to pay Stephen an astounding compliment; the Bavarian ambassador, who has followed the war-party upon the stage, embraces it, and gives him one which, in London English, might be called "a stunner." Whereupon Stephen asks whether "the pious Gisela, whom my wise father's love selected for me," &c. — in short, asks if she will have him? and is informed that she is close at hand, approaching, surrounded by noble women "whose song mingles with the breath of the flute," which is a hint to Beethoven. So as soon as Stephen has had the last word, two horns and two clarinets sound softly a long drawn note, string instruments fall in, pizzicato, and in the third bar, a flute solo begins. Dancing children spring upon the stage, and at the 11th bar, 2-4, Gisela, veiled, and her attendants appear, singing.

No. 4, Female chorus, A major, 2-4, Andante con moto alla ingarese.

Wo die Unschuld Blumen streute,
Wo sich Liebe den Tempel erbaut,
Da bringen wir im treuen Eeleite
Dem frommen Helden die fromme Brout.

[Where Innocence fresh flowers hath strown,
Where Love hath built itself a temple,
There do we faithfully conduct
The pious bride to the pious hero.]

Stephen prevents Gisela from kneeling, unveils her, and finds her "all his fancy painted her," whether the spectators do or not. We are at the play, not in it. Have we not seen a stage hero, a man between sixty and seventy, who had a soap factory on Staten Island, desperately in love with a Daughter of the Regiment, who made up for her lack of youth by her abundance of flesh — say two cwt.? They were in the play.

Stephen's speech of four long lines, and Gisela's reply of equal length, are accompanied by harmony, No. 5, in the orchestra, at the close of which he conducts her to the other throne amid the rejoicings of a full chorus.

No. 6, in F, 6-8, Vivace.

Eine neue strahlende Sonne
Lieblich aus dem Gewölke bricht;
Süße Freude! selige Wonne!
Wenn die Myrte den Lorbeer umflieht.
[Now a new and radiant sun
Breaks all lovely from the clouds;
Sweet delight! heavenly rapture!
When the myrtle clasps the laurel!]

Introduced by flourishes of the wind instruments, here follows a speech from Stephen, of which the elevation of the Hungarians from being a tribe of nomads to the condition of a Christian European state is the topic. One thing is still wanting; namely, a written code of law, and this he now hands to the nobles, with a few appropriate words, to the sound of harmony (maestoso) from the orchestra, the thin veil of mist gradually disappearing and leaving Pesth in full view at the back of the stage.

Nineteen bars of solid harmony, pianissimo, from the string band, to which, near the close, a long drawn note from a single horn is added, follow, during which a band of priests from Rome enter, bringing a crown and the Pope's greetings to Stephen as king.

Chorus, Allegro con brio.

Hail, hail to the King!

Stephen places the crown upon his head and is immediately seized with a spirit of prophecy. Entranced, he sketches in few words the future, to the sound of music in the orchestra. Where the name of Matthias Hunyades comes up in order in the melodrama, the dawn appears reddening the horizon, by which it would seem that the action of the piece takes place in the night — or very early in the morning. At the point where the sun rises and floods the stage with light, the king has just reached the name of Maria Theresa.

At this name nobles, Romans, warriors, the women of Queen Gisela, all who crowd the stage are transported with enthusiasm, and break in upon Stephen's speech in the Final Chorus in D.

4-4, Presto.

Hail emsere Enkeln! sie werden Schauen
Was der prophetische Geist erkannt!
Es wird ihr kindisches Vertrauen
Der Krone schönster Diamant!
Wohlthaten spendend, täglich neue,
Vergilt der König in ferne Zeit
Die unwandelbare Treue,
Die sein Volk ihm dankbar weiht.

[Hail to our children! they shall see
What the prophetic mind foretold!
Their childlike trust shall be
The fairest diamond of the crown!
New benefits each day bestowing,
The King rewards in distant times
The unchangeable fidelity
His grateful people cherish toward him.]

As this majestic chorus, worthy of the great master, closes, the curtain falls.

In 1241, during the reign of Bela IV., the Mongols invaded Hungary, drove the king into exile, and for a year and a half plundered and devastated the country. This event in Hungarian history was selected by Kotzebue as the subject of the drama for this evening, which was completed and sent to Pesth; but, "aus besondern Rücksichten" (for special considerations), say the newspapers of the day, it could not be given. It will not be very difficult for us to guess what these 'considerations' were, when we remember that Napoleon in 1804 and again in 1809 had driven the Austrian emperor away from his capital, and that his wife, the Empress of the French was the daughter of Francis. Hence "Bela's Flucht" (Flight) was laid aside and a piece in one act, the "Elevation of Pesth to the rank of a royal free city," substituted. The time of this drama was the year 1244, and gave the audience an exceedingly interesting picture of their city, as it rose from its ashes, after the invasion of the Mongols. Whether this piece was from Kotzebue's play-factory, we are not informed — we think not — but his idea of making King Stephen a prophet was parodied by putting a sketch of the future history of Pesth into the mouth of the actor, who played the part of Burgomaster in it.

Now comes the afterpiece. We need not describe it here after the analysis by Mr. Macfarren, which will be found copied into our Journal. [Where?]

The performances, which we in fancy have been hearing, Feb. 9, 1812, were repeated to full houses on the evenings of the 10th and 11th. From that time the music to "King Stephen," except the Overture and Grand March, seems to have rested until about 1841, when it was again given complete in Vienna, with an illustrative poem. With the "Ruins of Athens" it was otherwise. The principal numbers have been always before the public, as favorite concert pieces, and the entire music with an illustrative poem has gone the rounds of the concert-rooms of the principal German cities. More than this the piece was revived for the stage during Beethoven's life. The occasion was the opening of the new theatre, in the Joseph-stadt, a suburb of Vienna; the time Oct. 3, 1822; Hensler, the manager, knew Beethoven well and easily gained his consent to give his music to the "Ruins of Athens" for the purpose, and to make such alterations and additions as would be rendered necessary, by a new text appropriate to the occasion and place. The author of this text was Carl Meisl, a popular Vienna writer of the day. We have never been able to obtain a copy of it nor any distinct account of the changes made in the music, save two numbers, of which we shall speak presently.

One Vienna contemporary newspaper says after the performance: "Our unrivalled master was willing, from friendship to Hensler and from his interest in the occasion, to recompose nearly all the music," (which we think was by no means the fact) "and so a masterpiece was produced, which, it is true, was not by all duly appreciated."

Meisl's text bore the title "Die Weihe des Hauses," and, according to the best of our present information, was adapted to the music as it already existed — was in fact, except at the close but an adaptation of the old text to the new occasion. What we know as being newly composed by Beethoven is, the magnificent overture, published as opus 124, and a closing chorus with dances, and solos for voice and violin. A part of this text is as follows:

Chorus.

Wo sich die Pulse jugendlich jagen
Schwebet im Tanze das Leben dahin, Alte, Sopran.
Lasset uns in Tanze das fliehende Leben
Neckend erhaschen dem Winke entschweben
Ist es im Herzen arglos und jung

Ist selbst das Sterben zur Ruhe ein Sprung.

Chorus.

Ist es im Herzen, &c.

Solo.

Paarsich im Tanze die Anmuth im Blicke
In den Gebärden die Grazien mild
Wird es ein Bild des verschönerten Lebens, &c.

[Where the youthful pulse is bounding,
Life in dances floats away, &c. &c.]

The solemn march and chorus, No. 7, in the printed score, as may be seen in Breitkopf and Härtel's "Thematisches Verzeichniss" of Beethoven's works, was originally printed separately as from "Die Weihe des Hauses;" it belongs however, to the original music, as may be seen by comparing its text with the "Ruins of Athens" as printed in Kotzebue's works.

The two overtures, "King Stephen" and "Die Ruinen," have been great stumbling-blocks to the critics. When Beethoven sent them to the London Philharmonic Society, they were not thought worthy of performance, and Ries says expressly he considers the latter unworthy of the composer. When the former was first played at Leipzig, people could hardly trust their ears, could hardly believe it to be the work of the author of the symphonies, of the overtures to Coriolan, Egmont, and Leonore, (Fidelio). It is clear, however, from passages in the composer's letters, that he by no means despised these children of his brain. He felt them to be the right thing for the occasion upon which he had written them. We are reminded of Goldsmith's sarcasm on Dr. Johnson; "If you were to write a fish story, you would make your little fishes talk like great whales." Beethoven had the wisdom to avoid this. We admit, however, our surprise that he should have sent his "little fishes" to the Philharmonic Society. This fact is more surprising than that people should have expected nothing but "great whales" from his pen.

Among the unprinted works of the great master still remain the magnificent Finale to the "Weihe des Hauses," and the entire music to "King Stephen," save the overture and march.

The "Ruins of Athens," we are informed, remains, to a great extent, upon the hands of the publisher. What hope, under these circumstances, is there, that he will be induced to give the world the unpublished manuscripts?

Loud is the outcry because many of Mendelssohn's manuscripts are withheld from publication; will the musical public render possible the publication of the far more important relics of Beethoven's genius, which still lie hidden in cabinets and boxes? A. W. T.

How to Enjoy Classical Music.

(From Macmillan's Magazine, March, 1880.)

Not many years ago an orchestral symphony or a stringed quartet were luxuries hardly to be indulged in by those Londoners whose guineas were not tolerably numerous. Times are changed for the better; and not a week passes, even in the dullest season of the year, that some good music is not to be heard at a cheap rate in London. A symphony or a concerto forms an attractive item in most programmes, and it has of late been found that the stringed quartet (a form of composition demanding the most delicate execution on the part of the players, and considerable refinement of taste on the part of the listeners) commands a sufficiently large audience to make a moderate price of admission remunerative. * * *

In short, the demand for music, whether it be the cause or the effect of this enlarged supply, has of late years considerably increased. We can hardly go to a concert without meeting some enthusiast like ourselves, ready to gloat with us over a finished performance of a quartet, or to compare opinions as to the reading adopted by some new pianist. By some freemasonry we easily detect such a brother fanatic, and are not ashamed, though he be a stranger, to open our heart to him on the subject of the music we are listening to, or even on musical matters in general.

But, notwithstanding this, there remains a multitude of educated persons who, by their want of appreciation of the best music, are shut out from the enjoyment we experience. * * *

Setting aside then the people who hate music and those who have a contempt for it, there remains another class, with whom we have much more in common; but who, on that very account, make us feel the more conscious of living in a world by ourselves. Have we not probably some intimate friend—a man possibly of the highest culture in all that regards the sister arts—very likely possessing an accurate ear for music, and altogether, as we think, more fitted to appreciate the beauty of a great musical work than ourselves; with whom there is but one topic which is tabooed, and that topic music; who on all other subjects has opinions which we can agree with or can combat, but who, on music—on our music—has no opinions at all? * * *

And yet this man perhaps likes music, has some pet opera or oratorio which he never misses hearing, for the sake of a special air or piece. * *

If we are very much bent upon his conversion, we select some attractive programme, and make him sit it out. We don't enjoy it much ourselves, for we are engaged all the time in watching his face, and wondering whether he is not finding each movement interminable. We always feel that the experiment has been a failure, although our patient, seeing that we are disappointed, tries to console us by expressing considerable pleasure at some points. He almost always ends, however, by acknowledging that such music always strikes him as "heavy," in consequence he alleges, of his want of the "science" necessary to appreciate it. We ask ourselves, how it is that whilst we can, to a limited extent, appreciate our friend's favorite paintings, or buildings, or poetry, and can find new beauties in them whilst hearing him expatiate thereupon, he should be so utterly incapable of partaking of our musical pleasures. *

Let us now examine the reasons which those persons with these notions of music usually give for their distaste for classical music. They allege, either that a difference of organization exists between them and the classicists, which prevents them from appreciating the devices of harmony used in classical compositions, or, as we have before observed, that what they term the "heaviness" of such music makes it intolerable to those who have not acquired a certain amount of science.

As to a difference of organization, we doubt whether it exists; for we discover that those we are speaking of have as strong a dislike as ourselves to a scale without a leading note, or to an improper resolution of a discord, and so far as we can judge from analyzing our own sensations, it is upon a few simple likes and dislikes of this kind that the power of appreciation of the greatest musical work mainly depends. We believe that every ordinary educated European, listening to any piece of music, recognizes the necessity of the key and mode, to which the sounds he hears are to be referred, being determined without much delay by certain unambiguous chords; and is sensible, when the ear is satiated with the sounds belonging to one key, of the pleasure and almost the necessity of being led by artistically conducted modulations into keys nearly related to the original key (i.e. into keys containing many notes in common with the original key). Further, the ear relishes occasional artifices whereby it is balked of the sounds which it desired, and is either introduced suddenly into some key entirely unexpected, or made to wait for some time before the expected sounds are duly heard.

Combinations producing effects such as these are contained in the accompaniment to the simplest ballad; and the very same devices, and no others, are used for the very same purposes, though a little more freely and a greater length, in the most elaborate instrumental composition. It seems therefore difficult to conceive such an organization as should render a man capable of perceiving the beauty of those combinations in the one case and incapable of appreciating the same things in the other case. If indeed the assertion be that a difference of organization prevents the recognition of the beauty of the melodies employed in classical music, it is hard to meet the objection directly. If a man declares that he finds a particular succession of sounds distasteful to his ear, no argument will have any effect in convincing him that such succession is pleasing. But in many cases we think that this assertion is made without the preparatory process of listening to the predominating melodies having been gone through. We believe that in any page of an instrumental work by one of the great masters, it would be easy to select a melody, which, simply played on a violin, would be recognized even by the most uncultivated listener as a pretty tune. And the variety of forms of melody in such compositions is so great, that a sonata, a quartet, or a symphony can hardly be listened to with common attention without some airs being met with which suit the taste of any one, whether his taste incline to the pathetic, the solemn, the impassioned, or the joyous style of tune.

Next, what is meant by the "science" we so often hear of as necessary before pleasure can be derived from classical music? * * *

The fact seems to be, that the real science required, if science it can be called, chiefly consists in a knowledge beforehand of the kind of thing we are going to hear. This knowledge is acquired almost intuitively by the act of listening attentively to a certain amount of music of a high order, selecting at first compositions of a tolerably simple character, in which the design may be easily perceived; but it may be useful to give a slight sketch of the usual form of these compositions, and some idea of the mode in which the leading ideas are generally worked out. The music of which we are principally about to speak is that of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, and chiefly of their instrumental works, because, as far as we have observed, this kind of composition is the most difficult for the untrained listener to appreciate, partly on account of the various tones of the different instruments confusing him at first, but principally because he has no comprehension of the fixed plan on which the greater part of them are written.

In its most complete form, an instrumental work, in the style of the above composers, consists of four distinct pieces, called "movements." The first and the most important of these, both in length and dignity of subjects, is invariably an allegro movement of considerable length, sometimes led into by a short and solemn introduction. Then usually follows the slow movement, which is also of some length, and which is relieved by a piece of a light, joyous character, termed the minuet or the scherzo. Although the minuet was originally a grave dance, it has been the habit of composers, while preserving the rhythm of the dance, to direct its performance at a quick pace, in order probably to contrast with the solemn movement which precedes it. Beethoven indeed abandoned at times the form of the minuet altogether, and called the light movement which replaced it a scherzo. But whether minuet or scherzo, the movement, like almost all dance tunes, includes a second part in a different key from the key of the first part, and which second part is called—for what reason it is not very easy to see—the trio. After the trio, the minuet is repeated. The concluding movement is generally very rapid, and, though usually extremely elaborate in its construction, is of a lighter character than the opening allegro. The form here described is that assumed by the majority of instrumental compositions; and, in particular, the symphony for full orchestra and the quartet for stringed instruments almost invariably contain the whole of these movements. In works in which the pianoforte takes part, one or more of these is often omitted, and the modern overture consists of a single allegro movement of the same character as the first movement of a symphony.

The plan of the more important of these instrumental movements, which since the days of Haydn has been universally adopted, may be shortly described as follows:—

The movement commences with a melody, say in the key of C, which is called the first subject. After this has been thoroughly impressed upon the ear, a modulation is effected into the scale of the dominant, a fifth higher, in this case G, in which key a second subject altogether different from the first is presented. This forms the first part of the movement. The first subject is then recurring to its original key, and the movement closes with the second subject in the same key (in this case C), and not in the key in which it first appeared. This is the merest skeleton of a modern movement, as in practice many episodes are often introduced. Still the principal modulation into the dominant scale always takes its proper place, and the reappearance of the second subject in the original key is always adhered to. (It should be mentioned, that if the first subject is in the minor mode, a greater latitude as to the key of the second subject is allowed.) But to impress the subjects on the ear, it is usual to repeat the whole of the first part of the movement, and at the beginning of the second part a train of elaborate modulations is almost invariably introduced before the first subject makes its reappearance in its original shape. A coda or finale is also sometimes made use of, in which the first subject is again resumed at the end.

This slight description will perhaps give some idea of the general structure of most instrumental movements. Some, particularly slow movements, and occasionally finales, are in the form of simple airs with a series of variations, and minuets and scherzi have a simple form of their own, which has been adverted to, and which has no analogy with that just described; but, generally speaking, if these leading features be borne in mind, there will be slight difficulty, after a little experience, in understanding the design of a symphony or quartet.

Another qualification which enhances the pleasure of listening to instrumental music is a power of recognizing the tones of different instruments. We have often found that persons who have not been in the habit of hearing orchestral music fail to detect the difference in character between the sound of instruments somewhat similar, as the clarinet and oboe, or the trumpet and horn. Of course this delicacy of ear is only to be acquired by listening attentively for a time to orchestral music, but it is very soon gained. The musical memory is soon improved, also; and when a subject reappears after some little time in a movement, we derive pleasure from the effect produced by its being given, say, to the oboe, when we recollect that on its first appearance it was played on the flute.

Armed with no more "science" than may be gathered from the above sketch, a man of ordinary musical intelligence is, we think, prepared to enjoy the higher kinds of instrumental music. Of course, if he does not pay close attention, he will find it "heavy," for, in this sense, good music is heavy. It requires to be listened to, and to be listened to with attention. To do otherwise is to say, "I want to have my years tickled with a pretty tune whilst I am thinking about something else,"—is as though one were to stand before a painting, and say, "I will please my eye with the contrast of color, but I will not exert my brain to discover the subject of the picture." In fact, as in the last case, the required satisfaction of this kind (which is, in its way, a perfectly legitimate satisfaction) would probably be found in a higher degree by gazing at a pretty pattern of regular form than by the sight of a picture properly so called; so the sharply defined and unchanging rhythm of a dance tune is better adapted to please the ear, while the brain is otherwise occupied, than one of Beethoven's sonatas. But we cannot for any length of time listen to the same polka, or gaze at the same geometrical pattern. The ear and the eye soon grow weary of these purely sensuous pleasures. *

We have spoken of the necessity of some training for the ear. Let us in conclusion recommend to those in whose power it is to help such in training, not to neglect to do so. Well-chosen and well-played extracts from the great composers would, we are sure, be as favorably received from amateur musicians of the higher class as the wretched fantasias which such musicians generally select when they have to perform before a mixed audience; and if our young ladies, who after all are the principal interpreters of our domestic music, would accustom their fathers and brothers to hearing a little bit of Beethoven or Haydn occasionally, the training of the ear in the forms of melody employed, and in the structure of the kind of works spoken of, would be accomplished without effort, and the listeners would soon be prepared to hear the same kind of things with delight when they happened to come across them at a concert. ### Religious Music.

Extracts from two discourses by the Rev. Horace Bushnell and the Rev. Thomas M. Clark.

Our first extract is from Dr. Bushnell's discourse:

Let me also suggest, in this connection, the very great importance of the cultivation of religious music. Every family should be trained in it; every Sunday or common school should have it as one of its exercises. The Moravians have it as a kind of ordinance of grace for their children; not without reason, for the powers of feeling and imagination, and the sense of spiritual realities, are developed as much by a training of childhood in religious music, as by any other means. We complain that choirs and organs take the music to themselves, in our churches, and that nothing is left to the people, but to hear their undistinguishable piping, which no one else can join, or follow, or interpret. This must always be the complaint, till the congregations themselves have exercise enough in singing to make the performance theirs. As soon as they are able to throw in masses of sound that are not barbarous but Christian, and have a right enjoyment of their feeling in it, they will have the tunes and the style of the exercise in their own way, not before. Entering one day, the great church of Jesus in Rome, when all the vast area of the pavement was covered with worshippers on their knees, chanting in full voice, led by the organ, their confession of penitence and praise to God, I was impressed, as never before, with the essential sublimity of this rite of worship, and I could not but wish that our people were trained to a similar exercise. The more sorrowful is it that in our present defect of culture, there are so many voices which are more incapable of the right distinctions of sound than things without life, and which, when they attempt to sing, contribute more to the feeling of woe than of praise.

The remaining extracts are from Dr. Clark's discourse:

Music, above every other art, seems to be capable of unlimited advance. We can conceive of perfect sculpture, but not of perfect music. Whatever art is purely imitative, must have a limit; but music is not imitative: it is, in its higher forms, the expression of a thought, and it is strangely, incomprehensively, powerfully suggestive of thought. Where there are no words used, it suggests words to the mind, or rather, the material out of which words are made; it enkindles emotions, which no language can stir. Why it is, we cannot tell; but we find it to be the fact that certain qualities and combinations of sound open the flood-gate of memory, revive what was long forgotten, excite the deepest thought, make the blood tingle, lift the soul out of the body, carry it above the clouds, and bring us close to the great throne of the Almighty.

And yet, some will ask, what is the use of music? They might as well ask, what is the use of color, or of any thing which makes the world a glory and a beauty? Why was not the landscape clothed in drab; and the evening cloud always of a leaden hue? Why are there any flowers in the fields, or birds in the air with crimson plumage? Why is the shell of the beetle so radiant with glory? Why is there so much of magnificence in nature, even where the eye of man never penetrates? Gorgeous grottoes hidden in the earth; fragrance and splendor in the solitary wilderness; things animate and inanimate in the bottom of the sea, exquisite in form and glistening in gold and vermillion? It should be a part of our religion to appreciate the beautiful, and that religion which separates itself from these symbols of God, is so far forth a defective and a false religion. Whatever tends to elevate man, to unsensualize him, to lift him out of the domain of mere appetite, to take him away from himself, and give him grand emotions, high aspirations, good thoughts; whatever makes him feel—what I fear very many do not feel—that he is a soul and not a body, created for something more than to make money and feed himself and become a man of note in society; whatever impresses him with the feeling that he is immortal, that he cannot die, that he has capacities which ten thousand worlds like this could never fill, powers which assimilate him with the angels, with the sons of God on high, with God himself; whatever does this belongs to religion, and cannot be despised, without casting contempt upon the Author of all things.

And this is done by music: it refines, elevates, spiritualizes, widens the range of vision, and binds this existence to the eternal. For music will outlast speech. Articulate language may be needed no longer after we have done with the body; but the essential elements of musical expression are eternal. Language is arbitrary and therefore temporary: music is the product of fixed laws, and therefore must be permanent. Even in our present state, we find that it can express more than words; and the fact that it is composed, before it is rendered, and that one skilled in music may read this composition with pleasure, without hearing an audible sound, shows that it is essentially independent of instruments and voices. I say then, here we have an argument for immortality; for here is a power, belonging to us, which is independent of the body; you can sing without the mouth and hear without the ear and have music in your soul, when there is no movement in the air; and the melody may therefore continue and grow more full and sweet and entrancing, after this earthly instrument has turned to dust!

It is still the fact, that, in many of our churches, nothing but sacred associations render the music endurable. As it regards both the poetry and the music, our popular psalmody is behind the secular standard of culture. There is still a melancholy amount of poor prose split off into verse, and labeled as sacred hymns. There would be as much propriety in undertaking to sing a mathematical demonstration or an extract from "Edwards on the Will," as there is in rendering into song some of our didactic and doctrinal hymns. We would not assert that every hymn should be strictly lyrical, but it would seem to be proper that it should express some sentiment or emotion.

As there is a style of poetical composition appropriate to worship, not only in respect of the subject, but also of the metre and rhythm, so there is of musical composition and performance. There is an ecclesiastical tone, which is altogether peculiar. It is hallowed by peculiar associations, and suggests peculiar thoughts, and has a peculiar sacredness. It has been used "in the ages all along," and has nerved the souls of confessors and martyrs in ancient days. It has a majesty and a dignity which can never be imparted to music snatched from martial airs, or operatic strains, or the secular songs of the day, which some would like to sanctify with sacred words.

The highest idea of church music is, with most people, that to which they have been accustomed. There is a certain set of tunes, with which they are familiar and these they would like to hear constantly repeated. It is indeed no real improvement, when the solid old tunes of ancient composers are all set aside, to make way for the lighter and more fanciful music of the day. But it can hardly be expected that our choirs should be content to travel the same round of familiar chants and tunes, month after month and year after year; and every individual should try to remember that there are other tastes to be consulted beside his own.

The art of sacred music is with us now in its infancy, and there are few people who have the slightest conception of the improvement which it might receive. The popular taste is, in a great measure, formed after vulgar models, and it can be rectified only by slow degrees. A higher style must, if it can be done in no other way, be forced upon the community, and they will gradually learn to appreciate it.

Our parishes must also be willing generously to contribute "material aid," if we would materially advance the art of sacred music; there must be a sufficient pecuniary inducement held out to persons of musical taste, to induce them to discipline and cultivate their powers. In former years, there has existed a strong prejudice against the practice of music as a profession, and one was looked upon as throwing away his life, if he devoted his time exclusively to this science. With just as much propriety, we might object to the profession of a sculptor, a painter, or to the practice of any ornamental trade. We often make an improper distinction between the elegant and the useful, as if the ornaments of life had not their use. Music is something more than an elegant accomplishment, it is no frivolous pursuit; it ought to have, and if rightly studied, it would have a purifying, elevating, ennobling influence upon character. It has a power, which is peculiarly its own; it can find its way where nothing else can penetrate; it can enkindle thoughts and feelings, which are impassive to every other touch; it will outlive all other arts; it is the most profound of sciences, and perhaps the only one which is essentially eternal.

Shakespeare's Birthday.

Sixty gentlemen, members of the Century Club of New York, sat down on Monday night at a dinner given in commemoration of the birthday of Shakespeare. The company included many distinguished for station, talent and culture, while the banquet itself and many of its accessories were at once novel and tasteful. The large ball-room of the Century, the state apartment of the Club house, was tastefully decorated with American and English flags, surrounding a transparency painted by Lang, and representing Shakespeare surrounded by those actors of his own time who first gave to the public and the world his words yet warm and glowing with the pulsations of their originator. The faces and figures have been carefully studied and were supposed to represent with accuracy this interesting subject. A bust of Shakespeare, crowned with laurel, looked down on the festival. The whole fête was conceived and conducted in the same spirit. The President of the Century, Hon. Gulian C. Verplanck, is an eminent Shakespearean commentator himself. The Rev. Mr. Hudson and Richard Grant White, Esq., were, if we mistake not, the only guests of the evening, and they are well known, wherever Shakespeare is studied, as two of the ablest of his appreciators, the one more especially noted perhaps for his verbal criticisms and textual labors, the other for his elaborate and eloquent disquisitions upon the spirit and thought of the great dramatist.

The tables were decorated by flowers, the offering of ladies belonging to the families of club members, these flowers being exclusively those mentioned in Shakespeare's plays. The more ordinary table ornaments consisted of statuettes of Miranda, Perdita, Hamlet, &c. A boar's head, with a lemon in its mouth, and decked with the traditional rosemary, was placed in front of the President, and flags of sack were passed around, from which each one, rising, drank in his turn. The bill of fare which was offered, was evidently the result of much study and taste. It is unique in its way. The programme of toasts and speeches introduced Wm. M. Evans, Esq., the Rev. Mr. Hudson, who was extremely original and felicitous, both in thought and expression, and "often set the table in a roar" with his "flashes of merriment." Mr. Grant White made a few remarks, half earnest, half playful, and conceived in excellent taste, the burden of which was an entreaty to his listeners to read Shakespeare, and not his commentators; an entreaty to which, in its entirety, after last night, they are less inclined than ever to accede. James T. Brady was, as usual at a dinner, genial and eloquent, displaying his peculiar genius, as he always does on such occasions, more decidedly even than in a court-room. Mr. J. H. Siddons, the grandson of the Siddons, made some appropriate and interesting remarks on "the Players." Mr. Gourlie responded warmly, and as if his heart were in it, for the "Century," and Mr. Van Winkle was a substitute, and a not inefficient one, for Mr. O'Gorman, who, only, disappointed the company.

Besides these regular speeches, which were quite up to the level of after-dinner orations, the volunteer toasts called out the venerable President, who related some charming reminiscences of Kean and Siddons, and Talma and Cooke, and Cooper; Mr. Folsom, the President of the Athenæum, who bewailed the decline of the Shakespearean drama; Judge Daly, who bewailed nothing, but complimented, pertinently, Mr. Sanderson, the originator of the festival, and the only man who, in this country, has raised gastronomy into anything like the dignity or position of an art. It is to this gentleman's labor and thought and taste that the eminent success of the occasion is chiefly to be attributed. When it is known that he prepared the bill of fare and the programme of toasts, those who were not lucky enough to be present may imagine the spirit in which the celebration was planned and performed. The music was absolutely delightful; Mr. Richard Willis, Mr. Simpson the exquisite tenor, Mr. Thomas, bass, and sometimes Mr. Lang "discoursed most eloquent," singing (the songs all appropriate) as those who have had the luck to listen to them may readily suppose. Artists and authors, men of taste and intellect, were present in abundance; good things were said on every side, as well as eaten; jokes were cracked as well as nuts; geniality flowed as free as the wine; yet with all there was a vein of earnestness that gave character and dignity to the occasion. It was not more brilliant than some other dinners have been, in the one particular of intellectual display, but in the elevated tone that characterized it throughout, in the well bred mirth and refined taste which were its distinguishing features, the Century Celebration of Shakespeare's Birthday was honorable to the Club where it was so worthily solemnized.

"The fig of Spain, very good."

"There is a dish of leather-coats for you."

"Give * this * orange to your friend."

"And fetch the new nuts."

"My cheese, my digestion."

"Go, fetch me a quart of sack; put a toast in it."

"And good store of fertile Sherris."

"Some aqua-vite, ho!"

AUBER'S AND SCRIBE'S "GUSTAVUS III."—We fancy this anecdote, concerning Scribe's libretto of Auber's "Gustavus" will be as new to most of our readers as, we confess, it is to us.

It is said that when Rossini had just contracted with the French Government an engagement by which he was to give once a year a new opera to the Grand Opera, he began by arranging "Maometto" ("The Siege de Corinthe") and "Mose" for the French Opera to give him time to produce an original work. He wanted a "book," and this the French Government agreed to give him. Mons. Scribe was applied to. He set to work and was delighted with his labor when he wrote "The End" on the last page of the MSS. "book." A few days after he had given the "book" to Rossini, Mons. Scribe paid him a visit and expected the composer would highly compliment him upon the "book," for he felt he had never succeeded better. Rossini did congratulate him highly, and told him the drama was exceedingly interesting, but after exhausting all the formula of eulogy, Rossini declared he could not write the score. Mons. Scribe's feelings were hurt. He suspected Rossini (whose reputation for caustic wit is at least as great as his fame as a composer), of jeering him when he declared the "book" admirable and at the same time refused to write an opera score for it. Rossini, however, was sincere, and he ended his remarks by saying: "Your drama, I repeat, is excellent. Its only fault is, the interest is too concentrated. We Italians are not accustomed to write scores for pieces where the situations come so close upon each other as to leave no repose to the spectator whose attention, absorbed by the incidents of the piece, has not an instant to give to the music. We require pauses in the action that we may develop our pieces without raising the impatience of the audience. Mons. Scribe gave the "book" to Mons. Auber who wrote his well known opera on it.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 30.—Business engagements prevented me from noticing your admirable MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, last week. They gave a final concert, at the Musical Fund Hall, on the evening of the 28th—with a price reduction to fifty cents, an accommodation which the public nevertheless failed to appreciate, for the saloon presented a meagre array of auditors. I am ashamed to record this, inasmuch as the undoubted merits of this body of musicians had been fully and disinterestedly set before the people, both in the press and in social circles, so that the inference deducible from the sparsity of their audiences, is unmistakably an apathy to classic music and the performance thereof. Well, let that be as it is;—those who did display taste by their attendance, received a valuable quid pro quo for the paltry sum invested. It would be superfluous to pen an analytical critique in these columns, upon the merits of the Quintette Club, whose performances have been so often and so ably been reviewed through the same medium, by yourself. You know them better than we. Here is the programme of last Saturday night's concert.

1. Quintet in A, Op. 106, (Clarinet Principal). . . . .Mozart.
Moderato—Larghetto—Minuetto—Finale, Tema con Variazioni.
2. "Ah mon fils" from the "Prophet". . . .Meyerbeer.
Mrs. J. H. Long.
3. Fantasia for Violoncello "Sonnambula". . . .Kummer.
Wulf Fries.
4. Rec. and Air, "Non fu sogno." "Lombardi" . . .Verdi.
Mrs. Long.
5. Andante vars. from Quartet in A, Op. 18. . . .Beethoven.
6. English Ballad. . . . .Glover.
Mrs. Long.
7. Quintet B, Op. 87. . . . .Mendelssohn.
Allegro—Allegretto—Adagio—Allegro vivace.

A rare musical feast of a verity; and enjoyed with infinite zest by all present.

The Quintettes were rendered with a unity of action and of feeling such as I have never observed before. It was faultless, and afforded an ample realization of the powers of the mighty intellects by which these splendid compositions were conceived and developed. It is only when such like works are performed by a band of musicians equally perfect with the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, that the hearer finds their beautiful points and fanciful effects properly unfolding themselves in pleasing array, to his edification and delight. These musicians point out niceties of expression, and subtlety of thought, and ingenious mathematico-musical formulas, in the works they illustrate, just as a great painter might initiate an ordinary art-lover into the actual beauties and delicate points of a Raphael chef d'œuvre, thus intensifying his delight, and quickening his perceptions for future studies. The soloists of the above programme merit the warmest encomiums; Mr. RYAN for his tasteful performance of the Clarinetto Principale, is Mozart's Quintet in A. His execution thereof was clean, fluent, and graceful, and displayed a keen appreciation of Mozart's easy, sprightly, and cheerful style. WULF FRIES, too, who offered a Sonnambula Fantasia by Kummer, admirably performed by him, came in for a large share of enthusiastic applause, although I must confess that the morceau spoken of, is the most unsatisfactory composition of Kummer's, with which I have ever met. Mrs. J. H. LONG acquitted herself with great credit, and seemed to please generally. I think that she sings with much ease, judgment, correctness of intonation and artistic finish—a trifle too methodical, which implies a lack, passion and warmth, perhaps. It seemed to me as though her spirits were dashed, by a contemplation of the long ribs of unpopulated benches, glistening in the mellow light of the chandeliers. We have all formed a most favorable impression of her, in this latitude. SCHULTZE's violin playing has certainly lost none of the sweetness, purity, and finish, which characterized him years ago, when, as the leader of the old Germania, he was wont to captivate all the hearts of the gentler sex. He is a fit leader to this perfect band of art interpreters. Let us hope that their visit, if not financially productive, may at least have given the sluggishly growing taste for the purest classical models, an impetus in the right direction. Would that they were with us always!

MANRICO.

The operas in New Orleans during the month have been: Trovatore, with Gazzaniga, Tamaro and Berthal; Fille du Regiment, with Colson; the one-act opera, Le Maître de Chapelle; Lucrezia; Favorita; Lucia (with Colson); L'Etoile du Nord; Halevy's Charles the Sixth (for the benefit of Melchisedec, the baritone); Rigoletto (benefit of Mathieu, the tenor); Huguenots; Halevy's Mousquetaires de la Reine; Adam's Si j'étais Roi (with Colson).

Music in New York.

(EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.)

SATURDAY, APRIL 28.—It must have been some fifteen years ago that the announcement of the first attempt in this country to bring out Beethoven's Ninth Symphony attracted us to this great Babel of a city. We heard it then in the vast space of Castle Garden, performed by an immense and somewhat heterogeneous orchestra, hastily assembled, and with but slight rehearsal on the part of most of them. The thing was called, if we remember rightly, a Beethoven Festival, and the object was to commence the formation of a fund for the building of a music hall for Philharmonic concerts. That purpose failed, and the performance of the Symphony was crude enough, and most indifferently appreciated by the great mass of the audience. Yet to us, with all the imperfections, the great outlines of the work, its sure and glorious working out of one great thought, developing it to a world-wide significance, all summed up in the one word JOY, considered as the transport of a thoroughly inspired, united brotherhood of all Humanity, stood out so boldly and spoke so eloquently to every inmost hope and inspiration, that it was impossible not to wish to know the Symphony more thoroughly, and to be thankful ever after for whatever opportunity of hearing it and studying it even through the roughest rehearsals and the coarsest performances. Great things are sure to survive all that, if you once seize the key to their meaning; and each imperfect hearing still prepares you for a better. Since that time, we have had creditable interpretation of it, four or five times, with our small orchestra, in Boston. To-day we have had cause to thank our stars that brought us once more, though on business not entirely musical, to New York. It has been a whole day's musical festival. We were just in time for the last morning rehearsal and for the fifth and last evening Concert of the Philharmonic Society, both of which were held in the Academy of Music.

The rehearsal at 11 A. M. was attended by as large an audience as one sees at home in any concert. We proceeded to a quiet corner in an upper circle, whither the sound ascended clearly, and where we had leisure to note the composition of the noble orchestra, arranged upon the stage in rising tiers. Think of the luxury (to Bostonian ears) of listening to a body of sixty-four strings! There were Thomas and Noll and Mollenhauer, and other finished violinists, to the number of sixteen first and sixteen second violins. There was our old friend BERGMANN, (one of the conductors of the Society, and one of the ablest, if not the ablest we have ever known for symphony music), heading the violoncellos. There were eleven double basses, which told right grandly in those almost speaking soliloquies which precede the entrance of the Joy chorus. The reeds were in a row by themselves behind and above the rest, which served to give them more of that individuality and contrast which they always have in Beethoven's orchestra. And beautiful the reeds were, especially the bassoons. The horns too were beautiful, especially that of Schmitz, which sang with a promptness, precision and delicacy in those all important passages in the Trio of the Scherzo, and in that cadenza in the Adagio, such as we never heard before. The admirable trumpet, too, of Herr Schreiber should be noticed. High in the rear of all, too, it was pleasant to discover the President of the Society, Mr. TIMM, doing artistic service at the great bass drum; that was the true spirit. At the conductor's desk stood THEODORE EISFELD. We could not but think of the strange ups and downs of human fortune, when we thought of him but yesterday picked up from the ocean, senseless, life nearly spent, in the wreck of the burning Austria, and to day, on the top wave as it were of glorious excitement, conducting the Joy symphony of Beethoven.

Himmel-hoch jauchsend,
Zum Tode betrübt:

might be said of it, only reversing the order of the lines. — But speaking of the Philharmonic orchestra, is it not worth while to record here their names? We copy from the bill of the concert:

VIOLINS.—G. Bahlis, J. G. Beisheim, A. Bernstein, A. Besig, G. F. Bristow, W. Doehler, J. Freising, J. Godone, E. Grill, N. Hagen, C. Hahn, G. Helfenritter, F. Herwig, U. C. Hill, J. Kahl, I. E. Meyer, E. Mollenhauer, J. Mosenthal, J. Noll, H. Otto, C. Passaglia, M. J. Pfort, H. Prahl, H. Reyer, G. Schneider, C. Schmidt, M. Schwarz, C. Siedler, T. Thomas, G. Weingarten, J. Windmüller, A. Zeiss.

VIOLAS.—A. Boucher, F. Chevalier, T. Goodwin, G. Haupt, A. Hirschmann, S. Johnson, T. Lotze, G. Matsuka, E. Pauli, R. Schullinger, J. Unger, E. Weber.

VIOLONCELLOS.—F. Allner, C. Bergmann, F. Bergner, C. Brannes, T. Groenevelt, F. Harbordt, H. Lubde, W. Rietsel, D. Walker.

BASS DRUM.—H. C. Timm.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF THE 18TH SEASON.—H. C. Timm, President; Theo. Eisfeld, Vice President; L. Spier, Secretary; D. Walker, Treasurer; C. Passaglia, Librarian; Wm. Scharf-enberg, Carl Bergmann, J. P. Cooke, Chas. Brannes, Jos. Noll, Geo. F. Bristow.

The rehearsal—great a luxury as it was to us to hear such an orchestra—did not, we must confess, augur the best things for the evening's performance. Parts were happy in the rendering, but other parts were somewhat unclear or dull, and lacking some of those vitalizing and expressive nuances which distinguish a routine from an inspired, imaginative rendering. The vocal solos, sung by Mme. JOHANNSEN, Mme. ZIMMERMANN, Herr STIGELLI, and Herr PHILIP MAYER, worked badly enough together; and the chorus were entirely absent; indeed we understood that at in no one rehearsal had all the elements been brought together.

But in the evening we were, agreeably disappointed. The orchestral movements, for the most part, went finely; especially the Scherzo and the heavenly Adagio, which appeared to take great effect upon the majority of the vast audience. The toying and twining together of the two naive little themes in the Trio, as they circle about from bassoon and horn, to clarinet, to flute, to oboe, &c., &c., was made delicious in the clear certainty of outline, easy, natural sequence, and warmth of well blended coloring. The sound of such a mass of strings, especially in the middle parts—the weak point of our Boston orchestras,—was very rich and satisfying.

The choral movement, naturally, was less understood and less enjoyed by the many. It would have been so, we suppose, in any case; and the difficulty was of course increased by great imperfections in the performance. The double basses did their part nobly in the sentences of recitative, which summon up one by one and impatiently dismiss the themes of the preceding movements. Herr Meyer gave the introductory vocal recitative (bass) with considerable power and expression; but the other solo voices appeared weary and inadequate for passages which task the fullest powers of the very greatest singers. The choruses were reasonably well sung,—the German Lieder-kranz part quite unexceptionable; but we have had them more effective in Boston, by the larger choir of the Handel and Haydn Society.—Take it all together, however, we have never heard the Choral Symphony to such advantage, and we count it an event in our life to be always thankful for, that were we here to listen to this last performance of that one of all great musical creations to which we always listen with, we may truly say, more emotion than to any other,—no symphony, nor opera, nor oratorio excepted. For is it not the summing up of all Beethoven's symphonies? the fullest and completest utterance of the great word of his life? the glorified expression of the struggle and the triumph, not only of the life of one great soul, but of Humanity itself, of the whole race, in the prophetic unfolding of whose godlike destiny a great soul like Beethoven loses and forgets,—or rather, for the first time finds—itself?

We must not forget the first part of the Concert, which preceded the Symphony and gave much satisfaction. It opened with a superb rendering of the Zauberflöte overture, and consisted for the rest of a few vocal pieces—a wise abstinence before such a Symphony. Herr Meyer sang a Lied by Abt: Ich denke nur an dich, with rich baritone voice and good style, accompanied obligato by Herr Schreiber's cornet. The latter was finely played; but we cannot reconcile ourselves to sentimental melodies upon brass instruments. It is against their nature, which is properly heroic, and sounds maudlin. Perhaps the brass band concerts have spoiled our ear for such things. Mme. Johannsen sang a famous aria by Weber, which we have long wished to hear: Ocean du ungeheuer ("Ocean, thou mighty monster,") from Oberon. The orchestral part was more edifying than the vocal upon this occasion.

The singer in certain passages,—the softer ones—often suggests fine singing; but the voice proved unequal to great exertion. The music itself is in the best vein of Weber, wonderfully dramatic and imaginative, and the whole construction of the piece, in its successive movements, is strikingly analogous to the more familiar scena in Der Freyschütz. It needs a Jenny Lind to sing it. Stigelli was set down for the tenor air in the "Magic Flute;" O cara imagine, but sang instead, and with exquisite expression, a couple of songs by Schubert: Trockne Blumen and Die Post. The Lieder-kranz (Mr. AGRIEL PAUER, director), sung a couple of part-songs with very fine ensemble and precision, and were enthusiastically recalled.

The audience was immense, filling the parquet and three circles of the great Academy completely; besides a goodly number of the more earnest symphony-lovers, who sat, for the sake of better sound and quiet, above the noisier crowd of fashion, in the upper gallery of all, or amphitheatre. Thither a good instinct led us also into fortunate companionship. There must have been between twenty-five hundred and three thousand persons present; and we understand that nearly $1,000 were taken by the sale of extra tickets, over and above the regular subscription, many paying $1.50 for a ticket. When shall we in Boston have a Philharmonic Society, and one so eagerly supported?

NEW YORK, MAY 1.—Last Tuesday the Chamber Union Concert gave their last Soirée, making it very satisfactory to as large an audience as the tiny hall could hold. The programme presented two novelties—the first of which was the name of a debutante, Miss PAULINE EICHBERG. The young lady, although she has been in the country over a year, appeared in public for the first time on that evening, and it was evidently from this cause that she was rather nervous, and a little inclined to hasten the tempi. Miss Eichberg is a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatoire, very young, and of uncommonly pleasing, lively appearance. She played Mendelssohn's D minor Trio, and the Ballade in A flat of Chopin, and, when encored, a song without words by Mendelssohn. Her style is characterized by a great deal of vigor and spirit, and an entire absence of effort. She won much applause, and may be sure of being gladly heard again by any one. The other new feature of the programme was a Pianoforte Sonata by Mr. SAAR, played by the composer. It is very rarely that we have occasion to welcome a composition of this kind from a modern composer, and most heartily do we welcome it in this case. It is a proof of more than ordinary aspiration in the young artist, and the manner in which the child of his genius was received here, where such compositions usually fall dead upon a concert audience, must have been very gratifying to Mr. Saar. His sonata is a decidedly original work—yet without being at all farfetched and overstrained. It is somewhat new in construction—the usual repetitions being omitted, and the themes carried on under somewhat different treatment, instead. The first movement, Allegro Agitato, is hardly more than an introduction—a preparation for what follows, but based on very pleasing motifs—the Larghetto is so beautiful as to make one regret its brevity, though the Scherzo soon absorbs one entirely. This movement is perhaps the most original of the four, though the finale evidently contains much matter than cannot be thoroughly appreciated, and judged of at a first hearing. In it the interest, which, through the whole, has been gradually rising, reaches its highest point, and the hearer is quite carried away by the wild intensity of this movement. It is a piece that makes one wish to hear it again and again, feeling that every time of listening will make him discover new merits and new beauties. Of course, as the work of a very young composer, (it was written, I understand, some years ago, while Mr. Saar was studying abroad), it is not faultless; but where the good points are so predominant, it is best to judge leniently of error which a longer experience will avoid.

Chopin's beautiful posthumous rondo was very finely played by Messrs. Mills and Saar, and Mr. Eben performed a flute solo with his accustomed skill. The vocal portion of the entertainment was the least successful; Mr. W. H. COOKE sang a ro-manza of Verdi's, and a very insignificant bull of his own, in a manner that left the audience quite cold, in spite of the gentleman's fine tenor voice.

I leave the account of our last Philharmonic Concert, and the first night of Halevy's La Juive to your own able pen, which will do them far more justice than I could, besides having the merit of being that of an impartial outsider. With a protest against your printer's making me call Schubert's "Post" a Poet, I remain as ever,

NEW YORK, MAY 2, 1860. — Last Monday evening Maretzek produced at the Winter Garden, Halevy's La Juive, an opera which has been promised by other managers for years and which was announced at the opening of the Academy of music season by Ullmann and Strakosch. La Juive is a grand work, and probably as enjoyable as any opera destitute of melody can be. It is remarkable that a man of real musical ability could write a long five act opera and get so little melody in it, as in La Juive. There is scarcely a solitary air that can be carried away in the memory and hummed afterward. The nearest approach to such a strain is the passionate phrase, Oh, ma fille chérie, and the succeeding duet in which both Rachel (soprano) and Eleazer (tenor) take part.

The libretto of the opera — written by Scribe — is far superior to the majority of lyric stories. The following is the #### ARGUMENT.

Leopold, a prince of the empire, returning from the wars, is violently smitten with the beauty of Rachel, daughter of Lasarus, the Jew. To win her favor he pretends to be an Israelite, and in the guise of a painter makes an easy conquest of the maiden's heart. Occasional exercises of influence, however, in matters where only the high could have successfully interposed their authority, excite the suspicions of Rachel, and she soon discovers that the Samuel (as he calls himself) of her error is none other than Prince Leopold, and the husband of the Princess Eudoxia. Overcome with rage and indignation, she publicly accuses him of his crime, and the offence, punishable with death, is considered so heinous, that the Cardinal pronounces his malediction and excommunication on the culprits. Rachel, Lasarus and Leopold are placed under arrest to await execution. During this brief period, Eudoxia, the right full wife of Leopold, intercedes with Rachel, and by exhibiting how unselfish is her rightful love, induces her Jewish rival to relent in her hatred, and to intercede for the life of Leopold. This she does by pronouncing her former statement a fabrication of mere jealous frenzy, and devoid of truth. The noble prisoner is at once banished, but Rachel is again condemned to death with her father for conspiring against the life of the man whom, by this fiction, she had just saved. Lasarus, whose sturdy faith and hatred of the Christians have supported him throughout, cares nothing for dying, but determines to be revenged on the Cardinal, who not only has pronounced his fate, but is the head of the Church which he hates. In a narrative he relates that the daughter who has just suffered death is not his own, but one by adoption, plucked from the burning ruins of the Cardinal's palace, at Rome, during a catastrophe there, and the Cardinal's own child.

The music is elaborate and scientific, at times rising to real sublimity, but not maintaining its hold on the hearer's attention. There were many expressions of weariness last Monday evening, and a number of persons left without waiting for the fifth act. Some that did not leave fell asleep.

But the opera La Juive is one that must be heard several times to be at all appreciated or understood. At first hearing it appears grand but heavy, and it is impossible to give or even gain an idea of the merits of the work from one hearing.

La Juive was admirably sung, especially by FABRE and STIGELLI, and put on the stage with great care. On its success Maretzek stakes the prospects of his season.

At the Academy of Music Rossini's Mose in Egitto is announced as the next novelty, and it will be produced next Monday evening, with Patti, Brignoli, Ferri, and Susini in the principal parts.

TROVATORE.

Musical Chat-Chat.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB have returned home after their Southern tour which has been to them a pleasant one and has added not a little to their fame as artists. We take pleasure in copying some notices of their concerts. We cannot agree with the criticism of Mrs. LONG, by the way, and should like to see the hall in Philadelphia too large for her to sing in.

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club gave their last concert on Saturday evening, at the Musical Fund Hall. The attendance was better than that of the previous concerts, but still not at all what it should have been. The instrumental performance was transcendently good, and the audience were thoroughly delighted. Mrs. Long's selections were unsuited to her, and her singing does not sound to the same advantage in a large hall as it did in Chickering's Saloon. The Quintette Club return now to Boston. Although their concerts have not been crowded, they have made many friends here, and we think that we can promise them greater success if they should be induced to visit Philadelphia again. — Phil. Eve. Bull., April 30.

The concert given recently by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston, on their way to Southern cities, has been pronounced by many of our citizens of acknowledged taste, "the best ever given in this city by any artists." In accordance with the general desire of those who heard them, they announce, on their return home, another concert, when they will again have the assistance of Mrs. Long. The opportunity to hear the best music, rendered by performers of the highest standing, does not often occur out of the larger cities, and we doubt if Brinley Hall will be found large enough to hold those of our citizens who would enjoy the performances of the Club, and testify to their appreciation of real excellence. — Worcester Pall., May 2.

INSANITY OF M. JULLIEN. — The Paris correspondent of the Boston Traveller relates the following sad anecdote of Jullien's insanity: "One day he entered his house armed with a large knife. 'Come here,' said he to his adopted child, a girl about eighteen years old, 'I am going to let you hear the angels sing.' He was going to cut her throat. She had presence of mind enough to reply: 'Willingly; but, before I go, let me hear you play on the flageolet, that I may compare your music with theirs.' Jullien thought the idea excellent, and went to get his flageolet, — while he was gone the child called the servants, the unhappy madman was secured and carried to a private mad-house, where he died a few days afterwards."

TRINITY CHURCH CHOIR, NEWPORT. — A Newport correspondent of the (New York) Churchman, pays a fine and well merited compliment to this choir, which we copy below with pleasure:

At Trinity the music was very fine and appropriate for the occasion. The boys sang finely and very spirited, and one great feature in the music was, that the time was precise; the solos were finely rendered by Masters Dunmore and Vernon, whose voices are exceedingly well calculated for that part of the Service. This young choir has improved greatly since last summer. No pains have been spared on the part of the organist, to make the choir compare favorably with the choirs of larger cities. The musical portion of the Services for Easter consisted of extracts from the celebrated masters of church music, Bridgewater, Chappell, and Tallis, a chorus by Haydn, and a carol of Mozart. The responses were sung with great precision, and the Gregorian tones effectively rendered. This choir has had but nine months' practice, and their proficiency in Church music is truly surprising. The boys are very anxious to hear the choirs of Trinity, [the Madison Street Mission Chapel, Trinity Chapel, and the Holy Communion, as they have heard so much spoken of them, and it is quite possible that they may visit the great metropolis this Spring or next Fall, if suitable arrangements can be made to that effect; and I have no doubt that the benefit would be great for all of them, especially if the choirs of the city could meet at Trinity Church for full Choral Service.

A remark which has been made of our Italian operas here, — namely that most of the singers are not Italians — seems to hold good this season of the opera in London. The Musical World says:

One important consideration arising from an examination of the programmes of both operas, is the decline of the vocal art in Italy. How else account for the fact that in both houses the chief parts are filled by foreign singers. At Her Majesty's Theatre, the prima donna assoluta, Mlle. Titiens, is a German; while two others — Madame Marie Cabel and Mlle. Brunetti (Brunet) — are French. At the Royal Italian Opera, Mlle. Csillag is a German, while Mesdames Miolan-Carvalho and Nantier-Didié are French. At Her Majesty's Theatre, Signor Everardi (M. Everard), Signor Vialetti (M. Vialeto) and M. Gassier, are French. At the Royal Italian Opera, M. Faure and Signor Tagliafico are French, while M. Zelger is a Belgian. Furthermore, one theatre opens with a Russian, and the other with a French opera.

NEW ORLEANS. — Parodi as Norma, at the Amphitheatre, brought back to us the recollections of this superb artiste, on her first appearance in this country, nine years ago, when she so successfully and triumphantly divided the favor of the American musical public, as she had previously that of London, with Jenny Lind. The favorite pupil and adopted daughter of the great Pasta, who found in her her own "voice and dramatic spirit renewed," there is no one on the Italian operatic stage, not even Grisi, who can be considered as a truthful interpreter of that large and grandly dramatic school of singing, of which tradition has handed down Pasta as the founder. The last performance of the rôle of Norma, in Italian, we had heard prior to Parodi's, Wednesday night, was that of Grisi; and we have no hesitation whatever, in saying that Parodi's far excelled it. It is related that when, at the close of a twelve month's residence with Pasta, at Como, Parodi was about to enter upon her career, her great teacher embraced her and addressed her in these words: "My child, God has endowed you with a noble voice! I have done for you all that I can do, or that you now need. You are ready to appear before the world. My blessing go with you! I shall live to behold you the first singer of Europe!" And so she did.

We do not find any great deterioration of voice in Parodi, comparing her with our first recollections of her. Perhaps there are not so much fullness and force in the middle notes of her register, but the fine pure upper notes, and those, so marvelously deep and sonorous, in the lower part of the scale, are still in all their pristine vigor. — N. O. Picayune, April 27.

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA. — The theatre re-opened on Tuesday evening, with a very different aspect from that which it presented during the temporary reign of English Opera. Indeed, two theatres could hardly offer more distinct appearances than Covent Garden under Mr. Gye, and Covent Garden under Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. W. Harrison.

The opera was Meyerbeer's Dinorah, to use the English title; Le Pardon de Ploërmel, the French; or, Il Pellegrinaggio, the Italian. Last year, Dinorah brought the season to a triumphant conclusion, and having been given six times only was no doubt looked for by the subscribers and the public, more especially as Madame Miolan-Carvalho was again to be the heroine. The cast differed from that of last year in two important instances — M. Faure filling the part of Hoel (vice Signor Graziani), and Mlle. Giuditta Sylvia that of the male Goatherd (vice Madame Nantier-Didié). M. Faure was an improvement; not so, Mlle. Sylvia.

M. Faure, who succeeded M. Battaille at the Opéra-Comique in Paris, as Peter in Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord, speedily won the favor of the public. So satisfied was Meyerbeer, that he wrote the part of Hoel expressly for M. Faure, who more than confirmed the impression made by his previous impersonation. Italian baritones being scarce, the director of the Royal Italian Opera was naturally anxious to secure the services of so admirable an actor and singer, to strengthen the cast of a work which was so eminently successful last season. Mr. Gye engaged M. Faure not merely for Hoel, but to undertake the repertory never officially represented since Tamburini abandoned the stage. That the French baritone is an accomplished artist there is no question. His voice, powerful and of unusual compass, is equally telling throughout its register. His expression is intense and varied, and his method undeniably good. He is, indeed, a greater master of his resources than most singers of his class; his shake is admirable, and his facility equal to all demands. If M. Faure's voice has not the sympathetic quality of Signor Graziani's, it is more than counterbalanced by superior acquirements as a singer and actor. A more striking performance than that of M. Faure, in Hoel, we have not witnessed a long time on the operatic stage. If we desired to be hypercritical, we might adduce an occasional tendency to exaggeration — as in the romance, "Sei vendicata assai" — which, after all, belongs to the school rather than to the singer individually.

Mad. Miolan-Carvalho is more admirable than ever in Dinorah; more vocally finished — the result of having made herself mistress of the acoustic properties of the house, and adapting her voice to its requirements, and as histrionically perfect — (she could not be more perfect). There is no need to describe Mad. Carvalho's performance in detail. Enough that all the old points were given with the same facility and the waltz movement of the "Shadow Song" (magnificently executed) was encored with acclamations.

The new contralto, Mlle. Giudita Sylvia, was evidently too nervous to do herself justice. That she possesses a good voice, we believe; but beyond this we can say nothing. Her appearance is decidedly prepossessing.

Another new singer, Mlle. Rappazini, who has announced for the female Goat-herd—Mlle. Marai's part last season—not having put in an appearance, the duet, "Sui prati tutti in fiori," in the last act, was omitted, by no means an improvement; while the "Pater noster" was utterly ruined by the inefficiency of two chorus singers, to whom were allotted the parts sustained last season by Mlle. Marai and Madame Nantior-Didiée. Signor Tagliafico was never at his ease in the hunter's song, while Signor Neri-Baraldi was less successful than formerly in that of the Mower. But these and worse drawbacks would have been more than atoned for by the excellence of the rest, not forgetting the absolute perfection of the orchestra, under Mr. Costa's direction.

Dinorah was repeated on Thursday, and will be given for the third time to-night; and on Thursday next Mlle. Rosa Czaillag makes her first appearance as Leonora in Fidelio.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The season was inaugurated with Marta and Fleur des Champs. The cast of the opera, with one exception (Madame Lemaire for Madame Borchardt), was the same as last year at Drury Lane—Mlle. Titiens being Lady Henrietta; Signor Giuglini, Lionel; Signor Vialletti, Plunket; and Signor Castelli, Lord Tristan. The performance was greatly superior to that of last year, owing entirely to the improved quality of band and chorus, with Herr Molique and Mr. Blagrove heading the violins. Mlle. Titiens sang magnificently, but Signor Giuglini was afflicted with sore throat and could with difficulty finish the part. Madame Lemaire gave the music of Nancy most carefully. The audience, somewhat frigid at the commencement, warmed towards the end, and when the curtain descended the singers were summoned, and a call was raised for Mr. Smith, who, however, did not obey the summons.

La Favorita was given, with Madame Borghi-Mamo as Leonora, and Signor Everardi as Alfonso—the first appearance of both in England—Signor Mongini being Fernando (vice Signor Giuglini, indisposed), and Signor Vialletti, Baldassare. At present it will be sufficient to state that the new comers were eminently successful, the lady worthily supporting the high reputation she enjoys abroad, and the gentleman proving himself one of the most accomplished baritone basses who had been heard for years in this country. Signor Everardi's voice is of fine quality (pure Italian quality, be it understood, although he is, properly speaking, a Belgian), powerful and flexible—one of those Rossinian voices, in short, so rare of late. His style and method are in the best school, his taste and expression undeniable. Add to the foregoing a good stage face and figure, and it cannot be denied that Signor Everardi is likely to prove a valuable acquisition. Madame Borghi-Mamo's voice is a mezzo-soprano, of great compass, fine clear tone, and flexibility only surpassed by Madame Alboni. A thorough artist, and a genuine Italian singer, Madame Borghi-Mamo knows how to make the best of her means, exceptional as in many respects they are. Signor Mongini surprised every one in Fernando, a part which many anticipated would not suit his vigorous style. He sang finely throughout and with exceeding judgment, never once indulging in those vociferous outbursts hitherto the bane of his performances, and which have often neutralized the effect so splendid a voice must otherwise inevitably produce. His most striking display on Thursday night was the romanza, "Spinto gentil," which was encored with enthusiasm. Signor Vialletti gave the music of Balthazar with power and judgment. The chorus was excellent, and the band, under the able direction of Mr. Benodict, thoroughly efficient, although some addition to the strength of the violins and other stringed instruments, to make head against the overwhelming power of the brass, was generally pronounced advisable.

Paris.

April 4th.—Last week the Italian opera gave us a "revival," in the shape of Meyerbeer's opera, Il Crociato in Egitto. It is now thirty-seven years since it has been played here, and it is said that it is against Meyerbeer's advice that it is revived now. It was brought out when Rossini was manager of the Opera here, and Meyerbeer, who was then unknown, and of course nervous and doubtful, as to his success with the Parisian world, told Rossini it would be a failure. Rossini replied it would be a success, and bet him five hundred francs about it. Meyerbeer accepted the bet; and, as the piece proved successful, was no doubt only too happy to pay. This work, belonging quite to the youth of Meyerbeer, and framed almost mechanically on the Italian model, with pieces composed invariably of an adagio, then an allegro, cavatina and airs d'obbligato, and rondos, with all the usual concomitants of fioritures and cabalettas, so different to his present style, still gives a slight foretaste of the genius that was one day to give us the Huguenots; and there are also some very striking airs; the song of the "Crociato" is one, and the well-known trio for female voices, and in which the principal motif non fidarti o ginor cor recalls the music of Bellini, are among the rest. The finale of the first act is very fine, and in the last death-song, sang by Merly and the chorus, are also remarkable. Mad. Borghi-Mamo performed the part of the Crociato, and Mad. Penco, Alboni, Signors Merly and Angelini filled the remaining principal parts; but, notwithstanding the excellence of the performance, the revival has not been met with any monstrous enthusiasm. At the Grand-Opéra, Pierre de Médicis has been alternated with a performance of the Huguenots, Mad. C. Bartot filling the part of Valentine, Gueymard and Obin Raoul and Marcel. The Opéra-Comique, finding that old pieces answer so well, contentedly keeps to them. The Théâtre-Lyrique, however, has brought out a comic opera in five acts, a thing almost unheard of, Mozart being nearly the only one who had ever brought out one so long. The libretto is by MM. Jules Barbier and Michael Carré, the music by M. Théodore Semet, and the subject is taken from some of the numerous adventures of Gil Blas. Mad. Ugalde fills the part of the hero to the great delight of the public, for whatever charm may now and then be found wanting in her voice she supplies by her animated acting, and carries the piece through triumphantly. The music is gay, sparkling and original. The least successful parts are the choruses. The best airs in the opera, are, Gil Blas' drinking song, "Bacchus est le vrai médecin," the grand duo buffo of the second act, the marriage chorus, "rondo pastoral," the finale of the fourth act; but nothing is equal to the song he sings before the door of the inn where the villagers are feasting, accompanying himself with a mandoline. He is expressing the hunger he feels, and when they will not listen to him he changes his tone to diabolical menaces. The air was rapturously encored. Mesdames Faure, Moreau, Vade, MM. Wartel, Lesage, Legrand, Votel, Serene, Leroy, Gabriel, Giradot, fill the other parts. There has been some talk for the last few days of a probable change in the management of the Théâtre-Lyrique; M. Carvalho retiring, and M. C. Retz, who has been, up to the present moment, Secretary-General of the Theatre, filling his place. However, nothing is decided yet. The Bouffes-Parisiens, though like the little frog in the fable, it tries occasionally to approach the dimensions of the ox, has yet good sense enough to know at what point to stop. Its last production is a sort of field-flower, in the shape of a patois-pastoral, entitled Daphnis and Chloé. A pretty little actress, Mlle. Juliette Beau, debuted in it. The music is by the indefatigable M. Offenbach. In Paris some novelty must always be going on; people cannot rest on their oars here, and even now, before Fidelio is brought out at the theatre, they talk of an opera with much scenery by M. Charles Gounod, entitled La Reine Balkir. M. Gott, also—of the Théâtre-Français—has written an opera in four acts, the music by M. Mempré, under the title of Le Moine Rouge, though whether it is to be played or not I have not heard.

There is little new this week at the theatres. The concerts continue with unabated ardor, of which the best, the eighth and last concert of Jeunes Artistes, took place on the 1st. Fragments of Meyerbeer's Struensee were given. "La revolte des gardes," a polonaise, "La Bal," was very good, and the bacchanal chorus from Phlémon et Baucis was encored. And thus with all these entertainments Lent is passing—indeed has almost passed away. It certainly this year has not been a season of fasting and mortification, and the ladies of the great world have rushed with equal ardor to their church in the morning and dressed in "gorgeous array" for their ball in the evening, thinking one neutralized the other, and thus reconciling the claims of religion and of the world to their consciences in that comfortable manner only French people can. Talking of the crowding of churches, there is one thing very necessary, and that is—more church-room for the people. There is not enough for the population of Paris, and the scenes, the pushing, the rudeness and quarrelling, that take place in a crowded church here, is more fit for the crush-room of a theatre than a spot dedicated to divine worship.—Corr. London Musical World.

Forget thee! J. Blockley. 25

Flowers ever bloom around us. E. J. Loder. 25

Choice selections from the last compositions of popular English writers.

The lost Child. Comic Song. Hood. 30

Thomas Hood's well-known serio-comic song with a happy musical version. It is one of the few so-called comic songs that are really such.

Oh! for a husband! Song. Frank Mori. 25

A pleasant little musical drolery, of a maiden who was disappointed by being too much in a hurry for a husband. The music is pretty.

The moonlit stream. Ballad. S. Glover. 25

Once more we sing you a song. A. Ball. 25

Kate O'Brien. Ballad. C. W. Glover. 25

The Sunshine of the heart. Song. S. Glover. 25

Light, pretty ballads for young singers.

The day-star of freedom. Patriotic song. J. W. Turner. 30

A pathetic air in march-time, bold and manly. The title-page is adorned with a portrait of Master Renta, whose clarion voice has so often charmed the public.

Instrumental Music.

Broken Vase Polka. (Illustrated.) A. Liders. 50

An excellent Polka, particularly recommended to those who have occasion to play for dancing. The composer is a popular leader in Hamburg, and this polka had long found its way into all the ball-rooms before it appeared in print. It must become popular. The title-page is very handsomely illustrated.

Alpine Maid. Th. Oesten. 25

Song of the lovely. " 25

Turkish March. " 25

Three more numbers of that useful set of easy pieces for pupils of about two quarters' practice, called the "Nebelbilder." All the teachers are highly pleased with them. They will be as standard as Czerny's "Germany" has been.

Grand Etude Galop, by Quident, arranged for four performers on two pianos. T. Bissell. 1,25

As the demand for these arrangements increases, a better piece could hardly have been selected to meet it partly, than this brilliant, dashing galop of Quident's. We would only say to Teachers of Classes: Try it. It will be the feature in any Exhibition.

The Diarist in Vienna.

FROM 5 TO 7 P. M., MARCH 29.—A party of five Beethoven enthusiasts—Madame L., possessor of that fine, poetic bust of the composer, modelled by Prof. Schaller for the late Carl Holz; Prof. L., Dr. Gerhard von Breuning, Hof Sekretair Walther, and myself. We drove through the city, out at the Schotten Thor, across the Glacis and to the Schwarzschaner house. We ascended the two broad flights of stone stairs, whilom devoted to the dignitaries of the church and the heads of the old convent. The servant maiden opened the door into a range of apartments now for a few weeks empty, and we passed through two ante-chambers into the large main room, whence one has so fine a view of Glacis, city and suburb.

Thirty-three years ago to-day, the Hof Sekretair, then a young man, and Dr. Breuning, then a child of thirteen years, were here for the last time—it was the day of the funeral of Beethoven. In yonder corner had stood the bed on which he died.

"There," said the doctor, "I piled the forty volumes of Handel's works upon the dying man's bed. Here stood the two grand pianofortes, that by Graf, and that which came as a present from London. There stood the book case; in that smaller room were his writing desk, and the table where he composed. Once only did I see him in the act of composition. On this spot stood my father and Schindler, when they urged upon him the propriety of making his will."

And the strong man, overcome with his emotions, turned away to the window—and we were silent. We passed through the eight rooms, large and small, which belong to the range of apartments, all of which the composer had hired. Our conversation was in low tones, and there could be but one topic. The empty rooms, sounding to our steps, became again the abode of the sick man. We saw him lying there patient and composed, heard him reply to the written questions of doctor, brother, or friend, saw the old house-keeper or the servant girl coming at the sound of his bell—in short lived over again with Breuning those last months during the winter of 1826-7. We lingered long and then, with touched hearts, left the house and drove out to the church yard at Waehring—but a mile or two away. Spring had not yet come, and the place looked drear and desolate. But the simple granite monument, with the one word, upon it, was spring enough for us, and we clustered round the slab, which covers his ashes, and exchanged thoughts, feelings and recollections upon the great soul that once had dwelt in them. Madame L., had brought a wreath of immortels. We each took a few of the unfading flowers, in remembrance of the day, and attached the wreath to the willow, which shades the grave; and then I was touched as she knelt, while we turned away, and obedient to the poetic superstition of the Romish church invoked in silent prayer a blessing upon the departed soul.

A pleasant little poem was then read to us by Herr Walther. We gathered a few buds and leaves of evergreens which lay there, and left the grave—some of us probably never to see it again.

NOTES.

APRIL 1.—April Fool's Day—the proper time for me to read this Vienna news, which Dwight's Journal, of March 17, has just brought me. I cannot quite make it out; that is, whether some one has been playing a trick upon the editor, or has undertaken to make paragraphs out of German papers, his studies in the language still leaving him in the dark as to the difference of form in the past, present and future tenses of the verbs. In fact Salvi's Italian opera, so far from having opened with Rossini's "Siege of Corinth," and having been followed by Norma, Semiramide, (with Alboni) and Favorita—does not open until the 9th of this month! As to the new operas by Dreyschock and Randbartiger at the Kärnthnerthor, the list of performances during the season, which is herewith enclosed, contains no such names. Whether Madame Schumann is to take up her abode here is also a question. One of the papers last week expressed the wish that she would do so.

Handel's "Alexander's Feast," by the Sing Akademie. My first hearing of it. It is one of the works on which Beethoven founded his opinion that "Handel was the unequalled master of all masters."

On a certain Saturday morning in May 1849, I leaped from the deck of the old ship Roscoe, upon the quay at Antwerp, and hurried off to seek my way through the intricate streets to that glorious cathedral tower, which since the morning before had been visible over the Belgian plains, as the vessel made its slow way up the Scheldt. I found it. I for the first time passed into a cathedral worthy the name, and felt emotions, which language cannot describe. On leaving the church, I crossed the small triangular place before the grand western entrance, and just as I turned a corner I looked back upon that tower, the most beautiful thing in architecture which I have ever seen, and a strange delight filled all my being and sent the tears gushing into my eyes. And it was precisely this feeling, which the ineffable beauty of this music aroused within me, and which found relief in the same manner. It is easy enough to understand how tragic music, or that in which the depths of sorrow and pity are expressed, should bring one to tears. We weep in such cases, as we do at passages in fiction or upon the stage, where our sympathies are excited by sorrows, which for the moment are real to us. But why should mere beauty affect us so? Why should the opening movement of Beethoven's overture, Op. 124, why choruses expressive of triumph and joy in the works of Handel awaken emotions, which open the gateways of our tears? What have we not lost in Boston, that the "Alexander's Feast" remains still unknown! It would not be too long to give at a mixed concert, provided the symphony be a short one.

APRIL 2.—As the Journal is a paper of Art and Literature, will not some of its correspondents—there are many, who can do it—aid in forming an American Schiller Bibliography? A magnificent volume has been prepared by Dr. Constant von Würzbach, and printed at the Imperial press in Vienna, containing a most extensive and complete catalogue of Schiller's works in all sorts of European editions, collective and separate; but the labors of our scholars and publishers find little place. I think we have no cause to be ashamed of American translations from, or editions of, his works.

In 1806, appeared a periodical at Weimar, devoted to criticism principally, entitled "Elysium and Tartarus;" i. e., most of the numbers were headed with the former word, some of them with the latter, in which unfortunate would-be-poets, and pseudo artists, were rendered unhappy. Here is a complete title—notable because Goethe had something to do with it.

Mittwoch, den 2 Juli.

In this number is a continuation of Art-news from Rome, a passage of which, being interpreted, is this:—

"An American Artist, Washington Allstone, has just finished a landscape, which, from its style of execution, is very remarkable. One notices in the works of Garafalos and many old masters a freshness and liveliness of color, which leave later works far behind. Washington believes that he has discovered the secret of that style. He, in a landscape, and Schick, in his excellent portrait of the young baroness von Humboldt, have employed this method very happily. The secret is said to be the use of asphaltum. [Literally, lacing with asphaltum.] This landscape, which has no middle ground (for a lake fills the plain surface), has through this treatment in its coloring an extraordinary force of effect. Two groups of trees, in one of which they are straight, full of foliage and of a deep green, in the other irregular, wild looking trunks on a base of rocks, shut in the view at the sides. The dark green, the gloomy glades, have something grand and at the same time strange. The view is taken from lake Lucerne. Mt. Pilate rises from the water, a small island swims upon the waves, mighty, snow-crowned mountains close in the distance. Without being particularly excellent as a composition, something grand speaks to us in the picture, which effect is increased by its striking lights and the extreme transparency of its strong colors. The trees have a strange air (they are very green and flat) and appear to be of American growth. Diana, with her nymphs and dogs, is hunting upon the shore of the lake. The background is rather gray (fällt ins Graue), the clouds are heavy still the character of the mountains is well expressed and handled with understanding. The drawing of the trees, which is also somewhat heavy, has much of Ruisdael's manner."

I find the following in an old number of the London Harmonicon, June, 1820:

Mozart's celebrated Symphony, "Jupiter," newly adapted, &c.

This splendid Symphony derives the name of Jupiter, now first publicly given to it upon anything like authority, from a very distinguished orchestral performer, who, unpremeditatedly in conversation remarked, that such a title would well denote its majestic grandeur. We record this little anecdote, for the purpose of saving Mozart from any future charge of vanity that might be advanced, should it ever be supposed, that he himself gave so high-sounding an appellation to one of his own works.

The late German opera season of the Kärnthnertheater in Vienna, began July 1, 1859, and closed March 31, 1860, nine months. The number of performances was 248, viz.:

Stabat Mater Dolorosa.

From ELISE POLKO'S "Musikalische Märchen, Phantasien und Skizzen;" translated by FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

"See Naples and die!" These words must have rung in the ears of every one whose glance fell on the noble landscape around Naples, on a brilliant October morning of the year 1735. There she lay, the fairy city, with her countless cupolas and towers, over which hung the radiant golden veil of early dawn! There arose on high the mighty, cloud-crowned cupola of the greatest of cathedrals—the summit of Vesuvius! And the lovely Bay! rocking hither and thither, it rested on the proud breast of earth, like a heavy golden drop, fallen from the floating sea of light above. A warm, rosy air trembled above the thick myrtle and orange woods; played among the slender vine-branches, as they friendly reached out their green hands to each other, and danced along the garden of the road; and kissed the large flowers and creepers, that covered the ground with a colored net. It seemed as though the breath of God floated over this fairest spot on his earth; as though peace, joy, and beauty must dwell here forever.

On the gentle slope of a flowery hill, hidden behind a luxuriant growth of laurel-roses, overshadowed by platanos and olive trees, half overgrown with magnolias and tender vines, stood a large crucifix of stone, with a figure of the afflicted Madonna at its feet. Probably some strange accident had brought the group hither, and pious faith had sought to save the treasure from destruction in this humble asylum; for its workmanship was of astonishing beauty, and deserved a place in the proudest church. In every line of the life-sized figures the hand of a master could be traced, whose genius had transformed the hard stone to a soft mass, breathing life and soul; it was the victorious hero of faith, whose form hung on the cross, and not the dying martyr. The noble features were calm, holy, almost transfigured; the beautiful body lay in the unconquerable stiffness of death; nowhere a trace of pain or conflict. But Maria, the mater dolorosa! A glorious form, not sinking, but crushed under a weight of woe! a wondrous face! on which a vast sorrow was petrified; a picture of pain that hath no end. Stony tears—how fearfully heavy!—hung from the eyelids, and the fine mouth was cramped with a misery that could find no consolation in heaven or earth. Fresh green leaves softly nestled against the drapery of the sufferer, and sweet flowers, outspringing, close to the body of the crucified one, softly covered the wounds. Seldom did a pious wanderer discover this group, seldom was a knee bowed before this cross.

On the above-mentioned October morning, however, it happened that a pale young man threw himself before the holy group; his face was a serious and suffering one, fatigued and sorrowful were his eyes, weak and bent his tall figure; with a deep sigh he looked up towards the crucified One. He saw the heavenly peace of the great dead, and a shudder of involuntary belief came over him; he saw the angelic features of Maria, the nameless grief they expressed, and drew back from the influence of such immeasurable woe. Pity seized his soul; he longed to draw forth the sword that pierced this mother's breast; it seemed as though the stony tears cried aloud for mercy. The ills he had brought hither disappeared before the giant weight of this silent pain; all complaint hurried back to his heart, he forgot the consuming troubles of his breast, and humbly bowed his head.

At this moment a clear Ave Maria rang through the air, sung by two lovely female voices; a pair of sisters, whose sick mother the Madonna had graciously healed, approached, bringing the queen of heaven their daily thank-offering of fresh flowers. They were two fair forms, one tall and full, with a proud glance and cheeks glowing with life; the other blonde, tender, with black eyes and soft, delicate features. They laid their fragrant flowers at the foot of the crucifix, prayed softly, and then moved away. But the fair-haired maiden turned her pretty head to look after the lonely youth who still knelt there, praying.

He then looked up and cried: "Madonna, have pity on me! I am alone and suffering in this fair world! Give me a heart to love me, and heal the wound of my sick breast!" Then it seemed as if a veil fell from his eyes; the figure of the Madonna appeared to move, the fire of life streamed over the face of the mother of sorrow, and her stony mouth breathed; "Bring to my immeasurable woe a worthy sacrifice, soften these stony tears, so that they flow gently, and lessen the weight of my martyred heart, let my stiffened wounds bleed sweetly, and thy prayer shall be heard!"

When the thoughts of the amazed youth returned to their ordinary course, the noon-day sun was shining in unclouded splendor, and all living things were seeking a shelter from its hot breath. But he heeded it not; his cheeks burned, his eyes flamed, a happy smile played round his lips; with an unsteady step he hastened back to Naples.

And on another day the fair sisters came back again in the clear morning sun, and again sang their pious, childlike Ave Maria, in which the silvery soprano of the tender blonde contrasted and harmonized exquisitely with the rich contralto of the lovely brunette. And again they found the young man with the dark locks and the earnest face; but this time he was not kneeling before the crucifix; he lay on the slope of the hill, and sometimes his glance wandered hither and thither, and sometimes he wrote with a pencil on a leaf which he held in his hand. Then there was so much enthusiasm in his face, that Lauretta almost forgot to lay her bunch of roses before the Madonna, while gazing, surprised, on the glowing face of the young stranger. At last the sisters went away; but Lauretta dropped the little bunch of orange blossoms that decked her bosom, at the feet of the youth.

And so they saw each other every day; neither rain nor wintry storm prevented their pilgrimage. The glance of the fair Lauretta grew ever gentler, the words and tone of her soft greeting more timid, the rapt expression of the serious stranger's face became more and more striking. At length came March, a month of delight in Italy, with its sprouting buds, its fresh leaves, and mild airs.

But Lauretta did not see, that in spite of the enlivening influence of the breath of spring, the youth's step became heavier, his cheeks more hollow than before; for a deceptive red colored his face, and his eyes glowed with an unearthly fire. He asked them one day: "May I bring you a song to-morrow; a song of praise to the Madonna? Will you sing it for me with your clear, sweet voices, and so help me to bring a sacrifice to her? Madonna desires such a sacrifice, and has promised me a noble reward. How I long for its fulfilment! Help me to keep my vow! sing my song next Sunday at the foot of this crucifix, and you shall be witnesses of the wonder Madonna will work in my behalf. Lucia nodded friendly to him, Lauretta laid her trembling hand in his, while a tear fell silently from the precious night of her eyes.

It was on the sixteenth of March, a Sunday evening, that their three figures reached the crucifix together; Lauretta supported the tottering step of the young man; a crown of violets hung from her arm. He knelt down, and raising his waxen hands, cried out, in a passionate tone: "Holy mother of sorrow, accept my sacrifice!" And then ascended, like the incense of sound, the voices of the sisters, firmly, clearly, seriously; they sang the words:

"Stabat mater dolorosa
Juxta crucem, lacrimosa,
Dum pendebat filius."

Not a breath of air moved through the leaves; no sound stirred; there was a holy silence around, as though nature listened to the true religious sublimity of this song. A soft, deep melancholy trembled in the maidens' voices. With indescribable anxiety, with feverish expectation, the young man watched the face of the Madonna; and as these words ascended:

"Quis est homo, qui non fletet,
Christi matrem si videret
In tanto supplicio?"

and floated, like the breath of sympathy, from the lips of the pious songstresses, the face of the Mater dolorosa appeared to soften; a heavenly repose touched the fine mouth; the stony tears melted and flowed down; the wounds of her transfixed bosom sweetly bled, and the warm drops fell on the head of him who sacrificed. Then the wild, gnawing pains of his body seemed calmed, his breast heaved with full, free breath, a delicious weariness overcame him, he stretched forth his arms—Lauretta bent down towards him, they exchanged a happy smile—GIOVANNI BATTISTA PERGOLESI was dead!

The crucifix with the figure of the weeping mother has long since fallen to decay. Jessamine and aloe bushes cover the spot, and the body of the youthful, immortal master rests in the cool cathedral of Besorato. But at the foot of the hill, against whose slope the crucifix once leaned, rises a flower-covered grave, sinking under the heavy foot of time, and overshadowed by cypresses. It shelters the once fair frame of the loving heart that the Madonna promised to her petitioner; the earthly remains of the gentle Lauretta.

Chopin's Mazurkas.

(From the London Musical World.)

"Chopin's Mazurkas," in eleven books, complete, with a Biographical and Critical Introduction—edited by J. W. Davison (Boosy and Sons). * *

Probably among the numerous productions of Chopin, the Mazurkas are the most genial and characteristic. The natural offspring of his peculiar idiosyncrasy, they breathe his spirit, reflect his sentimentality, and are the truest media of communication between his inner self and the outside world, which he, like all men specially gifted, men of genius, in short, was born to delight. We verily believe that there is more of the genuine spirit of Chopin in one of these brief Mazurkas, than in the whole of his concertos, sonatas, and larger compositions put together. Whereas, in his elaborate compositions, he was stilted, mannered, and catachrestical, in his Mazurkas (and the minor effusions) he is nearly always spontaneous, natural, and, therefore, sympathetic. With this conviction, we can endorse, without reservation, the words with which the editor, whose labors are now before us, sums up the paragraph in which he briefly glances at the entire production of Chopin:—

"That Chopin, however, excelled less in works of 'longue haleine' than in those of smaller pretensions, will hardly be denied. His Etudes, his Preludes, his Valses, his Nocturnes, and above all his Mazurkas, are quite enough to save him from oblivion, whatever may eventually become of his concertos and sonatas. The variety with which in the Mazurkas he has said the same thing some fifty times over, will go further than anything else to prove that Chopin's genius, whatever its eccentricities and failings, was decidedly inventive. The best of the Mazurkas are without question those that smell the least strongly of the lamp, those which, harmonized in the least affected manner, are easiest to play, and bear the closest affinity to (in some cases are almost echoes of) the national dance tunes of his country. Some of them are gems, as faultless as they are attractive, from whatever point of view regarded: others, more evidently labored, are less happy; but not one of them is wholly destitute of points that appeal to the feelings, surprise by their unexpectedness, fascinate by their plaintive character, or charm by their ingenuity." * *

Mr. Davison's preface, contains almost as much of biographical and anecdotal as of critical and analytical matter; and, had we space, we could entertain our readers with no end of ana. We must, however, be satisfied with one or two extracts. Here is a paragraph about Chopin's early love:—

"Chopin never married; but he cherished, it is said, an attachment all his life. This Dr. Liszt informs us was for a young compatriot of his hero—'belle et douce jeune fille, comme une Madone de Luini, &c.' It appears that this 'belle et douce jeune fille' loved Chopin with an earnest love to the end, and really, in examining the scanty incidents of his life, it is difficult to assign any reason why he should not have married her. She was faithful to his memory after death, and wasted her maidenhood in constant care and solicitude for his surviving parents. She made a portrait of him, which Chopin's father would never allow to be replaced by any other; and in a thousand various ways exhibited her devotion."

The origin of the Chopin-Mazurka may be cited as a corollary to the foregoing:—

"But Chopin, who (like Steerforth) was very popular at school, became intimate with Prince Borys Czetwertynska and his brothers. At their house, where music was assiduously cultivated, he saw and knew the Princess-mother, 'belle encore,' and of an 'esprit sympathique,' whose saloons were the most brilliant and recherchés in Warsaw. The Princess-mother was, nevertheless, only a monad in the new sphere which now became Chopin's universe. 'At her house Chopin often met the most distinguished ladies of the capital; he became acquainted with those seductive beauties whose renown was European, at a time when Warsaw was celebrated for the éclat, the elegance and the grace of its society. Through the intervention of the Princess Czetwertynska he had the honor of being introduced to the Princess Lowicz, at whose house he became intimate with the Countess Zamoyska, the Princess Radziwill, and the Princess Jablonowska, enchanteuses, surrounded by other beauties less illustrious."

"The conception of the Mazurka, as Chopin understood it, here took place in his perplexed brain. Let this important period be described here at length, with the apology that Dr. Liszt's French is not easy to reduce into English:—'Still very young, it fell to the lot of Chopin to govern their steps by the chords of his piano. In those reunions, which might be likened to assemblages of fairies, he was no doubt often enabled to discover, suddenly unveiled in the whirl of the dance, the secrets of those aspiring and tender hearts; he was able without difficulty to read in their souls, which leaned with friendly sympathy towards his adolescence, and saw of what a mixture of levain and pâte de rose (of — and —; but the original is inimitable) of saltpetre and angel's tears (!) was kneaded the poetic ideal of his country. When his fingers unconsciously ran over the keys, and drew from them a succession of touching harmonies, he was able to divine in what manner the secret tears of enamored girls and young neglected wives were shed; how the eyes of men both given to love and jealous of glory became humid with emotion. How often must some lovely girl, petitioning for a simple prelude, have leaned her beautiful elbow on the instrument, to support her dreaming head, and allowed Chopin to guess from her look the strain her heart was singing; how often must a group of nymphes folâtres, in order to coax out of him a waltz of vertiginous rapidity, have besieged him with smiles that placed him in unison with their gaiety! There he saw unfolded in the Mazurka the chaste graces of his magnificent countrywomen,' &c., &c.

"Chopin used to recount in his peculiar manner (he did everything in a 'peculiar manner') that here he 'understood for the first time what sentiments the melodies and rhythms of the National Dance were capable of expressing.' Here, too, he learned how to set high value on that noble and reserved deportment, united to vivacity of sentiment, 'qui préserve la délicatesse de l'affiduessement, qui empêche la prévenance de rancir'—"which Dr. Liszt may translate for himself. At all events, the Mazurka—Chopin's Mazurka—was the offspring of these reunions, which at the same time may account for the reason of his leaving the 'belle et douce jeune fille,' who sketched his portrait, to pine away in loneliness, while he wasted his manly vigor in the enervating saloons of enervated capitalists."

And as corollary, No. 2 (the early love still figuring in the background), a paragraph may be added, relating to Chopin's intimacy with the Baroness Duvdevant (George Sand):—

"A professed hater of women-authors, Chopin had a great inclination to make the acquaintance of Mad. Georges Sand, with whom he subsequently, however, formed an intimacy which for some years wholly absorbed him. In 1837, this celebrated lady accompanied Chopin to the island of Majorca, where he had been ordered by medical advice, and where he remained, tenderly nursed by the authoress of Lélia, during an alarming and protracted illness. 'The remembrance of the days passed in Majorca,' says Dr. Liszt, 'was graven on the heart of Chopin like that of a rapture, an ecstasy which fate accords but once to the most favored.' 'He was not' (it is probably Mad. Sand who speaks) 'on earth; he was in an empyrean of golden clouds and perfumes; his fine and exquisite imagination seemed drowned in a monologue with God himself, and if perchance, on the radiant prism where he forgot himself, some accident caused the little magic lantern of the world to pass, he would experience most frightful uneasiness, &c., &c.' (the rest to match). However, Chopin's residence in Majorca was beneficial in every respect, and his 'admirable nurse,' Mad. Sand ('herself a great artist,') embellished every incident of his sojourn.* Under these circumstances, what chance was there (it may be asked) for the 'belle et douce jeune fille,' pining in the land of Mazurkas?"

For an account of the incidents connected with Chopin's death, and with the friends immediately about him at the time; for a description of his funeral obsequies at the Madeleine (Paris); for an elaborate analysis of Chopin's talent, as pianist and composer, including observations on his social qualities and individual character as a man, together with comparisons between him and other musicians; we must refer our readers to Mr. Davison's preface, which leaves few points of any importance undiscussed. We can only find room for a passage or two concerning Charles Filtch, whose early demise (at the age of fourteen) deprived the musical world of an undoubted genius. Speaking of Chopin's play, Mr. Davison thus alludes to the talent of his pupil:

"It must, however, be admitted that the pupil, Charles Filtch (who died at the early age of fourteen), surpassed the master, inasmuch as while preserving all the ethereal grace and delicacy of Chopin's play, all its variety of tone and passionate impulsiveness, Filtch superadded a certain vigor and unity, which endowed it with a more consistent vitality—rare (almost unprecedented) instance of a copy excelling the original, and the more wonderful considering the extreme youth of the copyist."

Here is an instance of Filtch's extraordinary memory:

*Chopin lived, however, to be repaid from the accomplished novelist, which separation he often declared was equivalent to his death-knell.

"Filtch passed the season 1843 in London. How intimately he was versed in the music of his master, may be gathered from a fact which occurred under the notice of the writer. Engaged to perform Chopin's second concerto in public, the orchestral parts not being obtainable, Filtch, nothing dismayed, wrote out the whole of them from memory."

Mendelssohn of course knew Chopin (whom did Mendelssohn not know?); and with a Mendelssohn paragraph we must be satisfied to close our budget: "Mendelssohn, in speaking of one of the Preludes of Chopin, expressed himself in terms of such unqualified admiration, as to elicit a query from an interlocutor, unable to understand the cause of the great master's enthusiasm. 'I love it,' replied Mendelssohn, with unusual warmth; 'I cannot tell you how much, or why; except, perhaps, that it is something which I could never at all have written.' On the other hand, questioned about the finale of one of the sonatas, Mendelssohn said, briefly and bitterly, 'Oh! I abhor it.' When Chopin was first in Paris he took lessons on the pianoforte of the late Kalkbrenner, whose reputation as a professor then stood very high. This fact, for some unfathomable reason, used to be kept a secret by Chopin, and was openly denied by some of his friends, indisposed to believe that such a wayward and fitful genius could receive any benefit whatever from the tutelage of a musical drill-sergeant. It is, nevertheless, true; and equally so that Mendelssohn, with whom at the time Chopin had contracted a friendly intimacy, expressed his astonishment, on being told by Chopin himself that he had come to Paris expressly to study under Kalkbrenner. 'Why,' said Mendelssohn, always quick to appreciate talent in others, 'you play better than Kalkbrenner.'

And so he did, as all can testify who ever heard him, even when sickness weighed him down, and he was scarcely more than a shadow. Chopin's play, indeed, was so original and individual, that his music, performed by almost any of the great pianists, his contemporaries (Filtch alone excepted), seemed to want something, which though undefinable, was indispensable to its perfect interpretation.

Richard Wagner in Paris.

(Translated from French and German papers for this Journal.)

I. A CRITICISM BY BERLIOZ.

The concert began with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," a two-act opera, which I saw performed, under the direction of the composer, in 1841, in Dresden, with Mme. Schröder-Devrient in the principal rôle. This piece made the same impression on me then, that it does now. It begins with a powerful orchestral effect, in which one from the outset seems to recognize the howling of the storm, the screaming of the sailors, the creaking of cordage and the tempestuous roaring of the angry ocean. The commencement is splendid; it exercises a commanding power over the audience; it carries you away; but as the same process is continually applied, as one tremolo, one chromatic passage follows after another, without a single ray of sunshine breaking through the black storm clouds and everlasting torrents of rain, without the slightest melodic motive brightening up the murky harmonies, the attention of the hearer flags, he loses courage and succumbs. You find already expressed in this overture, which seems to me excessively expanded, the tendency of Wagner and his school to make no account of feeling (sensation), and to keep in mind only the poetic and dramatic idea, unconcerned whether the expression of this idea compel the composer to overstep the musical conditions or not.

The overture to "The Flying Dutchman" is powerfully instrumented, and the composer understood how to derive an extraordinary advantage in the beginning from the use of the pure Fifth. The introduction of this chord produces a singular, shudderingly mild impression.

The great Tannhäuser scene (march and chorus) is a brilliant, grandiose piece, the effect of which is heightened by its key, B-flat major. The rhythm, which is never hemmed in or disturbed in its course by the juxtaposition of other opposed rhythms, has a knightly, proud, straight-forward character. Without seeing the stage action one is sure, that such a music accompanies the movements of bold, strong men in complete armor. This piece, contains a clearly outlined, elegant, but not very original melody, reminding you in form, if not in accent, of a famous theme in Der Freyschütz. The last return of the vocal passage in the grand tutti is still more energetic than at the beginning, by means of the entrance of the basses, which play eight notes in the bar, while the upper voices have but two or three. To be sure some rather hard and exceedingly condensed modulations occur in it; but the orchestra brings them out with such power and authority, that the ear meets them unresistingly beforehand. On the whole the piece is a masterpiece and instrumented, like all the rest, with a skilful hand. Wind instruments and voices are animated with a mighty breath, and the violins, written with a wonderful lightness in the highest passages, send out over the whole a dazzling sea of sparks.

The Tannhäuser overture is in Germany the most popular of Wagner's orchestral pieces. Power and strength still predominate in it; but for me at least the plan which the composer has prescribed to himself in it is productive of an uncommon weariness. It begins with an Andante Maestoso, a sort of chorale of fine character, which returns toward the end of the Allegro, accompanied by an obstinately persistent violin passage in the high register. The theme of this Allegro, which consists of only two bars, has not much interest in itself. The developments, for which it serves as a pretext, are, as in the "Flying Dutchman," over-sown with chromatic passages and exceedingly hard modulations and harmonies. When finally the chorale makes its appearance again, its theme advancing slowly with long steps, then necessarily the accompanying violin passage must repeat itself in all its terrible persistency. In the Andante we have already heard it twenty-four times; at the conclusion of the Allegro we hear it one hundred and eighteen times, making one hundred and forty-two times in the overture. Is not that possibly too much? Moreover it occurs quite often again in the course of the opera; whence I must infer that the composer ascribes to it some peculiar significance, with regard to the action, which to me is quite enigmatical.

The fragments from Lohengrin shine by still more salient peculiarities than the preceding works. In my opinion there is more in them that is now, than in the Tannhäuser. The introduction, which supplies the place of an overture, is an effective invention of Wagner's. One might give a general idea of it through the figure . It is in fact an immeasurably slow crescendo, which arrives at the highest point of sonorous power, then in inverse progression returns to the starting point and loses itself in a scarcely perceptible harmonious murmur. I know not what relations exist between this form of the overture and the dramatic idea of the opera, but, independently of that, as a symphonic work I find it wonderful in every point of view. There is, to be sure, no properly musical movement in it; but the harmonic interwindings are melodious, enchanting, and in spite of the length of the crescendo and the decrecendo the interest does not flag for a moment. At the same time it is a wonder-work of instrumentation in the tenderer nuances, as well as in the stronger coloring; and one remarks at the close, while all the other parts go downward, a diatonic ascending bass, of which the idea is extremely suggestive. Above all, this beautiful piece contains no sort of hardness. It is as lovely, as harmonious, as it is great, strong and sonorous. To me it is a masterpiece.

The grand march in G major, which opens the second act, has in Paris, as in Germany, produced a genuine excitement, in spite of the vague thought in the beginning and the cold indecision of the episodic piece in the middle. These colorless measures, in which the composer seems to grope about and seek his way, are only a sort of preparation, to come at a powerful, an irresistible idea, in which one must recognize the proper theme of the march. A phrase of four bars, twice repeated, each time a third higher, forms the impetuous period, to which, as it regards superb clan, and force and brilliancy, there is perhaps nothing comparable in music. Crashing forth in the unisono of the brass instruments, the strong accents (c, e, g), in the beginning of the three phrases, are like so many cannon shots, which cause the hearer's breast to tremble.

The effect would in my opinion have been still more uncommon, had the composer avoided tone-conflicts like those in the second phrase. The fourth inversion of the chord of the great Ninth, as well as the suspension of the Fifth by the Seventh, produce double dissonances, which to many people (me included) are intolerable. This march introduces the chorus: Freudig geführt zieht dahin, which one is surprised to find in this place, so small, I might almost say, so childlike is its style. Its effect upon the public of the Salle Ventadour was the smaller, in that its first bars remind one of an insignificant piece in Boieldieu's "Deux Nuits: La belle nuit, la belle fête, which has passed into the vaudevilles and is known to every one in Paris.

I have not yet spoken of the instrumental introduction to the last work of Wagner: Tristan und Isolde. It is strange that the composer had it performed in the same concert with the introduction to Lohengrin; for he has followed the same plan in both. We have again to do with a piece in slow tempo, which begins pianissimo, rises to fortissimo, and again subsides to its starting point, without any other theme than a sort of chromatic moaning, full of dissonant chords, which are the more painful to the ear, that commonly long fore-notes take the place of the real note in the harmony.

I have read this peculiar piece over and over, I have listened to it with the greatest attention and with the liveliest wish to understand it; but I must confess that I have not the least idea of what the composer meant by it.

II. BERLIOZ DEFINES HIS OWN POSITION.

.... If the "School of the Future" says:

"Music, at this day in the fulness of its youth, is emancipated, free; it does what it will.

"Many old rules are no longer valid; they were set up by inattentive observers, by people of routine for other people of routine.

"Now wants for mind, heart and hearing pledge us to new experiments, and even in certain cases to the overstepping of old rules.

"Various forms have become too much worn out, to be any longer allowable.

"All is extremely good and all is bad, according to the use one makes of it, and according to the reason for the use.

"In its union with the drama, or only with words sung, the music must always stand in direct relation to the feeling expressed in the words, to the character of the singing person, even to the accent and the vocal inflexions, which are felt to be the most natural in the words as spoken.

"The operas should not be written for the singers; on the contrary, the singers should be educated for the operas.

"Works written for the exclusive end of exhibiting the talents of certain virtuosi, are of a merely secondary nature and of comparatively little value.

"The executants are only more or less intelligent instruments, to set the form and inner sense of the works in the right light. Their despotism is at an end.

"The master is still master; it is for him to command.

"Tone and sonority stand below idea.

"Idea stands below feeling and passion.

"Rapid vocalises, colorature, trills in the voice part, a multitude of rhythms, are irreconcilable with the expression of all earnest, noble and deep feelings.

"It is therefore absurd to write for a Kyrie eleison (the humblest prayer of the Catholic Church) runs, which are scarcely to be distinguished from the screams of a pack of drunkards in an alchouse.

"Equally absurd is it to use one and the same music for an invocation of idolaters to Baal and for a prayer of the children of Israel to Jehovah.

"And still more monstrous, to make an ideal being, the daughter of the greatest poet, an angel of purity and love, sing like a harlot."—

If this is the musical code of the School of the Future, then I belong to it, body and soul, from deepest conviction and with most ardent sympathy.

But then all the world belongs to it. Every one to-day confesses more or less openly, in whole or in part, to these principles. Is there a great master who does not write what he will? Who still believes in the infallibility of certain rules, except some timid gentlemen, who would be frightened at the shadow of their own nose, if they had one?

I go yet farther: it has been so for a long while. Gluck himself belonged in this sense to the Future school, when he wrote in his celebrated preface to Alceste: "There are no rules, which I did not think I ought willingly to sacrifice in favor of effect."

So then we all belong, in this regard, to the School of the Future. But if this School of the Future says to us:—

"One must do the opposite of what the rules teach him.

"One is weary of melody and melodic outlines, of arias, duos, trios, and especially of all pieces in which a theme is regularly developed; one is satiated with consonant harmonies, with simple, prepared, resolved dissonances, with natural and artistically regulated modulations.

"One must take account only of the idea, without the least regard to feeling.

"One must despise that impudent baggage, the ear, and roughly maltreat in order to tame it. It is not music's problem, to be agreeable to it. It must accustom itself to everything: to ascending and descending minor Sevenths, winding in and out among one another like a knot of hissing serpents; to thousandfold dissonances without preparation or resolution; to middle parts, which are forced together, without harmonic or rhythmical agreement, tearing each other's flesh; to modulations that make one shudder, that introduce one key into one corner of the orchestra, before the preceding key has withdrawn from another corner.

"One must pay no sort of regard to the art of singing, and not trouble oneself either about its nature or requirements.

"One must limit himself in an opera to setting the declamation in notes, even if one employ the most unsingable, the roughest and most hideous intervals.

"There is no difference between a music, which a musician shall read off quietly from his desk, and a music which is to be sung by heart upon the stage by an artist, who has to attend at the same time to his dramatic rôle and to that of his fellow actors.

"One must not trouble himself about the possibility of executing a piece.

"If the singers have as much difficulty in remembering and making themselves at home in their parts, as they would in learning by heart a page of Sanscrit, or in swallowing a handfull of nut-shells—so much the worse for them. They are paid, that they may labor; they are slaves.

"The witches in Macbeth are right: 'Fair is foul, and foul is fair:—'

If this is the really very new religion, then I am very far from being one of its professors. I never did belong to it, do not now belong to it, and never shall belong to it.

I hold up my hand and swear: Non credo.

I firmly believe in the opposite: Fair is not foul, foul is not fair. Music has not, to be sure, for its exclusive problem to be agreeable to the ear; but it has a thousand times less for its problem, to be disagreeable to it, to put it on the rack, to murder it.

HUMOR AND MUSIC.—When humor joins with rhythm and music, and appears in song, its influence is irresistible; its charities are countless, it stirs the feelings to love, peace, friendship, as scarce any moral agent can. The songs of Beranger are hymns of love and tenderness; I have seen great whiskered Frenchmen warbling the "bonne Vielle," "Soldats au pas, au pas," with tears rolling down their moustaches. At a Burns festival, I have seen Scotchmen singing Burns, while the drops twinkled on their furrowed cheeks; while each rough hand was flung out to grasp its neighbor's; while early scenes and sacred recollections, and dear and delightful memories of the past came rushing back at the sound of the familiar words and music, and the softened heart was full of love, and friendship, and home. Humor! if tears are the alms of gentle spirits, and may be counted, as sure they may, among the sweetest of life's charities. Of that kindly sensibility, and sweet, sudden emotion, which exhibits itself at the eyes, I know no such provocative as humor. It is an irresistible sympathizer; it surprises you into compassion; you are laughing and disarmed, and suddenly forced into tears. I once heard a humorous balladist, a minstrel with wool on his head, and an ultra-Ethiopian complexion, who performed a negro ballad, that I confess moistened these spectacles in the most unexpected manner. They have gazed at dozens of tragedy queens, dying on the stage, and expiring in appropriate blank verse, and I never wanted to wipe them. They have looked up, with deep respect he it said, at many scores of clergymen in pulpits, and without being dimmed; and behold, a vagabond with a corked face and a banjo sings a little song, strikes a wild note which sets the whole heart thrilling with happy pity. Humor! humor is the mistress of tears; she knows the way to the fons lacrymarum, strikes in dry and rugged places with her enchanting wand, and bids the fountain gush and sparkle. She has refreshed myriads more from her natural springs, than ever tragedy has watered from her pompous old urn. —Thackeray.

(From the Boston Traveller.)

CHIMES.—Mr. Jonathan Phillips, who has given a chime of bells to Dr. Gannett's church, is a gentleman who performs so many noble and liberal deeds, that no one is surprised on hearing of an instance of his munificence; but in this case he has evinced as much taste as generosity, and set an example that should be extensively followed. That there should be so few chimes of bells in this country is matter for wonder; for as accessories to religious worship they are of the very first order, and men who seek to show their sense of the importance of that worship can never do better than to confer them upon churches. Nothing so attunes the mind to devotion as the chimes, and the most powerful intellects have confessed their strong yet sweet influence over them. Napoleon admitted that the sound of the church bells of Ruel, which came upon his ear as he walked in the grounds of Malmaison, at the evening-hour, had much to do with his restoration of the religious institutions of France. Southey says of the church chime, that "it is a music hallowed by all circumstances, which, according equally with social exaltation and with solitary pensiveness, though it falls upon many an unheeding ear, never fails to find some hearts which it exhilarates, and some which it softens." George Herbert, in "The Church Porch," admonishes men to —"Think, when the bells do chime,

'Tis angels' music."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—On Saturday (April 14) Trocatore, with Mlle. Titiens, Mme. Borghi-Mamo, Giuglini and Aldighieri. Wednesday, La Traviata;—the first of five farewell performances of Mlle Piccolomini. Mongini as Alfredo. The Musical World (April 21) says:

Rossini's Otello was produced on Thursday—the first time at Her Majesty's Theatre for many years. The director having found a suitable tenore robusto in Signor Mongini led no doubt to the revival of that opera. Another motive, however, was to introduce Madame Borghi-Mamo in Desdemona, a part in which she had recently won the suffrages of all the dilettanti in Paris. Madame Borghi-Mamo did not disappoint expectation, singing magnificently throughout the opera and acting with great energy and feeling. The lovely air in the last scene, "Assisa a piè d'un salice," given to absolute perfection, was encored in a tumult of applause. In the first scene (Rossini having written no cavatina) Madame Borghi-Mamo interpolated "O quante lagrime" from La Donna del Lago—Malcolm Græme's air—and sang it with extraordinary fluency. This air, originally written for a contralto, was re-arranged by the composer for Pasta, when she first appeared as Desdemona in Paris. To conclude, Madame Borghi-Mamo's success was triumphant and the audience enthusiastic.

Signor Mongini's Otello is admirable from every point of view. He sings the music with immense vigor, and gives a striking embodiment of the Moor. Not to descend to particulars, we would select the scene with Iago, in which the duet "Non m'inganno," occurs, and the whole of the last act, as worthy very high praise. The quick movement of the duet, as matter of course, was encored. Signor Mongini giving it with an energy that nothing could resist.

Signor Everardi sang the music of Iago like a thorough artist, and has added to his reputation by this second essay. His ease and facility permit him to execute the florid passages without effort. His acting, if not subtle, like Ronconi's, was manly and straightforward. The encore awarded to the duet in the second act owed much of the honor to Signor Everardi.

Signor Vialletti was an excellent Elmiro, and Signor Belart most effective, as far as singing went, in Rodrigo.

The band and chorus, under the direction of Mr. Benedict, were highly efficient throughout the opera.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The first appearance of Mad. Czillag, in Fidelio, on Thursday, if it did not attract a large assemblage of "fashionables," brought together all the real lovers of music in London, anxious not only to welcome a new Leonora—so difficult to find at all times—but to hear Beethoven's wondrous music executed by the Royal Italian Opera band and chorus, under Mr. Costa's direction. The great reputation of Mad. Czillag at the Imperial Theatre of Vienna was not unknown in England.

Mad. Czillag's dramatic singing belongs to the grandest school. Her voice is of great power and compass, metallic and resonant, and of that peculiar Teutonic quality so effective in the utterance of strong emotions. It is a magnificent rather than a beautiful organ, and consequently well fitted for the music of Leonora. On certain notes Mad. Czillag has more power than any singer we remember except Malibran; and in some other respects indeed resembles that extraordinary artist, however wide apart their general capabilities. As a singer, Mad. Czillag, like most Germans, is more attentive to outline than detail, and produces her effects by bold strokes rather than fine touches of art. Where passion invokes physical force to its aid she is invariably triumphant. In tender passages, too, Mad. Czillag hardly appears to less advantage. In what may be called "abstract singing," she is less successful. Her voice does not appear to possess remarkable flexibility—scarcely to be wondered at, considering the school to which she belongs. As an actress, Mad. Czillag is perhaps even more finished than as a singer. She has studied her art deeply, and possesses all the intelligence to enable her to attain the highest results. Her energy and fire are irresistible, her instincts always correct, and her expression admirably true.

The audience, unusually cold at first, gradually recognized the presence of a great artist, and after the quartet (canon) in the first scene—which, by the way, strange to say, for the first time, passed without a hand—applauded all her efforts, and at the conclusion recalled her twice with enthusiasm.

The cast, in the other parts, comprised Mlle. Corbani in Marcellina; Signor Neri-Baraldi in Florestan; Signor Tagliafico, Pizarro; M. Zelger, Rocco; and Signor Luchasi, Jacquino. The weak point was the tenor. Mlle. Corbani, who made her first appearance for several years, sang the music of Marcellina with the utmost expression as well as artistic correctness. This clever lady's return to her old post will cause general satisfaction among the patrons of the Royal Italian Opera.

The band and chorus were splendid throughout, and the grand final hymn, as it is called, was never given with more powerful effect. The opera was preceded by the overture to Fidelio, in E (taken at an unprecedentedly rapid pace), and between the acts the grand Leonora overture (in C) was played magnificently, created a perfect furor, and was encored with acclamations.

Fidelio will be repeated to-night and on Thursday, and on Tuesday Madame Grisi makes her first appearance, with Signor Mario, in La Favorita.

NEW PHILHARMONIC.—The third concert took place on Monday evening, in the presence of an audience that filled St. James's Hall in every part. The following was the programme:

PART I.—Overture (Coriolan), Beethoven. Recit ed aria, "Che farò" (Orfeo), Gluck. Aria, "Dalla sua pace" (Don Giovanni), Mozart. Symphony, "The power of sound," Spohr. Chorus, (Enryanthe), Weber. Duo, "Ciel! che vegg'io" (Lucrècia Borgia), Donizetti. Overture, (Midsummer Night's Dream), Mendelssohn.

PART II.—Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, in E flat., Beethoven. Aria, "Ecco ridente" (Il Barbiere), Rossini. Aria, "Il mio ben" (Nina), Paisiello. Overture (Ruy Blas) Mendelssohn.

Conductor—Dr. Wyde.

In Beethoven's Concerto Mr. John F. Barnett made his first appearance for two years. During his absence, we are informed, he has been travelling through Germany, giving concerts occasionally, and as we are able to judge from his playing on Monday evening, studying and practising with zeal and determination. Mr. Barnett has made great progress, particularly in his execution, which, when we last heard him, was by no means finished.

FLORENCE.—There was recently a great success at the Pergola, an opera new at Florence, though known in other parts of Italy, by Peri, of Reggio, "Vittore Pisani." The plot is taken from a story of the great days of Venice, and the scenery, chiefly of that city, was really wonderful. The music, though rather florid, is still not "Verdiesque," and was very well sung by a French prima donna, Laborde, and Alfonsi and Cettini.

BELGIUM.—The Minister of the interior of Belgium, in a report to the King, proposes that, in order to encourage native musical composers and dramatic authors, certain sums shall be awarded to every original musical or literary work of merit represented at any theatres in the country, and that the awards for pieces in the French language shall be higher than for those in the Flemish, in consequence of the former having to struggle against the competition of pieces by popular authors borrowed from France. The King has decreed that the proposition of the minister shall be acted on, and the sums to be accorded have been fixed as follows:—200f. for an opera in four or five acts; 150f. for one in three; and 75f. for one in one or two acts, if brought out at Brussels; and 140f., 100f., and 50f., respectively in other towns; 100f., 75f., and 40f., for a comedy in French, according to the number of acts represented at Brussels; and 70f., 50f., and 25f., in other towns. For dramatic works in Flemish, 200f., 150f., and 75f., according to the number of acts, at Brussels, Ghent, Antwerp, and Bruges; and 150f., 100f., and 50f., in other places. The minister has further decided that if an opera or piece produced in one town shall subsequently be played in another, it shall receive half the aforesaid sums for each new representation; also that the music of ballets shall be paid at the same rate as dramatic pieces. Finally, to obtain these sums the works must be completely original, accepted by a committee regularly constituted, and be performed at least three times consecutively.

Halévy's "Jewess."

We had the pleasure in New York last week of listening twice, for the first time in our life, to Halévy's very famous and best opera, La Juive. The performance, mise en scène and all, under the management of MARETZKE, with ANSCHUETZ for conductor, at the Winter Garden, was for the most part excellent. It was in some sense a new experience. We had not heard an opera with which we could exactly class it. If not a work of genius in a very high sense, if not a work to live forever in one's feeling and imagination like Don Juan, Fidelio, Tell, or the Frey-schütz; if not as gushingly melodious as Bellini, or as elaborately strange as Meyerbeer, it is at least something quite complete and genuine in its way, refreshingly free from sentimental sweetness on the one hand, and from the ear-storming, over-frequent emphasis and climax of the Verdi school. It impressed us as a thoroughly dramatic opera; one in which the music well fulfils its office of illustrating the progress of an uncommonly well constructed tragic plot. Though it does not abound in striking or ear-haunting melodies, yet all its phrasing is melodic as well as declamatory, and there is a pleasing flow and natural development in the harmonic blending and intertwining of the various voice-parts and instruments. The thing is consistently and beautifully woven. It is at once a musical and a dramatic whole. And we must say we listened to it with much pleasure. We enjoyed it more than we do most of the ingenious immensities of Meyerbeer, or than we do any of the startling attempts of Verdi; and as we have already hinted, we have even found it refreshing for a change after the "linked sweetness long drawn out" of Donizetti and Bellini.

"The Jewess" is a grand spectacle opera, laid out on the broadest canvass, a five-act affair; instrumented with all the sonorous fullness and elaborateness of treatment, only without the brassiness and the extravagance, of the most modern instrumentation. It reproduces on the stage the Romish pomp and splendor of the Council of Constance, beginning with a great procession (the music of the march is very striking) and ending with the vast parade of a martyr's execution. French enough, to be sure, and appealing to that love of the terrible, which in works of fiction delights the vulgar now as gladiator shows did the Roman populace of old. All this is little to our taste, and in itself wearisome. Indeed the great length of the opera, its dazzling shows, involving lengthy intermissions, was fatiguing to the last degree. Yet there was enough of interest in the music as such, enough of richness and felicity of treatment, enough of lyrical truth and fitness throughout, to mingle a rare amount of enjoyment with the aching of fatigued limbs and senses. Such a work comes naturally into comparison with "William Tell," with "Masaniello," with the broad and crowded canvasses of Meyerbeer. We must say, that any one of the latter, at all events the Huguenots and Prophète, overcame us with more drowsiness. Halévy's work is not so desperately heavy. It may have in it less thought, less invention, less of concentrated brain-work, and may be the product of a brain less large and fertile; but it seems to us conceived in a happier vein, and answering its purpose quite as well or better. As for comparing it with "Tell," or even with "Masaniello," in respect of real musical creative genius, we shall not be guilty of the absurdity. But it does strike us as one of the best operas which have been added to our repertoire on this side of the ocean for a long time. It has the advantage, too, of an uncommonly good libretto,—one of Scribe's best. Musically, we doubt if it can become popular here; the spectacle, and the occasional scope it gives for the loud, muscular kind of singing, or musical declamation, are the chief popular elements in it. Some of its choral as well as instrumental effects remind one much of Verdi; yet it was written fifteen years before any of that author's well known works.

As to the performance, which we have said was mainly good, one could not but remark the curious circumstance of a French opera, sung in the Italian language, by singers all of whom were German, and before an audience mostly of Americans and Jews! Mme. FABBRI (who is German, and the wife of a gentlemanly and musician-like German, Herr Mulder) really surprised us by the power and truth and beauty of her singing and her acting in the part of Rachel, the Jewess. To be sure, the part does not give her enough to do in the way of mere singing to enable one to measure her ability as a cantatrice. Scarcely any florid passage work, and not much extended melody falls to her share. The rôle is altogether dramatic, mostly declamatory; but there are fine concerted pieces in which none but a true vocal artist could have borne her part as effectively as she did. Her voice is one of the first magnitude and quality; exceedingly powerful, especially in the highest tones, where it always told with perfect certainty and truth of intonation, and with thrilling pathos. The sound was pure and musical as well as loud; it was soulful and refined. A true artistic feeling and intelligence pervaded all; it was not a mere muscular energy either of song or action. Her's is just the splendid organ, just the artistic feeling, that should have been employed in the high and difficult soprano solos in that performance of the Choral Symphony.

The central and important rôle in "The Jewess," is Lazarus, the old Jew father, in which STRIGELLI did his best. We have seen and heard him in no part for which he was so admirably fitted. His usual crouching attitude and awkwardness of movement only helped out the impersonation. His voice seemed in its best condition, and in his masterly use of it conveyed all the fire, the tenderness, the sweetness of a music which seemed made for just such a tenor. The part was originally written for Duprez.

Mme. BERKEL, as the princess Eudoxia, had more of florid and bravura work to do. The feeling was right, but the power waning; much was done finely, but such was laudable effort only: what a relief and joy to the ear was the clear high note of Fabbri ringing in as its turn came! Herr WEINLICH, for the Cardinal, had a heavy basso, of rather coarse quality, which he did not use with any great skill. Herr QUINT did much, for one of his limited vocal endowments, and some things over-much. Herr MULLER was as portly and as dignified and faithful to his task as ever. There was immense enthusiasm, with shouting, clapping, callings out and bouquets on the part of the audience—particularly whenever any singer was delivered of an uncommonly loud note. Indeed the lobby crowd appeared to watch the whole thing like a vocal prize fight.

Musical Chit-Chat.

RICHARD WAGNER, as our readers have seen, has been stirring up more controversy about his compositions and his "Music of the Future" principles, by the four concerts which he has been giving in the great critical world of Paris. He does not like to be held accountable for the invention of the term "Music of the Future," and has written rather a pungent letter about it to HECTOR BERLIOZ, in answer to some criticisms of his, which appeared in the Journal des Debats, after the first concert. We thought it would be interesting and instructive to our readers to peruse these documents, and perhaps some others, in an English dress. Accordingly we translate and present to-day the principal portions of the article by Berlioz, and shall give Wagner's letter in our next.

A series of pianoforte matinées, in private parlors, by OTTO DRESSEL, has occupied the last four Saturday afternoons of a select subscription audience in a most delightful manner. Beethoven's Sonatas, Concertos of Mendelssohn, (arranged for four hands, with Mr. LEONHARDT), choice works of Chopin, Schumann, Schubert, &c., and songs of Franz, sung by Mr. KREISSMANN, composed the programmes. Such poetry of music, so interpreted, and in such company, it is indeed a privilege to hear.

We learn that Miss S. LORRAINE RAYMOND, who will be by many pleasantly remembered as the fine contralto singer at Dr. Gannet's church, took passage, (accompanied by an elder sister,) on Saturday last by the Vanderbilt, from New York to Southampton, on her way to London, for the purpose of availing herself of the instruction of the celebrated Garcia, previous to a stay of some years in Italy.

Mr. and Mrs. STOEPEL (Matilda Heron) sailed last week for Europe, to be absent four or five months. Mr. Stoepel, we understand, designs bringing out his symphony of "Hiawatha" in London, at a concert to be given by the London Philharmonic Society, and to do it also in the provinces. Mrs. Stoepel doing the reading part. From England he will go to France, thence to Germany, and then back to New York in time to resume the musical directorship at Wallack's at the opening of the fall season.

WHEN ITALY IS FREE.—The foreign correspondence of the Boston Transcript contains the following anecdote of the Emperor Napoleon:

At the close of a late soirée musicale, given at the Tuileries, his Majesty, engaged in conversation with the artists, asked Tamberlik when he intended to revisit Italy. "Alas, your Majesty, I fear not for some time—not until the Italian question is settled." "Then you will not have long to wait," was the Napoleonic reply. "But tell me," he continued, "in what condition have you found the opera in Milan?" "Excellent, as far as enthusiasm is concerned, execrable with regard to talent," said Tamberlik. "When Italy is free, her talents will illumine the world," exclaimed Napoleon, with unusual energy, which called forth applause from the delighted artists.

MASON and THOMAS give the last of their Classical Soirées in New York, at Chickering's saloon, this evening. BERGMANN, MOSENTHAL and MATSKA are the other members of the string quartet. The programme contains a Quintet by Haydn; Sonata, in F minor, op. 57, by Beethoven; Reverie et Caprice, by Berlioz; and a posthumous Quartet, in A minor, op. 132, by Beethoven. . . . The Philadelphians are getting up a complimentary concert to Mr. CARL SENTZ, the leader of their Germania orchestra, who is about to visit Europe. . . . Mme. GAZZANIGA was, by last accounts, giving concerts in Richmond and in Petersburg, Va. Sig. TAMARO (tenor,) and Mr. SANDERSON, an American pianist, accompany her. . . . Mr. GEO. WM. WARREN, the lively, public-spirited and popular organist and teacher in Albany, is about to remove to Brooklyn, having been called to take charge of the music in the Church of the Holy Trinity, with a large salary and liberal appointments. His loss will be sorely felt; for he was a stirrer up of musical enthusiasm in others.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MAY 8.—The competition between the rival opera companies has been satisfactory to the opera going public if to no one else, for it has necessitated the production of new operas at both houses. At the Winter Garden La Juive has proved an artistic rather than an operatic success. It has been played only four times, and has brought laurels for FABBRI and STIOELLI. The other singers were second and third rate. WEINLICH, the basso, was enough to give one the tooth-ache, and QUINTO tried hard to be agreeable, but was only partially successful. The opera was splendidly put upon the stage, and certainly deserved a greater success. It will be succeeded by Verdi's Nabuco, in which Fabbri is said to be remarkably effective.

At the Academy of Music, Strakosch has produced

Mosè in Egitto, and certainly Rossini's great opera is brought out in a very creditable style. It contains few long solos and no show pieces for the voice, but is replete with noble choruses. The edition published for, and used by the Boston Handel and Haydn Society, is entirely different from the work as placed on the stage. The opening chorus of the Boston edition only occurs in the second act of the opera, and the music is otherwise so transplanted and misplaced as to render this Boston copy a nuisance rather than an assistance at the operatic performance.

Miss PATTI was the prima donna, and while the music of her rôle presents little opportunity for vocal display, especially of the kind for which she is noted, there was yet enough chance to do herself credit. In the great air of the fourth act she was admirable, and her voice in concerted pieces was heard above the others, clear and distinct. This shows that little Patti's voice is gaining in power.

She looked charmingly on the stage, as Anaïde. Her costume was quaint and curious. Around her head was a huge white turban, through the folds of which strayed her coal black curls. At first sight this huge head-dress appeared cumbersome and awkward, but after the eye was accustomed to it, the effect was as graceful as it was singular. This little Patti is a wonderful singer, and is going to make a great artist.

BIGNOLI sang only so—so, and FERRI was rather poor than otherwise. SUSINI made a magnificent Moses, and sang just as superbly. He is a real treasure for an opera company. About three weeks ago he came within an inch of leaving the Academy, and joining the Maretzek forces at the Winter Garden.

At both houses the opera season will close in about two weeks. It is already too warm to attend, and close plush velvet seats are mere instruments of torture.

Patti will give a concert at Brooklyn during the week. The talk about her going to Europe is hushed up.

BEAUCARDE and ALBERTINI left for Europe last Saturday, after an unappreciated visit to this country. They were both really admirable artists.

TROVATOR.

ST. LOUIS, MAY 4.—Decidedly the most successful concert ever held in this city, was given on Thursday evening last, at the Library Hall, by the choir of Trinity Church, assisted by the best amateur talent which our city affords. The object was to raise funds for the purchase of an organ for their new church, now in process of erection. When I say, that a week before the performance, more than two thousand tickets had been sold, at one dollar each, and that on the evening our immense hall was literally packed full, many going away unable to obtain even a standing place, you may form some idea of the interest felt in the performance. The programme was excellent, and with a few exceptions, was rendered admirably.

1. Overture.—Zampa. . . . . Full Orchestra
2. Bass Solo.—"Il Flauto Magico," . . . Mr. E. C. Catherwood
3. Trio.—Ave Maria. (B. Owen). . . Miss Anderson, Mrs. Barnett and Mr. Keller.
4. Soprano Solo.—"Qui La Voce," Puritani. Miss Annie Dean
5. Violin Solo.—Airs from "Lombardi" . . . Mr. J. Anderson, (pupil of Mr. A. Waldauer.)
6. Alto Solo.—"O Salutaris," Cherubini. . . . Mrs. Barnett (with Quintet Accompaniment.)
7. Sextet.—From "Lucia," (with Orchestral Accompaniment) Miss Anderson, Miss Cutter, Messrs. Crowell, Erskine, Drake and Catherwood.
8. Overture.—Mazaniello. . . . . Full Orchestra
9. Duet.—For Voice and Flute; Aria, from "Preciosa." Miss Dean and Mr. Dabney Carr.
10. Soprano Solo.—"Robert, toi que j'aime," . . . Miss Anderson
11. Quartet.—Rigoletto, "Bella Figlia," . . . Miss Dean, Mrs. Barnett, Messrs. Crowell and Catherwood.
12. Grand Duo.—Flute and Piano, Boehm. . . Messrs. Carr and Balmer.
13. Baritone Solo.—"As I view now these scenes," Sonnambula. . . . . Mr. Drake
14. Grand Scene.—From Trovatore, "Miserere," . . . With Organ and full Orchestral Accompaniment.

Mr. A. WALDAUER, the accomplished conductor of the orchestra at the St. Louis Theatre,—one of the finest musicians in the country, not only leading his forces, but composing and arranging all of his music,—with most of the members of his orchestra and other non-professional performers, made an excellent orchestra, and played the overtures to Mazaniello and Zampa in a creditable style. Considering the limited number of rehearsals, and the fact that most of the performers never played in an orchestra before, the rendering was admirable, and merited the hearty applause and encore which they elicited.

We would suggest to them the propriety of meeting again and studying something finer and more calculated to be of lasting benefit to them. Our city is entirely destitute of any musical society, orchestra, quintet, or in fact anything of the kind; but, as has been proved, not from lack of the necessary talent. Mr. E. C. CATHERWOOD, who made the first bow in a "Basso Profondo" solo, from the "Magic Flute," has the most wonderful voice I have ever heard, and, if he would study and practice, would make his mark. His lowest note, which I have heard him sound frequently, is B-flat—"clear down." His organ is very powerful, clear and resonant—and for volume of tone and depth of compass can hardly be excelled, even by the great Formes himself. Mr. C. has been contemplating a trip to Europe to study; but we begin to doubt whether his well conceived intention will ever be carried out. It is a pity that one with such natural advantages should hide his light under a half bushel.

The various solos, by Miss DEAN, Miss ANDERSON and Mrs. BARNETT, were very finely given, astonishing as well as delighting many of their listeners who were not aware what amateur talent we had.

Miss Dean has fine execution and a very clear voice, much more powerful than that of Miss Anderson, whose organ, though sweeter and better adapted for a parlor, does not produce so much effect in a larger room.

Of course, as amateurs in their first appearance, they were thoroughly frightened and in their first piece hardly did themselves justice; but on a re-appearance, having recovered from their nervousness, they gave ample satisfaction.

Mr. DABNEY CARR certainly excels on the flute, which instrument he has practised for years, until he has attained remarkable proficiency, blowing a clear tone, in which no respirations are heard. We deem him fully the equal of Kyle or Eben of New York. We would remark that Mr. BALMER introduced a shake and a half too much in a fortissimo passage in his accompaniment, which somewhat marred the beauty of that charming passage. Where all was good it is perhaps invidious to notice a few, where we have not space for all; but those named particularly distinguished themselves and received showers of bouquets, which were not "bought for the occasion." The sextet from Lucia, with the quartet from Rigoletto, did not go well—timidity changing the key in some instances—which only the loudest blast from flutes and clarinets could restore. The performers have great reason to congratulate themselves on their success, and if, as we have heard intimated, the concert is repeated, the same ovation will probably await them. PRESTO.

Musical Intelligence.

WORCESTER, MASS.—There is a rich feast of classical music in store on Friday evening. Mr. B. D. Allen offers the public a rare opportunity of hearing music from the greatest composers. Selecting our best resident vocalists and instrumentalists, he has for the past few months been earnestly working for this occasion; rehearsing the forty-second psalm—"As the Hart pants," by Mendelssohn, with orchestral accompaniments. Its solos will be given by our best singers, and the orchestra is a good one. In the programme will be found trios by Beethoven and Mozart, to be rendered by our excellent "Beethoven Trio Club," with other selections. The proceeds are to be added to the "High School Piano Fund."—Palladium, 9th.

The concert of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, on their return from their Southern tour, filled Brinley Hall with an appreciative audience—such a one as the Club will in future command whenever they will honor our city with a visit. The programme was good—for a popular one, and its best features so well worthy of remark, as to compensate for the solos, variations, &c., which although not to our taste, were enthusiastically received by the majority of the audience. The Tell overture, always good, was played with telling brilliancy and power. The Andante from the Fifth Symphony, (repeated by request,) was even better performed than at the previous concert. Familiar as it is, it is impossible to hear it too often. It was received—how gladly we write it! with silence that seemed almost breathless. It is said that Beethoven is not appreciated by "the many." True: but "the few" is getting to be a larger circle than it has been; and when we see hand-reeds hanging upon each note of the great master's music, we take heart for the future, and wish good and great music were oftener to be heard. The adagio from the 2d Quintet of Mendelssohn was new to us, but for a first hearing we found it rich in musical thought and expression. The crescendo passage was exceedingly fine, and that delicate pianissimo ending of the quintet so softly shaded that in truth we might say of the last note that "Nothing breathed 'twixt it and silence."

Mrs. Long sang an air from I Lombardi—better than some of the best prima donnas have sung it, a couple of English ballads, and best of all, Cherubini's Ave Maria. The greater the music the better we like the singer—equal to the highest in her art as she almost invariably is.

We would say a good word for our "National Band." There is no occasion to speak of the need of a band in a city as large as Worcester, but we would pronounce this, since its recent organization, a musical association of unusual merit. We have little liking for "brass music," but the fashion, we trust, will change like all fashions, and the good old days of a mingling of reed with brass instruments return. Of the orchestra it is a pleasure to speak. Numbering fifteen or twenty members of acknowledged musical taste and skill, with the patronage it merits it might soon become an honor to Worcester.—Ibid.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—The work on the Brooklyn Academy of Music is advancing rapidly. The walls at both ends, and the rear walls, are up to the third story, and the front wall is up to the second story. The front is to be constructed with the best kind of pressed brick, with stone trimmings, and the work throughout is expected to be completed by the 1st of December next.—Musical World.

THE PHILADELPHIA HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The annual re-union at the close of the season's performances of this Society took place on the evening of May 1. The Evening Bulletin appends to a report of the proceedings the following remarks:

The true mission of such associations is second in importance only to that of christianizing the heathen. It is their fortunate privilege to socialize, humanize and genialize the masses at large; to oppose the influences of a soothing art to the grosser passions and vicious tendencies of depraved nature. Moreover, the gradual improvement of such a society's performances affords to the people at large constant opportunities of hearing the works of the best masters, executed with a proper development of the nice points, intellectual subtleties, and refining tendencies of these. Out of this grows a pure taste, slowly but surely—a gradual progression of musical intelligence, which brings forth individual talent into bold relief in many instances, and leads many a soul to yearn involuntarily for the pleasurable delights of music.

The influence of such societies as these may be classed as positive and relative; in the former sense, so far as they exert a direct and happy influence upon those for whose entertainment and edification they are designed; and relatively, as they tend to the improvement of the members themselves. As years progress, cases of individual talent will surely loom up from the sphere of these associations, and command the admiration of all music lovers. Cases of this kind will attest the relative influences of our Handel and Haydn and Harmonias. The Vanderbilt, which sails next Saturday from New York, is to take out Mr. J. Romington Fairlamb, of this city, who goes to improve a musical education, happily commenced in our midst. He has already given evidence of much taste and imagination in composition. We mention this, because the talented gentleman in question has been identified with our home societies, with the quondam Musical Union, and latterly with divers other organizations. Who can doubt that the impetus to his musical enthusiasm is, in large degree, ascribable to the beneficial operations of the various musical societies, with which he has been identified. Let the Handel and Haydn continue its energetic career! It cannot fail to secure the hearty coöperation of the intelligent and refined citizens at all times.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The following notice of a Mendelssohn Concert is too rich to be lost to our readers, who shall have it verbatim et literatim:

The Mendelssohn Quintette Club gave one of their agreeable and classic "Chamber Concerts" last night to a highly pleased auditory. The programme was a good one. It contained some of the most select gems from the musical bouquet, and displayed a variety of talent as charming as one could well wish. In the several harmonies and accords, the symmetrical effect of sound was sustained to a high degree of art, whilst the individual voices of one or two of the corps rose to a clear melody above every chorus and combination. Mrs. Long, for example, is a very sweet singer, and will not fail to please every ear, especially so in that pretty little ballad the "Sky Lark." The rest of the company paid full duty to the spirit of Orpheus, and the evening passed off very pleasingly indeed. To-night they give a second concert. It will be equal to the first and worthy a musical assembly. The series of pieces are well chosen, and the performance of last evening gives an assurance of an equally good one on this.

NEW ORLEANS.—The Courier speaks not so favorably as some of the papers of the Amphitheatre Opera Company, and says of Parodi as Amina:

Parodi surpasses all those whom we have heard, with the exception of Sontag. She not only sang the part with that soul-stirring effect so peculiar to the vocalism of the Italian cantatrice—the irresistible effect of il cantar che nel anima si sueta—but there is a buoyancy and warmth in her intonation which captivates the hearer and disarms criticism.

Parodi is the only artiste of the troupe who claims the serious attention of the critic. The axiom, nil nisi bonum, is one which it is ever pleasing to observe, but when coupled with its complement, atque verum, we confess that we but reluctantly conform ourself to its requirements. Hence it is that we must be content with having given our attention wholly to Parodi, of whom we can say both what is good and what is true; but, as regards the other members of the troupe, save perhaps the baritone, Gnone, there is much good which we would be disposed to say, but much more truth which we would wish to conceal. We have said, and we again repeat, that as these artistes are but transiently with us, and as they are but strangers in the community, they are entitled to our highest deference, and it is in this view that we are disposed to shield them from the barbed shafts of a serious criticism. We cannot, in good conscience, bestow upon them the euphuistic praise to which certain so-called critics have recourse. We have a higher appreciation of the aims of criticism; and whilst we will ever be prompt to resist the morbid taste for scurrility and abuse, so prevalent with the quondams of criticism, we will not allow ourself to be led away by the allurements of inordinate praise.

HAVANA.—Letters from Havana announce that the Tacon Theatre has been taken by Signor Volpini, with an Italian Opera Company. He engaged the sisters Fanny and Agnes Natali, and Signor Rocco and Testa, the latter an Italian tenor. Florenza, the baritone, was also of the company, and Signor Volpini and his wife are also singers. The season began with great brilliancy, on the 16th of April, with La Figlia, in which Fanny and Testa had a great success. On the 19th, Agnes appeared as Norma, with Fanny as Adelgisa, and the sensation created was immense. The Havanese declare that they have had no Norma equal to Agnes since Steffanone. Their enthusiasm surpassed anything ever seen in the States. The opera was repeated on the 22d, and again on the 23d, with similar success.

On the 22d of April, Miss Fanny Natali was married to Signor Enrico Testa, the tenor. The marriage took place in church and with much ceremony. Signor Rocco gave away the bride, acting as proxy for her father.

On St. Agnes' Day, many valuable presents were sent to Agnes Natali, who has become a great favorite with the Havana public.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Bridegroom. J. Blockley. 25

Poetry from Tennyson's "Idyls of the King" The music written to this and other passages from Tennyson's last poem, has been much admired in England.

Possenti numi. (Jehovah guide us). Air for Bass. "Magic Flute." 25

Celebrated air of the high priest, with men's chorus, ad libitum. It has been sung frequently here, first by Formes, then by Junca, and now is or ought to be on the repertoire of all the "bassi profondi" This Air must not be confounded with the other Song of Sarastro: "Qui sdegno, or, Who treads the path," which has less of the sacred character and no chorus.

Popping the question. Song. L. W. Wheeler. 25

Alonzo the brave. New medley song. S. Cowell. 60

I will and I won't. T. Farrant. 25

The Tea-tax. B. W. Wow. 25

Four comic songs, some new, some revivals of old favorites, all sure to please, and none difficult to sing.

Sardinian National Hymn. Song and Chorus.

A stirring song, which in the course of recent events has figured largely. It is now the Italian Marseillaise, and all musical people should know it.

Winnie Bell. Song and Chorus. Franz Nava. 25

Faithless Rosa. Ballad. " " 25

Two Minstrel songs, of English origin, destined to become popular.

Blue Bells of Scotland. " " " 35

Tasteful transcriptions, novel in form and rich in effect.

A te o cara. For Cornet with Piano accompani. 35

The first of a series of arrangements for this instrument, which has of late found so much favor with amateurs. They are designed for the drawing-room, moderately long, easy and melodious, and will meet a long-felt want.

Books.

THE CONSTELLATION. A collection of Anthems, Choruses and Sacred Quartets, Selected mostly from the works of the Great Masters, and adapted to the wants of Conventions, Choral Societies and Social Practice. 75

So fully does the title of this work represent its contents that nothing need be added to convey an idea of its merits. It is a most capital collection, and one that is so much needed by those for whom it is designed, that it will be heartily welcomed, and at once become an established favorite in their musical libraries.

III. WAGNER'S ANSWER TO THE CRITICISM OF BERLIOZ.*

MY DEAR BERLIOZ,—When fate brought us together five years ago in London, I flattered myself on having so far the advantage over you, that I could fully understand and appreciate your works, whereas you on your part could form but an imperfect idea of mine, since you did not know the German language, to which my dramatic creations stand in so intimate a relation.

To-day I see myself compelled to renounce this modest advantage. For eleven years I have had no opportunity of enjoying the interpretation of my own works; and I have had quite long enough the satisfaction of being the only German, who has not yet heard a performance of the Lohengrin.

No ambitious plans, no hope of pecuniary gain have induced me to entreat a hospitable reception for my works in France. I have been actuated solely by the wish of seeing my musical dramas brought out here with a French text; and if the public had the friendliness to lend its sympathy to one, who has to take so much pains only to bring his own works for once to a hearing, I should surely also have on my part, my dear Berlioz, the satisfaction of being understood by you.

The article in the Journal des Débats, which you have had the kindness to devote to my concerts, contains not only very flattering things for me, for which I render you my thanks: it gives me also the opportunity, which I embrace with eagerness, of laying before you some summary explanations about what you call "Music of the Future," with which you have felt called upon to entertain your readers in so serious a manner.

You think then that this name really represents a school, of which I am the head? That I, one fine day, proposed to myself to lay down certain principles, certain theses, which you divide into two categories: of which the first, accepted unconditionally by you, includes truths that have long been recognized by everybody; of which the second, which meets your disapproval, consists of a mere string of absurdities?—To tax me with the ridiculous vanity of undertaking to give out old principles for new, or with the foolish presumption of setting up as irrefragable principles things which in all languages are called absurdities, is at the same time to mistake my character and to insult the small mite of intelligence which Heaven has allotted to my share. Your explanations in this regard, allow me to say it, have seemed to me not altogether clear; and since I perfectly well know your friendly sympathy, you certainly will deem it desirable that I should extricate you from your doubt, (with all respect) your error.

*We have to take it from the German version in the Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift. It appeared originally in La Presse Théâtrale, Feb. 26.

Learn, then, my dear Berlioz, it is not I, but much rather Professor Bischoff, of Cologne, who is the inventor of the "Music of the Future." The occasion for the origin of this empty expression was afforded by the publication of one of my works under the title: Das Kunstwerk der Zukunft, about ten years ago. This book springs from a time when serious events had for a considerable time forbidden me the exercise of my art: when my mind, strengthened by experience, gathered itself up in the deeper study of the Art problems, whose solution had at all times been my aim.

But I was led to writing in the following manner: In the year 1848 I was confounded by the incredible want of appreciation which the Revolution brought to light for Art, which, had the social reform succeeded, would have been ended at a blow. When I searched into the causes of this under-valuation, I found, to my great astonishment, they were almost the same which lead you, my dear Berlioz, to let no opportunity slip by, without giving loose reins to your ironical humor in the domain of public Art arrangements; and I shared without more ado your own conviction, that it is the institutions of this art, the Theatre in general and the Opera in particular, which in their relation to the public depend upon influences, which run directly counter to all pure, true Art. There Art in fact is only a pretext, under which, with all due maintenance of outward decency, one may profitably flatter the most frivolous lusts of a metropolitan public.

I went further. I asked myself, what would have to be the conditions, under which Art might inspire the public with an irresistible esteem; and, not to venture out too far in the investigation of this problem, I took my point of departure in ancient Greece. There above all I met the work of Art par excellence, the Drama, in which the idea, be it ever so exalted, ever so low, can express itself with the greatest clearness, in the most comprehensive and most spirited manner. No wonder we in our day are astonished, how thirty thousand Greeks could follow with an abiding interest the tragedies of Æschylus; but when we seek for the means, whereby we might attain to similar results, we find that it lies in the union of all co-operating arts to one common end, namely, the creation of the complete and only true Art work. That led me on to study the single branches of Art in their relations to one another, and after I had found in this way the relation that subsists between Sculpture and the Mimic Art, I sought for that between Music and Poetry: out of this investigation there suddenly broke forth rays, which totally dispelled the darkness that had hitherto disquieted me.

I perceived, that just at the point, where one of these arts comes against insuperable limits, just there with strictest certainty the efficacy of another art begins; that consequently through the union of these two arts one can express with most apprehensive clearness that which each art by itself would not have power to represent; that on the contrary every attempt to reach by means of one of these arts what could only be executed by the two united, must necessarily lead to obscurity, and in the next place to confusion, and then to the degeneracy and corruption of each separate art.

Accordingly I sought to point out the possibility of producing a work, in which whatever of deepest and of highest the human soul can apprehend, may be brought near to the most ordinary understanding, without any need of reflection or of critical expositions—and that is what I designated by the name: Kunstwerk der Zukunft (Art-work of the Future).

Judge then, my dear Berlioz, what I must have felt, to find now, after a period of ten years, how—not one of the light and superficial people, one of the dealers in conceits, the world-manufacturers, the bravos of literature, no, but how an earnest man, a prominent artist, a critic of your insight and your culture, of your noblesse, nay more, how a friend, could be so strangely in error about the meaning of my ideas, as not to hesitate to label my work with that ridiculous name: "Music of the Future."

Well now, my dear Berlioz: since my book in the original, as it stands, will probably remain an unknown thing to you, please do me the friendly service to trust me on my own plain word, that it contains none of those absurdities, which have been ascribed to me, and that I have in no way spoken in it on the question of musical grammar. My thought reaches somewhat further, and since I am no theorist by profession, I had to leave it to others to treat this subject, as well as the childish question whether it is permitted or not, in matters of harmony or of melody to discover a new turn (faire du néologisme).

To-day, I confess to you, I am almost tempted to regret the publication of that book. And if, as I have just again experienced, the best informed and most enlightened critics can let themselves be so far carried away by the prejudices of ignorant dilettantism, as, during the performance of works thus submitted to their judgment, to insist that they perceive nothing in them but things which are not found there, while the essential and fundamental idea escapes them—how can I hope that the philosophically cultivated artist, the æsthetic thinker can be any better understood by the public, after he has not even been understood by Professor Bischoff in Cologne.

But I have already said too much on this head. I have explained to you what "Music of the Future" was. I hope that we shall soon, under perfectly equal conditions, understand each other mutually. Allow this hospitable France to afford an asylum to my musical dramas; I on my part await with the liveliest impatience the production of your "Trojan Women," with an impatience which is thrice justified; first by the inclination which I cherish toward you; then by the significance which your work will no doubt assume in the musical world of the present; and finally, still more by the peculiar weight which I attach to it in relation to the ideas and principles which constantly have guided me.

RICHARD WAGNER.

Spohr's Letters from Paris.

(From Alexander Malibran's Louis Spohr. Sein Leben und Wirken, Frankfurt-am-Main. J. D. Sauerland's Verlag. 1800).

II.

Paris, 31st December, 1820

A very agreeable fortnight has elapsed, since my first letter was despatched, and we have heard and seen much that is beautiful since then; but, for the present, I must content myself with writing to you only about what is more immediately connected with my art. I have now made my debut before artists and dilettanti, connoisseurs and laymen, as violinist and composer—first at Herr Baudiot's, first violoncello of the Royal chapel; the next day at Kreutzer's; and then at three parties. On the first two occasions, hardly any person but artists were present: at Kreutzer's especially there were nearly all the distinguished composers and fiddlers of Paris. I gave several of my quartets and quintets, and, on the second day, my nonetto. The composers paid me a great many compliments on my compositions, and the fiddlers on my play. Of the latter, Viotti, both the Kreutzers, Baillet, Lafont, Habeneck, Fontaine, Guérin, and many others, whose names are not so well-known in Germany, were present; so you perceive that it was a grand occasion, and that I had to exert myself to the utmost, to do honor to my countrymen. The parts for the wind instruments in my nonetto were played by the five artists, of whose masterly execution of Reicha's quintets you must often have read in the accounts from Paris. I had the pleasure of hearing them play two of these quintets, but shall defer writing to you in detail about them, till I am acquainted with more of them. At the unanimous request of the artists present, we were obliged to repeat my nonetto the same evening; and if my fellow performers had surprised me the first time by the readiness with which they played this difficult piece of music a prima vista, they satisfied me far more when the piece was repeated, by entering into and rendering its spirit. The young pianist, Herz, of whom, also, you must have read in the musical chit-chat of Paris, played twice in the course of the evening—first, variations of his own on a theme from Die Schweizerfamilie, and then Moscheles' well known variations on the Alexander March. The extraordinary manual skill of this young man is astonishing; but in his case, as well as in that of all the young artists here whom I have as yet heard, technical culture seems to have preceded mental cultivation; he would otherwise have given something more sterling than these break-neck, tricky things, in a society where none but professionals were present. It is, however, a striking fact that all here, old and young, endeavor to distinguish themselves only by mechanical dexterity; and people in whom, perhaps, there are the germs of something better, devote all their powers, for whole years, to practising a single piece of music, which, as such, frequently does not possess the slightest value, in order to perform it in public; that, by such a course, the mind must be killed, and that such people can become nothing much better than musical automata, is easily conceivable. The consequence is that you seldom or never hear a serious, sterling piece of music, such as a quartet or quintet of our great masters for instance; every one rides his own hobby; there is nothing but Airs variés, Rondos favoris, Nocturnes, and such like trifles, while the singers give you only romances and little duets; and, however incorrect and insipid all these things are, they never miss producing their effect, provided only they are rendered smoothly and sweetly. Poor in such pretty nothings, I come second best off with my serious German music, and in such musical parties I feel, not unfrequently, like a man speaking to people who do not understand his language; for though I often hear the praise which is awarded, by some one or other of the audience, to my play, extended to the composition, I cannot be proud of it, since, immediately afterwards, the same eulogiums are bestowed upon the most trivial things. I blush at being praised by such connoisseurs. It is exactly the same in the theatres; the great mass, who set the fashion, are completely unable to distinguish the worst from the best; they hear Le Jugement de Midas, with the same ecstasy as Les Deux Journées, or Joseph. One does not require to be here long, to come over to the oft-expressed opinion that the French are an unmusical people. Even the artists here think so, and frequently reply, when I speak of Germany in relation to this point: "Ay, music is loved and understood there, but not here." This explains how, in Paris, good music may be unsuccessful when connected with a bad piece, and wretched music prove a great triumph when united to a good piece. This fact has deprived me of all the desire to write for any of the theatres here, as I formerly wished to do; for, apart from the fact that, as a young composer, I should have to begin again, since, with the exception of a few things for the violin, my compositions are little or not at all known here, and, furthermore—apart from the fact that I should have to battle my way through a thousand cabals, which, would be doubly formidable, on account of my being a foreigner, before I could get my work produced—I should, after all, though conscious of having written good music, not be certain of the result, which as I have already said, depends here almost entirely upon the book. This is evident from the criticisms in the papers on new operas, where the writer speaks for pages about the libretto, while the music is merely mentioned casually in a few words. Were it not so lucrative to write for the theatres here, it is long since any good composer would have devoted himself to the task. On account, however, of the large sum an opera, if successful, brings in a man for his lifetime, new works are produced nearly every day; poet and composer are thinking incessantly of new effects; but, meanwhile, they do not neglect to work the public, by means of the papers, for months, to provide on the evening of representation a due number of claqueurs in the pit, in order, by all this preparation, to secure for their work a brilliant reception, and, by frequent performances of it, to obtain, in the end, rich profits. Were only half as much to be gained by an opera in Germany, we should soon be as rich in distinguished composers for the stage as we now are in instrumental composers, and it would no longer be necessary to transplant to our stage foreign productions, frequently so unworthy the artistic education of Germans.

That, after a stay of three weeks, we have visited each of the theatres repeatedly, is a matter of course. I am doubly glad of this, since, on account of the increase of my acquaintances, my engagements for the days and evenings have so accumulated, that we should be able to dedicate very few evenings in the course of the next fortnight to the theatre. I do not write anything about the Théâtre-Français, the Odéon, and the four small theatres, because they offer nothing remarkable in a musical sense. In the first two, you hear only Entr'actes, and in the two others scarcely any thing but vaudevilles. That pieces of this kind (which, thanks to Apollo and the Muses, have as yet been translated to no other country) are here so exceedingly popular, that four theatres play them almost exclusively, proves most convincingly that the French are unmusical; for the sacred art cannot be abused more shamefully than in these songs, which are neither sung nor spoken, but blurted out in intervals, diametrically opposed to the melody marked down, and to the accompanying harmony. All Frenchmen of taste, though, agree in saying that these vaudevilles, formerly given at one theatre only, smother, by their extension, the feeling for true music more and more, and thus exert a highly injurious effect on artistic progress. We have visited each of these theatres once, in order to see the celebrated comic actors, Brunet, Pothier, and Perlet, but we shall not, I think, make up our minds to pay a second visit, since the enjoyment these artists cause, by their wit and inexhaustible humor, is too dearly purchased by hearing such bad music. A thing which I found very remarkable in these theatres was the skill with which the bands manage to follow the singer, who does not pay the slightest attention to the tune, or the value of the notes. But this is their greatest merit; in other respects they are but middling. We have, however, been to the Italian Theatre several times, and had many an artistic treat there. Yesterday we at last heard Don Juan, after it had been allowed to lie by for rather a long time. The house was crammed, as at the previous performances, hundreds being unable to find places, even half an hour before the opera began. I was inclined to think the Parisians had, at length, comprehended the classic excellence of the work, and thronged, in continually increasing crowds, to enjoy it; but I soon relinquished this opinion, on perceiving that the most magnificent pieces in the opera, the first duet, the quartet, the grand sextet, and many others, passed over without producing any effect on the audience, while only two pieces were greeted with tumultuous applause, which, however, was intended more for the singers than for the composer. These two pieces, which were asked for da capo on each occasion, were the duet between Don Juan and Zerlina: "Reich mir die Hand, mein Leben," and the aria of Don Juan, "Treibt der Champagner," the first, because Herr Garcia wants depth, transposed to B flat, and the latter actually a tone higher, to C. Mad. Mainville-Fodor, who, no doubt was well aware that Zerlina's pieces would please the Parisians more than anything else in the opera, very wisely chose this part, and the result shows that she calculated correctly. What does it matter to her that the opera is cast most faultily, if she is only greeted with tumultuous applause? This, however, the connoisseur can only allow her to merit by forgetting that she plays the part of a peasant girl, and by entirely renouncing all truth of portrayal, for she decks out the simple strains of her part with a number of high-trotting ornaments, which, however magnificently she executes them, are here doubly exceptionable, firstly, because they are altogether out of place in Mozart's music, and secondly, because they do not agree with the character of her part. If we leave these out of consideration, it certainly is an unusual treat to hear this part, which, in Germany, is generally given to the third lady, sung here by the first, and one, moreover, so distinguished. Herr Garcia, as Don Juan, gave us too much of a good thing. Whenever he can, by any means, manage it, he is ready with some ornament an ell long. Such ornamentation is most out of place in the serenade, where the figured mandolin accompaniment forbids even the simplest. In spite of this, however, he runs about in the wildest fashion, and, in order to do so, has the tempo taken very slowly. To make up for this, however, he sings his air, "Treibt der Champagner" incomparably, and I confess I never heard it so well given. The fluent Italian language is, however, of great service to him, and instead of his breath failing him, as it generally does our German singers, his strength goes on increasing to the very end.

The other parts were, on the whole, well cast; at any rate, none were badly so; and it must be thankfully allowed that every one exerts himself to the utmost to do honor to the work. We may, too, be very well satisfied with the performance, if we only forget what we have a right to expect from such a distinguished body of artists. Thus much, however, soon becomes evident to a German, namely, that these singers, who give modern Italian music, especially Rossini's, with the greatest perfection, cannot execute Mozart's with the same degree of excellence—it is of too different a sort. The effeminate, sweet style, quite in keeping with the former, weakens too much the energetic character, which is more peculiar to Don Juan than to any other of Mozart's operas.

The orchestra, which the Parisians always call the first in the world, displayed, at any rate, some few weak points this evening. In the first place, the wind instruments were twice most strikingly deficient, and, secondly, the whole body was so unsteady, several times, that the conductor was obliged to have recourse to beating time. I am now still more strengthened in my conviction that a theatrical orchestra, however excellent, should not, on account of the great distance between the two ends, be conducted otherwise than by beating time, and that it is not advisable for the conductor himself to play, not even when, as Herr Grasset did, he continually marks the time by the movements of his body and by his violin. The orchestra is, however, justly celebrated for the discretion with which it accompanies the singers, and might, in this respect, serve as a model for all the other Parisian orchestras, as well as for many German ones.

The chorus, also, is admirable, and produced an especially strong and magnificent effect in the concluding allegro of the first finale. But why was this allegro, here too, as in most other places, taken with such immoderate quickness? Do conductors never reflect that they only impair instead of increasing its strength, and that the triplet-figures of the violins, which are intended to give life and movement to the broad masses, can no longer, with such frantically rapid time, be brought out distinctly and vigorously, so that all the public at last hears consists merely of skeleton-like outlines, without anything to fill them up, instead of the living whole?

When any one hears the effect of so magnificent a piece of music lessened by a false tempo, he must again feel an earnest wish that, at length, the marking of the tempi should be universally determined in Mälzel's or Weber's manner (or, still better, in both). It is true that the conductors would then be obliged to conform conscientiously to this plan, and not, as they do at present, unreservedly follow their own feeling.

Wolfgang Mozart to his Sister.

Bologna, September 22nd, 1770.

I hope that our mother is well, as also yourself; and I desire for the future that you will answer my letters more regularly, for it is easier to answer than to find things to say of one's own.

The six minuets of Haydn please me more than the first twelve. We have been obliged to play them very often to the Countess, and we should like to introduce the taste for German minuets into Italy, for their minuets will soon become as long as entire symphonies. Forgive me for writing so badly; I am in haste, otherwise I am capable of doing better.

Mozart to his Wife.

Bologna, September 29th, 1770.

We are extremely sorry to hear such bad news of our good Martha. I pray God to strengthen her. But what is to be done? We think of her all the day long.

Wolfgang has commenced to-day the recitatives of his opera.

P. S. of Wolfgang.—I will add a few words just to fill up the letter. I pity poor Martha with all my heart, ill for so long a time and yet so patient. I trust, with God's help, she will recover her health; if not, one must not grieve too much, because God's will is always best, and God knows better than us, whether it is best for her to stay in this world or to go to the other one; let her cheer up then, but who knows but that she may suddenly see the same change for fine weather.

The Same to the Same.

Bologna, Oct. 6th, 1770.

We have been in town for five days; we were at the fête of St. Petronius, which is celebrated magnificently here in the immense church dedicated to this saint. A musical service is got up, in which all the musicians in Bologna take part. We ought to have left here on Tuesday for Milan; but there is something here which will detain us. It is "something," if it comes to pass, will do great honor to Wolfgang.

The father, Martini, has received the method for violin that you sent him; we are the best friends in the world. He has finished the second part of his work; I shall bring back the two parts. We go every day to see him, and have long dissertations historico-musical.

So you have had three concerts, and have not invited us! Very well. We should have appeared like phantoms, and vanished in the same style.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—Why was I not with you, to amuse myself with you! I hope Martha is better. I played the organ to-day at the Dominicans; my remembrances to all the small Therasas.* To all our friends inside the house, and out of it, my compliments. I should like to hear the symphonies of the Berehl Garden and contribute my quota of trumpet and fife. I saw and heard the grand ceremony of Saint Petronius at Bologna. It was fine, but long; they were obliged to bring trumpets from Lucca to play flourishes, but they played in an abominable manner.

Musical Intelligence.

WORCESTER, MASS.—"Stella," of the Palladium, this week, tells us:

The Mendelssohn Choral Club, consisting of twenty-four voices, gave a concert on Friday evening, at Washburn Hall, for the purpose of assisting the High School in its purchase of a new piano. It was under the auspices of Mr. B. D. Allen, who conducted the performances with signal success. The 42d Psalm of Mendelssohn was given exceedingly well for an amateur society, with piano, harmonium and orchestral accompaniment, and lacked only the important requisite of a larger hall for so powerful a chorus. The solos were well sung—although we like not so much of the tremolo as obtains among many singers—and the choruses were taken with readiness. The work is dramatic in character, and has an air of oriental magnificence which we often remark in much of Mendelssohn's music, very pleasing at first, but we do not yet know how well calculated to endure. The full choruses need the help of distance between choir and auditor to bring out their entire significance. They do not carry us along with them like those of Handel, by force of grand, natural eloquence in which the art of the composer is best seen where most concealed. Instead, we find ourselves having a care lest even the singers themselves get entangled in the mazes of counterpoint and fugue. Still, we were glad to hear the work and, for it, thank Mr. Allen and his effective Choral Club. The Fifth Symphony was performed as a piano duet by Mr. Allen and Mrs. Dame, who gave it most effectively. One seldom hears such piano performance of Beethoven. Each movement, phrase, and shade of expression, was distinct and clear. The Meditation upon the 1st Prelude of Bach, for violin, harmonium and piano, a meritorious work of no small interest, opened part third of the programme, and was followed by a Bolero by Chopin, gracefully, artistically performed; a pretty song by Möhring, with violoncello obligato, and portions of a very beautiful sonata of Mozart with string accompaniments, which concluded this concert so highly creditable to Mr. Allen and his associates.

NEW YORK.—Fry, in the Tribune, thus remarks on the production at the Academy of Music of "Moses in Egypt,"—which opera, by the way, was given many years ago in Italian here in Boston, by the first Havana troupe, with Mme. Ranieri, Sig. Perelli, Vita, &c.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—ROSSINI'S MOSES IN EGYPT.—The drama when it was favored by the Church presented many religious subjects, with a mythological objectivity which would now startle the spiritual sanctions of a Protestant community. The church, in this, however, was a rival of the secular drama which never died out as all the received authorities on the dark ages tell us, but flourished under the Troubadours and Minstrels in a simple child-like form. In these early church dramas, as in the ecclesiastical paintings, no immaterial character, however awful, even Omnipotence itself, was deemed beyond the sphere of representation in the flesh. But with the growth of Protestantism the religious drama was extinguished and the Oratorio took its place. It was deemed impious to offer Biblical characters on the stage, but in the concert-room in citizen's dress they could be represented. The first attempts to invade this Anglo-Protestant custom shocked the sense of the American audiences. Méhul's "Joseph" was denounced, in so far as its characters were drawn from the Scriptures. Rossini's "Moses" was at first inadmissible on the English stage, and was given as an oratorio, for which it was not designed. The plastic character of our people, however, made them by degrees accept Biblical subjects in the opera. "Moses," with certain of the mysteries left out, was played in English in several American cities beside being performed by the operatic pioneers of the United States, the French company in New Orleans. Its success in English on the stage was very halting, and it was withdrawn. After an interval of many years it has been brought forward at the Academy in the Italian language. The version differs somewhat from the original score, which opens with the scene of the darkness spread over Egypt. The plot is very simple, or rather it is no plot at all, the libretto being very feeble. The miraculous events consociated with the efforts of the Israelites to effect their exodus, are mixed with a watery love-story, devoid of life or logic in such company, and as out of place as a declaration in a pow. If Brignoli cannot make love—as Pharaoh's son—in the middle of such difficulties, he is not to be blamed: and if Miss Patti, as a sugar-plum of a Jewess, dressed in the most heart-rending style, can only hang down her head, or raise it to emit a lot of fast notes—but cannot effect characterization, it is not her fault, as there is nothing to represent. If Pharaoh has no dramatic action, Ferri is not to be condemned. The only approximation to a character is Moses by Susini. The presence of this artist is magnificent, and his efficient declamation and singing leave nothing to be desired. The music of the whole opera is very admirable and beautiful; the composer has compensated himself for the defects of the poet. Never was the illustrious Rossini brighter or more fluent than in this work. He has exhibited the style of florid music which he perfected, for he gave new life to the style which Gluck essayed to kill—namely the ornate, or many notes to a few syllables—in contradistinction to the declamatory, which is a musical note for each syllable or thereabouts. With this basis, and with the highest gift for melody, Rossini ruled the musical world of Europe. But in those, beside the florid, there is as beautiful music of various styles, recitative, and large and grand strains, as was ever imagined. The lyrics assigned to the Prophet are without flaw. The quartet Mi manca la voce is of incomparable beauty in its kind; the finale of the third act is immense for its vigor. Groat and various merits are found through the instrumentation. In addition to the artists mentioned, the charming Miss Patti, etc., the good success of Mme. Strakosch as Mrs. Pharaoh may be indicated. She looked the Egyptian-imperial. The orchestra is excellent—led by Mr. Muzio. There are some picturesque scenes. The miracle of the Red Sea is good except the waves, which are too much of the pointed order of damp architecture. The wave-makers should take a few lessons in salt-water. The scene of the land of Canaan is a charming view, and might inspire equally emigrants now as then.

ESSEX, MASS.—A music teacher in this town communicates to the Salem Observer, the following account of an "infant musical prodigy."

Martha Story is a child of Mr. Andrew Story 2d, of Essex, and was three years of age the 16th of November last.

I am a music teacher, and have boarded in Mr. Story's family since last September. Previous to that time little Martha had never heard playing on the piano or melodeon, though she had one of the latter instruments. She could sing well at the age of one year. When I had been with her a few days, I observed her trying to play the air of "Greenville." It struck my fancy that I might teach her to play it, with both hands, in the course of two or three months; but instead of months it was only two or three days, when by my playing it over a few times with her fingers, she could play it alone. I taught her two or three tunes in the same way; and in a month she commenced to play by imitating what she heard played; and showing her on the bass she improved every day. On the 11th of January, she ran from her play to the Melodeon—stood, and blew the bellows with her foot, and played "Oh Susanna," for the first time, with both hands, as well as any one could, and at the same time looking out of the window. She can now play almost any tune she hears in the same way. She never looks on her hands while she is playing. Her time and accent are very good. She has played tunes by only hearing them two or three times, and can play on any key and get the right bass the first time.

She has quite an idea about composing;—almost every day she will play chords of four parts, (or as she calls it, "making up tunes,") and give strains that are very pleasing. She has made eight or nine tunes that are very pretty; and she could play in the dark or blindfolded.

She could play a March on the key of "C natural;" and while I was giving a lesson to her sister on the same March, in a duet in the key of "F, one flat," Martha jumped into her sister's lap, and played it with me in the same key that her sister had been playing, without making any mistake.

She can lie in my lap, with her head thrown back, and looking away from the Melodeon, play the air, while I play the bass, and change her hands several times in the tune,—that is, play one measure with the right, and the next with the left hand, and not break the time of the tune.

She has played in public three or four times to large audiences, and seemed quite indifferent to the people, looking at them all the time while she played.

A concert was given in this town on Fast-day evening, for the purpose of showing her. She played about thirteen or fourteen times, with as much willingness as an older person, almost every time blowing the bellows herself, sitting in a chair or standing. She ended the concert by playing "Good night," while the others sang.

She seems very bright in other things;—has great power of imitation, and a good memory—if we wish her to play a tune we have only to tell her the name.

Foreign Correspondence.

BERLIN, APRIL.—A flood of concerts, far worthier of notice than last winter's, has poured through the season, especially in March; but there have been almost more concert-givers than auditors, and nearly all the virtuosos from abroad have gone off disappointed, empty in purse and uncheered by applause. That was partly because so many little singing societies had been formed, and every society wanted to produce itself in public; particularly each director, like a little Pope-ling, longed to taste the pleasure of flourishing the baton, like a triumphator, at the head of a dozen picked up chorus singers, to the envy possibly of rival societies, and of serving up his own firstling composition to an "invited public." They all here want: 1, to direct; 2, to compose; 3, to teach singing; 4, to produce themselves with their achievements before the public. The poor concert-giver has perhaps had his head turned by a couple of old aunts, telling him how finely he composed or sang; and then indeed it is too tempting to taste the sweetness of publicity, so swiftly changed to bitterness, especially considering the perpetual conflict with the proverbial capriciousness of the Berliners; for commonly after a year's time you hear nothing more of the newly baked director, or of his society, which soon falls asleep. In Berlin, it is easy enough for a child to call a new thing into life; but to keep it alive, in an age so blasé, lifeless, and characterless, is harder than to hold quicksilver in the hand.

The Royal Opera had learned two new works: Christine von Siveken, composed by the Hofintendant Count von Redern, a dilettante who deserves well of music, and who must be regarded with indulgence if he once more vouchsafes to the public the effusions of his leisure hours; and the comic opera, Die Weiber von Weinsberg, by Schmidt, Theatre-kapellmeister in Mayence. The latter work contains many proofs of talent and routine musicianship; on the other hand the melodic thoughts are seldom held and carried out, so that one is not quite allowed to enjoy them. The comic pieces are the happiest and best rounded off; the instrumentation scarcely ever lifts itself above the ordinary kapellmeister routine. On the whole, the music does not reach that of Lortzing, still less that of Dittersdorf.

In Spontini's Vestalin Fräulein de AUNA sang the high-priestess in the place of Johanna Wagner. The pure, correct and telling quality of her voice, particularly in the upper register, was in her favor. On the contrary in freedom of characterization, in vital warmth of expression, in classical repose of play and dramatic soul she was far behind her predecessor. In the Prophète, Fräulein de Ahnu played Fides for the first time. The voice sounded young and fresh, and agreeable, and developed a large compass, the upper tones full and beautiful. At first she had to contend with embarrassment and uncertainty of dramatic situation. The simple, heart-felt motives sounded beautifully; but her bearing and mimic expression remained much too cold. In the duet with Bertha and in the scene in the cathedral there were single moments which rose to real artistic significance; especially where the Prophet compels the mother to kneel, the lively applause, which rose to the pitch of calling out, was fully justified.

The performance of Mozart's Zauberflöte could, in the principal parts, be called a success. Herr FRICKE's rendering of Sarastro, by its dignified coloring, supported that night by his peculiarly sonorous and flexible voice, won him a call before the curtain. Frau KOESTER, as the Queen of Night, was in less fortunate condition; especially by the side of the sweet and musical voice of Frau WEPFART in Pamina, the roughness of her (Koester's) voice gave the Queen only the faded splendor of her dignity. The bird-catcher, Papageno, found a capital representative in Herr KRAUSE. The Tamino of Herr KRUEGER has developed itself into much more freedom, but more uniformity of singing and of action is still to be desired. The execution of the splendid male choruses was masterly and received lively applause.

In Die Stumme von Portici ("Masaniello"), the part of Masaniello remains one of the best of Herr FORMES. Just this certain downright manner is suited to him and makes his rendering of the plain fisherman very natural. The slumber song, so difficult because it follows right after a longer arduous part in the fourth act, Herr FORMES sang with the most melting tenderness of his fine voice and with faultless delivery. Frau TUCZEK took all pains to do justice to the part of the Princess; but her voice (after an astonishingly long and distinguished service) leaves her now so often in the lurch, that the struggle with the intractable organ becomes painful. The great chorus a capella, the prayer before the outbreak of the revolution, was sung remarkably well and made as usual the liveliest impression on the public. In spite of Auber's often frightful awkwardness in instrumentation, especially in the working out of themes, &c., this opera remains unquestionably his most genial conception, and has already, through its exciting melodies, given an impulse to three revolutions, to-wit, in Warsaw, Brussels, and Paris or Dresden.

In Fidelio Frau Koester exhibited again the most inspired abandon; and the freshness, indeed voluptuousness, of an organ which has been exerted for so many years was astonishing. Always victorious, it is just in this opera that it puts almost all others in the shade, since Beethoven's manner of writing for the male voices is a most unfavorable one; also the too symphonic treatment of the orchestra splits up the vocal forces too much and too seldom suffers them to tell with their full tone. Only our old veteran, Herr ZIESCHE, as Rocco, remains unshattered; on the contrary, of Herr SALOMO, as the Governor, we remark very little, with the exception of his masterly acting. The same of Herr Krüger as Florestan, who with his fine, voluptuous tenor voice holds too much back and seldom becomes animated enough to cause his hearers any real enjoyment. He would be a much more useful singer, with his otherwise so good intention, if he would every time first sing his voice into good working order before coming upon the stage; for it usually begins to acquire metal and clearness only in the third act, (and unfortunately there is none in Fidelio).

The performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" is commonly a festival for the worshippers of Shakespeare and Mendelssohn; but it has unfortunately lost much in comparison with what it was ten years ago. Not only did the two pairs of lovers play in a terribly tedious and unpleasant manner; but the scenery also was so neglected, that a multitude of awkwardnesses disturbed the eye and for the most part dissipated the illusion of the ethereal halo which both Shakespeare and the, at that time, still fresh youth of Mendelssohn, in the exuberance of fancy, lent to this lovely dream picture. The female singers employed for the fairy chorus, instead of being disguised from head to feet, presented themselves in all their solid everyday reality; instead of seeking out the thinnest voices for the soli in the chorus, the first solo especially was taken by a singer, who spelt it off with her incongruous voice, bit by bit, in the most homespun fashion. Moreover the Kapelle (orchestra), so often decimated by the economical system of our royal management, was guilty of frequent carelessness and confusion, especially in the splendid march.

The Italian opera, at the new Victoria theatre, as luxuriously built as it is already deeply in debt, closed its performances with a ragout from four different operas, with a crowded audience, after competing very successfully through the greatest part of the winter with the Royal Opera. If the new Italian singing school no more affords such full, significant voices, as the once celebrated old conservatories, still their flexibility, intonation and declamation on the one hand, and the fire they breathe into the most trivial and absurd librettos, may be commended to the imitation of German singers. Signora ARTOT and the tenor de CARRION distinguished themselves particularly; also Signor FRIZZI is a genuine Italian buffo; while one or two German make-shifts, for example, "Signora" HUEFFEL and "Signora" ENIO made an ominous contrast to the real Italians. We also heard a Frau SAMMANN de PAEZ from Venezuela, formed in the Italian school—a German beauty, by the way, born in Königsberg. She too found many admirers, (as the Germans labor under the dangerous infirmity of praising all that is foreign, if it only imposes somewhat on them; and hence a German singer is only esteemed when he has been formed—or deformed—in Paris). And so Frau Sammann excited enthusiasm in various ways, what with her brilliant neck-breaking throat facility, although in the cantilena she cannot sing a single measure entirely through, unmarred by some brilliant flash or other.

In the flood of concerts the most important have been the four subscription concerts of music-director RADECKE, eked out with virtuosos from abroad; for instance, DAWIDOFF, violoncellist from Moscow, HARLWIGSON, pianist from Copenhagen, the violinists DAVID and DRETSCHOCK from the Leipzig Conservatoire. The most noteworthy was the performance of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven under Radecke's genial, sure direction,—far more successful than that monster performance of this remarkable creation some years ago in the opera house. The pianist DRETSCHOCK, from Prague, brother of the violinist, electrified by his bold as well as sure and fine playing in salon pieces. In classical works he failed sometimes by his too superficial, brilliant conception.

Prof. MARX, our greatest living theorist, has so overworked himself that he is now beginning only slowly to recover under the most careful nursing of his wife. His pupil, ZOPFF, has commenced popular lectures upon musical form, which meet with lively interest; for Berlin contains a great number of passionate lovers of Symphony soirées, who until now have vainly sought an opportunity to inform themselves about the structure of the orchestral works there heard. ### Paris.

(From Correspondence of New Orleans Pleasure, April 9.)

The Italian Opera has given us "Il Crociato in Egitto," by Giacomo Meyerbeer, and as Mons. Fiorentino has related the history of the piece, you must let me translate the story for you:—In 1820 (the same year in which Rossini gave his opera "Edward and Christine") a handsome young German composer, who was popular in the best social circles of Venice, brought out there with very great success an opera composed by him in the style and form then at the height of fashion. The new score was entitled Emma di Resburgo, and soon went the rounds of Italy. It was applauded everywhere and the composer, all Tedesco as he was, carried alle stelle. But this unexpected triumph raised disagreeable echoes in Germany, and the object of it came very near being regarded in his native land as a traitor and a renegade. Musicians hid their faces. Newspapers clamored scandal. "What," said they, "is the composer of Emma di Resburgo the same Meyerbeer who was trained and nurtured in the purest scholastic doctrines, the same great Prussian pianist, who, when ten years old, was Hummel's and Clementi's rival; is it the austere disciple of Abbé Vogler who sacrifices to the sensual and frivolous school of melody, who abjures his undivided worship of fugue and counterpoint, who writes well for voices, the wretch! and becomes more Italian than Rossini!" This was the language of the jealous and the inimical; Meyerbeer's friends were thrown into a state of consternation. His comrades hung down their heads when they heard anybody speak of the author of Emma di Resburgo or of Romilda e Costanza. They pitied him, but they dared not defend him. None of them were wounded more cruelly by this unnatural defection than Charles-Marie Weber. He could not get over it. He was at first full of sorrow, then he became excessively angry, then he became animated by a fierce desire of vengeance, and the better to exhibit the apostasy of his old fellow-pupil, he made the manager of the Dresden Opera House bring out again The Two Caliphs, a little comedy opera Meyerbeer composed in his nineteenth year. The Two Caliphs was written in strict accordance with every rule, but being as tedious as possible, The Two Caliphs were as powerful, so far as putting auditors to sleep was concerned, at Dresden as they had been at Vienna five or six years before. Nevertheless, the immortal author of Der Freyschütz and Oberon was in earnest; he did prefer The Two Caliphs (how passion blinds us all!) to all the operas Meyerbeer had written, Emma di Resburgo included. He had The Two Caliphs played, not to annoy Meyerbeer, but to allure him back within the pale of the true church. Meyerbeer was mortified to death by this resuscitation. He heard of it in the midst of his greatest successes at Milan, Turin, Rome and Naples. He would have given anything in the world to prevent the impudent resuscitation. He was seriously angry with Weber, for having disinterred, without the least necessity, this old, thin opera which cast a shadow on his rising glory; while Weber could not pardon Meyerbeer for having quitted his primitive dryness and stiffness for the flowers, feathers, fillets and festoons of the Italian school.

Some time afterwards the two pupils of Abbé Vogler (who had not ceased to love each other,) forgetting their dissensions and discussions, fell into each other's arms. Meyerbeer had, in the meantime, been again successful—Margherita d'Anjou had been received with the greatest favor at La Scala, and as success makes men good natured and conciliatory, they never mentioned the Two Caliphs again. The return of the prodigal son was celebrated by feasts. Weber was as kind as could be to his young friend, who, as a return for all this kindness, promised to give but one more opera in Italy, (which he was under contract to give,) after which he would resume his German career and leave it no more. This we learn from a very curious letter written by Weber at this period of time. "Last Friday," says he, "I had the great pleasure of having Meyerbeer a whole day with me; didn't your ears tingle? 'Twas really a happy day, just like those happy days we spent at Mannheim. It was late at night when we parted. Meyerbeer is going to Trieste to bring out his 'Crocato.' He will return to Berlin before a twelve month expires, where he will write, perhaps, a German opera. God grant it! I appealed and appealed to his conscience!" You can imagine Weber's scruples and supplications—the assurances and promises of Meyerbeer. He set out the next day—not for Trieste—for Venice, where "Il Crociato in Egitto" was played for the first time, the 26th December, 1826. The principal parts were played by Velluti, Lablache and Mme. Méric Lalande. The opera was brilliantly successful, and the composer was not only called out, he was crowned on the stage. The following year "Il Crociato" was performed at the Paris Italian Opera. Pasta played the crusader's part, Donzelli the part of Montfort, Levasseur the part of Aladin, Mlle. Mombelli the part of Palmide. The other artists are not worth being mentioned. Who would have said that forty years after this had taken place Meyerbeer would experience the same annoyance, the same mortification, the same fears in consequence of the resuscitation of "Il Crociato in Egitto," he formerly felt at the disinterment of the Two Caliphs, and that the genius and reputation of this great master would rise to such a height he would be obliged to disavow for a youthful indiscretion one of the most brilliant operas which honored in its day the Italian lyrical stage?

As soon as Meyerbeer heard of this unlucky idea, he declared that if he could not legally oppose the performance of a work whose copyright had expired, however averse he might be from its performance, he would protest with might and main against the performance; that while he would not disown his work, he would declare that before it was worthy of appearing before the eyes of the public he ought at least to retouch some pieces which have faded with age; that the public now has no taste for characteresques poems: and lastly, that "Il Crociato in Egitto" would be in no wise successful, and that the only profit the Italian Opera would derive from it would be to give the composer serious displeasure. The managers of the Italian Opera replied that Meyerbeer's name was an honor and a fortune for a theatre, and an irresistible attraction for the public; that the Italian opera singers regretted they were unable to appear in Paris in the operas of the illustrious maestro translated into their tongue, while they appeared in them everywhere else; that "Robert le Diable," "Les Huguenots," "Le Prophète," were freely performed at La Scala, La Fenice, La Pergola, at San Carlo, but that in France these operas belonged to the theatre of the grand opera and were banished forever from the Italian opera; that "L'Etoile du Nord" and "Le Pardon de Ploërmel" are the exclusive property of the Opera Comique, but at the same time enrich the theatres of London and St. Petersburg; lastly, that the Italian Opera was tired of being the only theatre unable to place the radiant name of Meyerbeer on its bills, and that unless the celebrated composer entered into a contract to write a new opera for the Italian company, it would exercise its legal rights, and intended to make the performance of "Il Crociato in Egitto," as brilliant and as careful as it was possible, and to give the three female parts to three singers of the very foremost merit, such singers as Mesdames Borghi Mamo, Penco and Alboni. The disinterment of this defunct opera proved a signal failure; leave the dead in their graves—there are their places.

Pierre de Medicis brings excellent receipts to the Grand-Opéra; that is, I suppose, the criterion of the success of a piece. Prince Poniatowski gave the banquet the Saturday before Passion Week to the "administration" and all the principal singers and dancers of the Opéra, and a gracious remuneration to the choristers; so you can imagine that with them the opera is popular also. Monsieur A. Royer goes on actively, however, with his design of bringing out the Sémiramis of Rossini, which Méry has just finished translating into French. Putting aside the great musical outline of the composer, which, of course, will be preserved, it is in many ways thrown almost into a new form—a general re-arrangement of the text and recitatives having been found necessary for the French stage. The decorations will be gorgeous. There is some talk of Méry taking the part of Assur. On Thursday, Friday and Saturday of Passion Week all the imperial theatres were closed: the Italian Opera was the one exception, but it was to give the Stabat Mater of Rossini that the doors were opened. The Emperor and Empress had the same artists to perform it also in the chapel of the Tuilleries. Mesdames Alboni, Penco, Battu, and MM. Tamberlik, Badiali, Morini, and Manfredi, sang this great work. The parts that gave the most pleasure were the quartetto, "Quando corpus morietur," sung by Alboni, Mad. Penco, Tamberlik, and Badiali, and "Fac ut portem Christi," sung by Alboni. At the Opéra-Comique, the Roman d'Elvire is again being played, as Mlle. Monrose is better. Galathée is given on alternate nights. I told you last week of the probability of M. Carvalho giving up the management of the Théâtre-Lyrique. Since I wrote, all arrangements have been concluded, and M. Réty has assumed the reins of government, while M. Carvalho has gone to London with his wife. The Théâtre-Lyrique thus loses its greatest ornament in losing Mad. Carvalho.

London.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The programme of arrangements for the seventh season, commencing the 1st of May, has been issued by the Company, and a goodly list of amusements is announced. The directors appear to have brought all their former experience of the wishes of the public to bear upon the forthcoming season. On Friday, the 4th of May, there will be a festival for the inauguration of the colossal statue of Mendelssohn, in bronze, subscribed for by the friends and admirers of the composer, and sculptured by Mr. Charles Bacon. The principal feature of the festival will consist of a performance of Elijah, when the band and chorus will comprise nearly 3000 performers, under the direction of M. Costa. The ceremony of unveiling the statue is to take place at six o'clock, and this will be followed by a torchlight procession. The directors have completed their arrangements for a series of opera concerts, which will take place on Fridays, the 11th of May, the 1st of June, and the 15th of June. The principal artists at Her Majesty's Theatre will perform on those occasions. A morning concert, with the programme selected from the compositions of Mr. Vincent Wallace, will take place on Saturday, the 19th of May. Arrangements for other important concerts are in progress, and will be made public as the season advances. There will also be performances by the children and members of the Tonic Sol-fa Association, on Wednesday, the 16th of May; and by the Metropolitan Schools Charity Society and the Metropolitan Charity Children, early in the same month. The Saturday concerts will be resumed in the Autumn, the same as last year. The performances of the Société des Orphéonistes, a French Choral Society, will take place on Monday, Tuesday, and Thursday, the 25th, 26th, and 28th of June. The number of these Orphéonistes will, it is supposed, be between 3000 and 4000, and they will be conducted by M. Delaporte, the founder of the society.—Novello's Mus. Times.

(From the Musical World, April 28.)

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Israel in Egypt was performed last night, for the first time this season, the principal vocalists being Miss Farepa, Miss Fanny Rowland, Madame Sainton Dolhy, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and Signor Belletti.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—Mlle. Piccolomini gave her second farewell performance on Saturday, when the Traviata was represented, and, being a subscription night, the theatre was crowded. The Traviata was given for the third time on Tuesday.

On Thursday, a new opera was produced, entitled Almina, composed by Sig. Fabio Campana, favorably known in England, as the author of light vocal pieces for the drawing-room. Sig. Campana, too, we are informed, produced in Italy, some years ago, one or two operas, of which we know nothing. The story of Almina would not interest our readers if recounted in detail. Enough that the heroine loves one man and is married to another, that she is supposed to die of a broken heart, and is buried; that her lover, reported killed, returns from the wars and breaks open her tomb; that she is restored to life, and flies with her deliverer to a foreign land; that they revisit their native country; that the husband reclaims his wife, and that the lady takes poison, and dies. There are some good dramatic situations, of which such a composer as Signor Verdi would doubtless have made good use. Signor Campana, however, is wanting in dramatic fire, which, above all other qualities, Almina requires. Mlle. Piccolomini was well suited in the part of Almina—being invariably earnest and passionate, and often real. The music, however, was not so suitable to her means, and her singing did not always produce its wanted effect. Signor Giuglini, as the lover, Blondello, on the other hand, sang better than ever, and carried away the vocal honors of the evening. He was encoiled twice, and was in finer voice than we have heard him for a long time. Signor Aldighieri sustained the part of Walter, the husband, with his customary vigor, and more than his customary judgment.

Taking applause as a criterion, the success of Almina was triumphant. After the first act, the principal singers were recalled, and then Signor Campana was compelled to appear, when he was not merely received with tumultuous acclamations but fêted with bouquets and laurel-wreaths. At the fall of the curtain, too, he was summoned to the foot-lights twice, when the demonstrations were renewed, and no doubt the composer left the theatre perfectly satisfied that his opera had achieved a great and legitimate triumph. First nights, however, are not always precedents—the Barbiere of Rossini to witness.

Last night Lucrezia Borgia was given with Mlle. Titens as Lucrezia, Madame Borghi-Mamo as Maffeo Orsini (her first appearance in the part), Signor Mongini, Gennaro (his first appearance in the part), and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi, Duke Alfonso (his first appearance in this country).

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Fidelio was repeated on Saturday, and attracted a much larger attendance than at the first performance. Madame Caillag more than confirmed the impression she made on Thursday. The indisposition of Signor Tagliafico necessitated the omission of Pizzaro's only air. In other respects Beethoven's great masterpiece was given to perfection.

Grisi and Mario made their rentrée on Tuesday in La Favorita. Of course the theatre was crowded, the public being always desirous to hail the first appearance of these deservedly admired performers. M. Faure, too, was Alfonso XI., and lent another attraction to the performance. Grisi still maintains her place. Her upper notes may have lost some of their brilliancy, and her execution some of its fluency; but the voice still possesses the exquisite quality of old, and her style retains all its unrivalled charm. That Grisi should act still better and better, is a matter of course. In this respect, at all events, we can discover no change, unless that she has become more subtle and more finished, as indeed we were inclined to think on Tuesday evening, when she transcended her former achievements, especially in the last scene, which has never been surpassed for intensity and pathos. Mario, too, appeared to act better than ever, which a priori was all but an impossibility, and to sing as nobody else but he can sing, when in the vein.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The season was inaugurated on Monday. The following was the selection:—

Symphony, "The Seasons," in B minor.....	Spohr.
Song, "A questi avventuri infami" (Il Seraglio), Mozart.
Concerto, violin.....	Mendelssohn.
Scene (Der Freischütz).....	Weber.
Overture (Egmont).....	Beethoven.
Symphony, "Jupiter".....	Mozart.
Duet, "Se la vita" (Semiramide).....	Rossini.
Overture (Oberon).....	Weber.

Of the symphony of Spohr, we have more than once spoken at length. It is enough to say in this place, that it is not one of the most inspired works of the great master. The execution, considering the difficulties presented, was marvellous, and Professor Bennett and his orchestra covered themselves with honor.

The violin concerto, as performed by Herr Becker, was in many respects entitled to the very highest commendation. Exceptions, nevertheless, might be taken in several instances; the reading generally was not in strict keeping with the directions of the composer. Herr Becker, nevertheless, played so splendidly, that he was recalled at the end and received with enthusiasm.

The execution of Mozart's symphony and Beethoven's overture was inimitable in every way, both performances being received with tumultuous applause, and the overture to Oberon was a splendid finale.

Signor Belletti sang the superb song from Mozart's too much neglected opera with faultless taste. Mlle. Louise Michal, a Swedish prima donna of reputation in her own country, gave the grand scena from Der Freischütz with great power and facility, but in too studied and artificial a manner to create any unusual effect.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The third concert was given on Wednesday, and was alike characterized by excellence and variety, as the following selection will show.

Overture, (The Isles of Fingal)..... Mendelssohn
Airs, "Jours de mon enfance," (Pré aux Clercs)..... Hérold Symphony Concertante in B flat, op. 68, two Pianofortes and Orchestra..... Dussek Recit. "By him betrayed," M. S. Opera..... J. Benedict Airs, "Thus I am doomed,".....
Overture, (Lulline)..... Vincent Wallace
Sinfonia Eroica (No. 3), op. 55..... Beethoven
Duo, "Di qual città sei tu?" (L'Etoile du Nord)..... Meyerbeer
Overture, (Gustave)..... Auber

MR. SIMS REEVES'S BENEFIT CONCERT.—Other artists may have their special merits, some excelling in sacred, some in secular, some in dramatic music, but of Mr. Reeves it may be said with truth, that in every branch of singing he is pre-eminent. In the majestic strains of Handel, the solemn recitative, the pathetic air, the vigorous declamation, he stands unapproached; while there are many airs that he has made, as it were, his own. Who, for instance, can sing, "Call forth thy powers," "Sound an alarm," "The enemy said," "Then shall the righteous," "Comfort ye my people," "Total eclipse," like Mr. Reeves? Not to multiply instances (as we might ad libitum), it is sufficient to say that, as an oratorio singer, Mr. Reeves is unequalled. Nor is it alone in sacred music that his great talents are conspicuous. His dramatic performances are no less admirable—the dashing brigand in Fra Diavolo, the ill-fated Edgardo in Lucia, the love-lorn Elvino in La Sonnambula, Florentin in Fidelio, Manrico in Travatore (wide as the poles asunder)—all differing so largely in style, and all alike excellent in conception and execution—stamp Mr. Reeves as immeasurably the first of our English operatic artists. In the concert-room, again, he is at home with all the composers—Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, alike finding an interpreter worthy of their best inspirations; and no tenor, in our recollection, has ever done such ample justice to their compositions. It is no wonder, then, that the announcement of Mr. Sims Reeves's benefit at St. James's Hall, on Monday evening, should have attracted the largest audience that has ever been seen in that building. Had the room been double the size, it would scarcely have sufficed to accommodate the numbers who sought admission, undeterred by the wretched weather, and anxious only to be present at one of the best of the many good selections with which the Monday Popular Concerts have familiarized the public. As it was, many were the disappointed applicants turned reluctantly away from the doors. Mr. Reeves chose four pieces for the display of his genius, each a perfect gem in its way, although different in style. In the touching recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," from Jephthah, and the lovely air which follows, "Waft her angels through the skies," our eminent tenor showed himself a perfect master of the highest style of vocal music. Beethoven's "Adelaide" has lately been frequently sung by Mr. Reeves, but never more exquisitely than on this occasion, the pianoforte accompaniment being played by Miss Arabella Goddard with that delicacy and refinement in which she is unrivalled. A perfect furor of applause followed, and Mr. Reeves had twice to return and bow his acknowledgments, wisely resisting an encore. The air from Don Giovanni, "Dalla sua pace," afforded Mr. Reeves an opportunity of exhibiting his appreciation of Mozart; and as a further proof of his versatility, so much humor was infused into the elegant little air of Beethoven, "The stolen kiss," that an irresistible demand for its repetition ensued. It is a very long time since Mrs. Reeves has been heard in a London concert-room, and the public, not forgetful of an old favorite, accorded her a hearty welcome. Mendelssohn's "Frühlingslied," and Spohr's duet from Jessonda, evinced those musician-like qualities which have always characterized Mrs. Reeves's singing. Madame Sainton-Dolby also selected a song of Mendelssohn, "Night," and was warmly applauded for her highly effective and most expressive rendering of Mr. J. W. Davison's setting of Shelley's words, "False friend, wilt thou smile or weep" (Cenci).

The instrumental selection constituted a worthy companion to the vocal; Beethoven's so called "Posthumous Quartet," in F major, Op. 133, was heard for the third time at these concerts, and with increased interest, and Rossini's Quartet, in G major, No. 1, although but a bagatelle in comparison with that of the giant tone-poet, was nevertheless sufficiently interesting to warrant its introduction. The executants in each instance were Messrs. Sainton, Goffrie, Doyle and Piatti, and both quartets were played to admiration.

One of Mozart's Sonatas in F major, for pianoforte alone, was given for the first time and when we say that this beautiful composition was performed by Miss Arabella Goddard with all her admirable taste, faultless mechanism, and incomparable expression, our readers have a guarantee that no word other than "perfect" can apply to it.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The concert on Saturday, one of unusual interest, was a "Shaksperian Selection;" why given on this occasion we have not been informed. The notion and poetry of every piece, however, was referable to the works of the great poet. The performance commenced with Mendelssohn's music to A Midsummer Night's Dream, the principal singers being Miss S. Wells, Miss Eyles, Mr. William Cummings, Mr. Baxter, Mr. Land, Mr. Lawler—all members of the London Glee and Madrigal Union—and a chorus under the direction of Mr. Smythson. Mendelssohn's music was followed by a miscellaneous selection, including two overtures—The Merry Wives of Windsor, by O. Nicolai, and The Two Gentlemen of Verona, by J. Street—and comprising compositions by Sir Henry Bishop, Sir John Stevenson, Dr. Callcott, Dr. Wilson, and Stevens. The single encore of the concert was awarded to Stevens' glee, "Blow thou wintry wind," sung by Miss Wells, Miss Eyles, Mr. W. Cummings, and Mr. Lawler. The concert-room was crowded, and nearly four thousand persons were assembled in the building.

Wagner and his Critics.

The literary passage-at-arms between RICHARD WAGNER and BERLIOZ, which has sprung from the concerts recently given by the former in Paris, is curious, if nothing more. Berlioz, with Liszt, have been commonly regarded and quoted as the two who make up with Wagner the glorious trinity of founders and of rulers in the new world called the "Music of the Future." These were Wagner's two main stays: Liszt, his chivalrous exponent and defender; Berlioz, by instinctive sympathy of purpose and direction, working somewhat from the same principles and by the same means, but from his own original suggestion, naturally converging toward him. Exiled from Germany in '48; not permitted to bring out in person or to hear his own works, which have a certain currency in the chief German cities, scouted of course by English prejudice against everything that is new, excluded until now from France, Wagner at last is called to Paris and has an opportunity to give a taste of his productions (in a fragmentary manner) to the critical and dilettante world there, wielding the conductor's baton in his own person. Of course the feuilletons are full of it the morning after the first concert. There are all manner of critical opinions and expressions; there are plenty of ignorant admirers, who are not critics, and praise for the only reason that they like a thing; there are not a few too of admiring critics, who give him credit for genius, for originality, but find much fault, both with the music and with the theoretic principles on which he is presumed to have composed it.

But of all the men to whom Wagner must have looked with full assurance not only of a generous welcome, but even of an earnest advocacy, as to a brother hero and apostle in a common cause, Berlioz, the new school composer and the critic, the wielder, like himself, of mighty orchestras and of the pen, was certainly the man. What then must have been his surprise, the morning after the concert, at reading in the Journal des Debats the singularly diplomatic criticism which we have translated in last week's paper! He is flattered, to be sure, by what is said in detail of several of his compositions; but when it comes to principles, to theoretic dogmas, to the central ideas of the whole Art-gospel of their common apostleship, for which they have labored and suffered, battling with the prejudices of a world bed-ridden by "the classics;" when it comes to the essence of the whole matter, presto! our Frenchman has doffed the friend and donned the diplomat; deals cautiously as with a foreign power; "does not quite understand;" "if it means so and so, pleads off, rejects it utterly, "lifts up his hands and swears: Non credo!"

Here then the "Future" has become already a kingdom divided against itself. Its chiefs and founders quarrel. One of the Three, in his public capacity of critic, declines to commit himself. Two alone are left: Wagner is great, and Franz Liszt is his prophet.

One who has heard any of the instrumental music of Berlioz cannot but note the curious fact, that in his criticism he takes Wagner to task for the very same uncouth peculiarities which abound in his own works. The "weariness" and consequent avoidance (perhaps native lack) "of melody"; the "satiety with consonant harmonies, with simple, prepared, resolved dissonances, with natural modulations"; the "ascending and descending minor sevenths, winding in and out like a knot of hissing serpents;" "middle parts forced together without harmonic or rhythmical agreement;" "modulations that make one shudder," and so on;—are we not kept on the rack by these sort of extravagances, these bold arts of effect, as much while listening to Berlioz, as while listening to Wagner? Our knowledge of them both, we own, is limited: but is not this the general impression justified by what little of the symphonic music of Berlioz has found its way into the concert rooms on this side of the ocean? The difference seems to be that Wagner is a man of genius, and Berlioz but a man of talent. Wagner has ideas, creative power, and Berlioz is but an ambitious setter forth of barren inspirations with an imposing breadth and pomp of instrumental combinations. In the one we see something like growth from within, which is characteristic of the works of all men of genius, all creative artists, old or new, classic or reformers, in the other it is a building and clothing upon from without. And yet while Wagner seems to have creative genius as compared to Berlioz, he is far, very far from having made good his claim in that respect to a place upon the same level with the great tone-poets, the Mozarts, Beethovens, &c.

But Berlioz no doubt is honest in his criticism of Wagner. It is a criticism from his own proper stand-point. Berlioz is above all the technical musician; he is great chiefly in that character. Wagner is less so; he is a man of ideas, an artist. Berlioz criticizes him grammatically, and Wagner is willing to leave the question of musical grammar to others; his work, as he conceives it, is to build up, to explain by word and example the "Art-work of the Future," in which Music shall be but one co-operative factor with the other arts in realizing a more rich and universal Art. It must have been mortifying, with these high views, to have his "dear Berlioz" meet and judge him as a mere musician. To be regarded as a musician, must, to one of these great prophets of the "Future," seem almost as insulting, as to be called a musikant, or common fiddler.

After all it strikes us that the only real question was as to the musical and artistic worth, the beauty, the inspiration, the power, the significance of Wagner's music. All that Berlioz says, as to wherein he agrees and wherein he differs with the "Zukunft" creed, or theory, is gratuitous. Probably Wagner himself would condemn all that Berlioz condemns, in the form that the latter supposes the ideas presented. And probably what is most vital to the thought of Wagner, and of all his critics, is that in which all true artists have agreed and ever must agree. The great question that we have about a composer relates not to his theory, but to his practice, to the reality and quality of his genius, to the beauty and inspiring influence of his works. We care not whether he be old school or new school; whether he follow in the beaten paths, or strike out new paths. If he have genius, if he have poetry and music in him, he will show it, whether he keep in old forms, or feel forth after new ones. The more of genius a composer has, the less will he trouble himself about forms theoretically. His genius may find the best scope, and the most convenient channels in the so-called classical and strict forms, or it may best express itself in freer modes; in either case we feel the genius, the soul that animates and moulds the form, and either form becomes poetic, beautiful, instinct with life. It is not in the power of any Berlioz, Liszt or Wagner—or even of our friend Fry—to differ more widely from "classical old-fogism" generally, than Chopin's lovely inspirations differ from the Sonatas of Beethoven or the Fugues of Bach: and yet Chopin is a welcome presence in all feasts, of music that are most classical and choice.

Musical Chit-Chat.

FERDINAND HILLER's new oratorio "Saul," is to be performed this evening, for the first time in this country, by the New York Liederkreis, conducted by Herr Paar, in the Academy of Music; the principal solos by Mme. Zimmermann, Stigelli, and others.... The Ullman-Strakosch troupe were to perform "Moses in Egypt," oratorio-wise, in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on Thursday evening.... GAZZANIGA has returned from her wanderings and come back to the Academy, where she has sung this week in La Traviata and in Don Giovanni. Major SUSINI was to appear as the Duke in Lucrezia Borgia last evening, and also sing "the song of the Zouave after the battle of Solferino," one of Sig. Muzio's patriotic effusions. This afternoon "the season definitely closes" with a "grand matinée."... Maretzek's company, who were announced as to be in Philadelphia this week, are still at the Winter Garden, where Verdi's Nebuchadnezzar has succeeded to La Juive, with Mme. FABBRI, and a new basso, Sig. MIRANDOLA.

In Philadelphia there is eager expectation of MARETZKE, with his FABBRI, FREZZOLINI, STIGELLI and the rest. Is ULLMAN coming here, we wonder? Why can not our new-named Boston Academy give us the two companies in turn? Or is it necessary to the very existence of two Operas, that they should stay in the same place and fight each other?... The Philadelphians have given a grand complimentary concert to Mr. CARL SENZ, who is soon to suspend his Germania Afternoon Rehearsals and make a visit to Europe. CARL HORNSTOCK, the excellent violinist, is also turning his face the same way, and is to have a farewell concert.

Mr. S. A. BANCROFT, the organist at Dr. Kirk's church, and Mr. B. J. LANG, our accomplished young pianist, sailed in the Canada, on Wednesday, with the pleasant prospect of a five months' tour in Europe before them. They will spend a month in London, now in the height of the musical season, and will divide the remaining months between Germany, France and Switzerland. May they hear plenty of fine music, and return refreshed in body and in mind; for who needs such refreshment more than a hard-working teacher of music, and who can be musician in this country without being teacher?

Messrs SIMMONS & WILLCOX, of this city, have just finished another admirable organ, destined for the Church of St. Ignatius (Catholic) in Baltimore. It has three manuals, including a Swell down to the 8-foot C, and a Pedal organ; and has upwards of thirty stops. The case is of pure Corinthian design, to correspond with the interior of the church. For an organ of its size, its power and volume are remarkable; the full organ, with the mixtures, &c., is rich and well balanced, the diapasons round and satisfying, the imitative stops beautifully characteristic, the swell quite perfect in its operation. Opposite to this instrument in the Manufactory, as we saw it, stands another large organ, which is nearly finished, for St. Paul's Church, in Louisville, Ky., where Mr. E. W. GUNTER is the organist.

"Juvenile Operas, Cantatas," &c., seem to be more and more the fashion over the country. Such things are easily produced, and easily performed, and if they happen to have a little cleverness, are sometimes good speculations for the "professors" who compose them. The Manchester, N. H. Mirror speaks enthusiastically of a new one, called the "Fairy Grotto," lately written and brought out by Mr. STRATTON, of that city.

The great event next coming in New York will be the reception of the Japanese Embassy, who are to be can-onnized, paraded round, palavered, feasted, danced to, sung and played to, and bored, bewildered, dazzled by all sorts of entertainment which may serve to show that this is the greatest nation on God's earth. Why not among other things give them a grand sample of the "Music of the Future"? Where are Fry, and others who compose symphonies at an hour's warning? There is our good old friend, Father Heinrich, whose brain always teems and whose heart always swells with patriotic inspirations, worldwide and generous, who has already set the glorious theme to music. He has composed, we understand, a symphony in honor of the occasion. Why are not the Committee stirring? Here is the title:

Grand Symphony in Three Parts.
For full Orchestra.
AMERICA'S WELCOME TO ASIA.
Presented through the Most Honorable Japanese Embassy, to the KINT-SUSAMA,
or
Celestial Lord of Japan.
PART I.
Grand Historic Overture.
Opening of the Sealed Gates
To American Commerce.
Exultation of the two Worlds, expressed by a Grand Heroic March.
PART II.
The children of Senzō—Dai—Sin embark on The Ocean of Peace for a voyage to the Land of Washington.

PART III.
Rejoicing of Columbia.
Composed by Anthony Philip Heinrich.

We read in German papers of two musical festivals to be held this summer on the Rhine. The first will be at Pfingst (Whitsuntide), first of June, at Dusseldorf, under the direction of Ferdinand Hiller. The programme for the first day (Sunday) will be: Handel's "Samson" oratorio, and Schumann's symphony in B flat major; second day (Monday): Overture to the Wasserträger, by Cherubini, Ver Sacrum, by Hiller; seventh symphony by Beethoven. Third day: Artist's Concert, with the co-operation of Frau Bürde-Ney, Fr. Franziska Schreck, and Herren Schnorr, Stockhausen and Joachim.—The other is the fourth Middle Rhine Festival, to be held at Mayence on the 22d and 23d of July. "Israel in Egypt" (Handel), the Walpurgisnacht (Mendelssohn), choruses from Gluck's Alceste, and two choruses from Mozart and Palestrina will be performed.

W. H. FRY says, in the Tribune, of La Juive:

"La Juive" is one of the operas produced in Paris between 1830 and 1840, which inaugurated a new school, in so far as the plot was neither the old-fashioned draughts on Lemprière's classical dictionary touching the woes of Orpheus and Euridice, or Medea, nor yet the light-hearted pleasantness of "La Dame Blanche" or "Fra Diavolo." The peculiarities of this school are a large, well developed serious or tragic modern or medieval subject, requiring much stage display, and not content with less than four or five acts for its scope. There were several contestants for supremacy in this school. Aubert in "Mammiello," Rossini in "William Tell," Halévy in "La Juive," and Meyerbeer in "Robert le Diable." Of these works, the plot of "William Tell" is poor, the soprano part weak, but the excellence of the tenor part, first in the hands of Nourrit, then of Dupres, added to various musical merits, made it succeed. "Mammiello," though not remarkable in its solos, has an excellent stirring plot, charming situations, many original popular choruses, barcaroles which have traveled round the world, and a memorable duet. "Robert le Diable," though not successful here, by the aid of Tagliioni's dancing and some fine concerted music, especially the final duo and trio—to which may be added wonderfully fine scenic effects, and a fine idealistic poem of Good and Evil running through it, triumphed in Paris. It is not very fluent, vocally. "La Juive" has the advantage of a concise plot, strong situations, and excellent suggestions for stage display. The composition of this work appeared to exhaust M. Halévy, for his subsequent productions have been positive or comparative failures. When it was first brought out in Paris, Dupres was in the height of his renown, the chief tenor part being drawn to suit that vocalist. Dupres was renowned for strength and facility in the extra upper notes of his voice, and the composer, who knew his trade, and rounded off the approaches to climaxes with these sonorous inflations, could promise himself a successful scene. Halévy is not, in a proper sense, a great melodist. In La Juive he has some happy phrases; but we cannot point to a first rate, complete, spontaneous melody, in the whole work. Yet by a judicious knowledge of effect, aided by capital situations, he made a success in Paris of the first order. The finale to Act I. is an example of this. The vocal writing is, to the last degree, judicious and effective; and yet the melody, as a whole, will not compare with the best; but it has particular measures that are admirable and exalted. The same may be said of other portions of the opera.

LEOPOLD DE MEYER was expected daily in London, where he intends to pass the season. ROSSINI had arrived there.... A grand concert will be given in May or June, in the Crystal Palace, for the benefit of Mr. W. V. WALLACE, to consist entirely of music taken from his works, vocal and instrumental.

Musical Correspondence.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 14.—Presuming that you will not be at all averse to having some little account of how matters in general, but musical matters in particular, progress in this sometime-to-be-great city of the western coast. I take pen in hand to enlighten you to the best of my ability; and in commencing let me say that the arrival of the "Journal of Music" by each steamer is one of the greatest sources of pleasure derived by myself and brother, far away as we are from all that we hold greatest and best in the way of music. No, not all, for we can still have Beethoven, Chopin, Mendelssohn and others, if we are inclined to be satisfied with what the piano can supply; for have we not TRENKLE with us?—and surely it would be unreasonable in us to expect more pleasure than we can derive by passing an evening with him. San Francisco seems not just the place for one so ill as he is, but he feels obliged to remain here, I presume, on account of pupils, &c. I wish he would go back into the country and stay for awhile, it might invigorate him. But we hope for the best. He keeps up good spirits.

Next to Trenkle among our musicians, comes GUSTAVE A. SCOTT, who is one of the finest exponents that I ever heard and an admirable musician. Besides these excellences he possesses that of being a boon good fellow, kind-hearted, and always ready to render assistance where it is needed, and without remuneration. He is a universal favorite and deservedly so, being always ready for a good time. Some rare performances take place in his room, which looks out upon Montgomery St., the Washington St. of San Francisco. The "Anvil Chorus" is frequently brought out in a style that would astonish the sober people of Boston; in fact it rather astonishes Californians, if we may judge from the crowd that invariably assembles on the opposite sidewalk during the performance. Scott has a fine grand piano, on which he executes the orchestral passages, the chorus of blacksmiths consisting of from four to eight of certain individuals, of whom your humble servant and brother form a part, armed with watering pots, tin pans, sheets of zinc, air-tight stove, coal-hods, tin pails, &c., and the way that the strikers "put in," would astonish even the Lynn mob. The effect is very grand, of course, and is properly appreciated by the crowd in the street. So much for fun; but every Monday evening a quartet of us have some pleasant glee singing, at the same place. Orchestral talent is scarce, as you may suppose when you know that TRENKLE, who proposes giving a concert soon and wishes to play a trio or quartet of Beethoven or Mozart, is prevented from so doing by the lack of a violoncellist. "Oh, if Wulf were only here!" groaned he in despair, the other evening. I echoed that wish, you may be sure. But it is too early yet for Beethoven to be appreciated here, so, I suppose we must not look for getting the "Quintette" out here at present.

We have a society gradually improving in chorus singing, that we hope will one of these days become an Oratorio society. The "Pacific Musical Society" is the name of this promising club, consisting of about fifty members, under the charge of Mr. ELLIOT, the best tenor singer and one of the best amateur musicians amongst us. Like Scott, he is always ready for a good time, particularly if music is connected. He formed the present Club some few months since, taking simple glees to commence with. The book now in use is the "Opera Chorus Book," and many of the choruses are rendered very excellently. The credit is due to Elliot, who conducts and has trained them well, and Scott, who is in this affair to help all he can and to "do the orchestra." I think, too, that the "Handel and Haydn Society" might profit by the example displayed by this little society in point of attendance. I have known three of the prominent lady members to leave company at home to attend rehearsal. That's the true spirit, is it not? I wish it were possible to get up the "Messiah" for Christmas next. We may do it yet, but oh, for Zerrahn! You will hear more of our little society hereafter.

We have recently had opera here. Opera! only think of that. LEACH, ROSALIE DURAND, GEORGIA HODSON, &c. were the opera-tors. I went one evening to hear the Trovatore. With difficulty I stayed through the first act and part of the second, but having endured all I could, I left and made place for others who possessed greater powers of appreciation than myself. I see by this morning's paper that we are to have LUCY ESCOTT and troupe. They will at least be an improvement on the others. Madame BISCACCANTI is here still, but appears but seldom in public. I believe she is singing at one of the churches. A Mr. Evans is likewise here and has played at one or two concerts. How long he will remain is not known. He plays the fine organ at Dr. Scott's church, but though he shows ability and perfect control of the instrument, I fear that Bach or Handel would be horrified at finding that noblest of instruments treated after his manner. He loves to show it off, but he has no true appreciation of its grandeur. Trenkle is the man who should play that organ; I hope he may yet be there.

Now do not judge from what I have said, that music is scarce in Frisco. On the contrary, we are convinced each evening that nowhere in the States is it more plenty. If we go out of an evening, we hear, first, two drums and a fife playing most merrily on one side of the Plaza; on the other, the same instruments, with the addition of a couple of sax horns and a trombone will discourse on another subject, while, at a short distance, in another direction, "Bobbin' around," with "My Mary Ann" will add to the attractions, particularly when the organ which discourseth is a little wheezy. From each drinking saloon as we pass (which we always do) we catch the sound of a fiddle (not a violin) and piano, with occasionally a flute. On such occasions we cannot refrain from giving utterance to our feelings of emotion as we exclaim gratefully: "Who says we don't have music in San Francisco!" When, added to all this, I make you acquainted with the fact of our lodgings being in a Chinese neighborhood, enough has been said. No matter, it would be strange indeed if music had reached a proper standard in so young a city. One of these days you will find a different state of things.

Well, so much for gossip. I thought you might possibly feel an interest in knowing what was the condition of things here, and I have said my say. I hope the time may come when "Dwight's Journal of Music" may be looked for as eagerly by all as it now is by your very humble servant. W. H. D.

CINCINNATI, MAY 7.—During the past week, Lortzing's charming operetta, "Der Czar und Zimmermann," was twice given, at Pike's opera house, by the Cincinnati Maennerchor, under the direction of Prof. CHARLES BARNES. This is an entirely domestic enterprise, and as such deserved the united support and encouragement of dilettanti and philharmonists. This society has successively sung this opera at their locale, at the German theatre, and the National, with success; flattered and encouraged, they engaged the opera house. But the audience was too small to insure the permanence of the enterprise.

We cannot understand how a city can style itself Art-loving, in the face of so many failures of this kind. The sculptor's creation yellows in his studio, the painter's efforts are crowned with the dust of his atelier, and the poet-musician, finding neither pecuniary nor other recompense, sees the utter uselessness in laboring. Not the creator only, but the performer and interpreter feels the same want of encouragement; for instance, Mme. Gazzaniga, universally acknowledged to be one of the finest lyric actresses of the day, had to restrict an engagement of four nights to one.

Though the rendering of Lortzing's opera was not faultless, it was certainly fine. The ensemble pieces were the best I have ever heard, and far superior to those of the Strakosch troupe. Particularly fine were the sextet in the second, and the quartet in the third act, which merited and received an encore. The part of Mary was well sung and acted, as was also that of the Czar, and of Iwanow. The burgo-master failed in his singing, but his acting was faultless. The distinct enunciation of the words was a praiseworthy feature of the performance. I am sorry I cannot give you the names of the singers, as their modesty prevents them from giving them to publicity. On the whole the affair was an honor to the city and creditable to all engaged in it—except the ballet girls. W.

TWELVE CHARACTERISTIC STUDIES, by Adolph Henselt. Handsomely bound in cloth. 2.50

These studies should be in the libraries of all advanced pianists. They not only contain highly valuable matter for the technical development of the hand and fingers, but each of them is a charming piece in itself, with an original and significant motto. Some of these studies are now known everywhere, for instance, "If I were a bird," which is unsurpassed in its way.

Italian and German Singing.

[We translate the following sensible remarks from an article in the Vienna Deutsche Musik-Zeitung, by Alfred Freiherr von Welsogen. He takes his texts from certain passages in the autobiography of the German tenor singer, Franz Wild, who died on the first day of the present year, and of whose artistic career we have already given a brief sketch. The writer fears, and very reasonably, that Wild's account and recommendation of his own practice may lend an undue currency to some false maxims in the vocal art.—Ed.]

.... First, we read in Wild's autobiography the following confession: "Scales I sang but little; but I practised with unwearied zeal prominent passages of parts, to the perfect rendering of which I attached great importance."—"Without syllables, without words I had no voice. For this latter excellence (??) I had to thank the strictness of my singing teacher at the Court Capelle, Herr Körner, who was the only one who ever taught me in my art," &c. It is scarcely possible to show more strikingly in fewer words, that Germany is not the land of singing as an art: that in our country one can much more acquire the fame of a great dramatic singer, without possessing the least apprehension of the peculiar essence of the art of singing. Capable lungs, a strong, metallic voice, a good stage figure and intense endowments for theatrical representation: these are the qualities with which one can make a furor as a singer in all the German theatres, and with which one is equally sure to make an utter failure everywhere, where singing as an art is understood, unless besides all these fine qualities he also learned the trifling matter of having a voice without words or syllables, i. e., of being a real singer; and this he only can become and can remain through daily practice of the scales. Now if Wild assures us that he always conceived his tasks as a singing actor, that he studied above all the character of the rôle he had to represent; realized to himself the situations which it offered; and sought to bring not only his looks and gestures, but even the color of his voice into accordance therewith; and if this is all quite fine and good, in learning to carry a vocal part through effectively, still these rules and confessions do not reveal to us the inmost heart and kernel of dramatic singing. They only show how right Rossini was—Rossini, that completest, finest judge of all the qualities which go to make up genuine dramatic singing—when he advised the artist (at Paris in 1824) to go for at least a year to Italy, there to complete his vocal studies.*

Certainly a dramatic singer must regard himself as a singing actor and must strive to enter into the character of every rôle as deeply as possible; but the principal means, which stands at his command in such a representation, must always be the artistically cultivated voice; and that is what we find too often misunderstood and *Wild, to be sure, expresses himself as if Rossini's advice and that of the Direction of the Italian Opera in Paris only meant, that he should go to Italy in order to acquire a faultless pronunciation of the Italian language; but any one who knows enough to divest this passage of its euphuism, will surely construe it as we have done.

unappreciated in Germany, even by the very best stage singers. Even stars of the first magnitude, as respects beauty of organ, and perhaps also the gift for acting, evening a Milder-Hauptmann, a Bader, a Johanna Wagner and a Wild, are not to be compared to the highest artistic appearances in the Italian operatic firmament, to a Manuel Garcia (who was the first Don Juan in the world!) a Pisaroni, Malibran or Grisi, a David, Rubini, or Lablache; for these were not mere singing actors, but dramatic singers in the fullest meaning of the word; their art proceeded not from syllables and words, but from scales and sol-feggi. They before all things controlled the organ, upon which their calling for the opera was grounded, and through which they had alone the power to work effectively within its most essential element, the musical. For what does all his ever so natural and intelligent action avail the opera singer, when the inmost nature of his art demands as the first requisite, that he shall represent the special states of soul, which his part gives him to express, through his singing, through the deep and searching truthfulness of his tone and his delivery?

And in fact this prime condition has been the most completely fulfilled by all really great dramatic singers, whether of Italian or of German origin; for not the land begets the artist, but the method. It is not true that it is never within the power of a German throat to reach the perfect development of an Italian one, and that therefore the German singer must look to other means for producing an effect upon the stage, than those prescribed by the great Italian singing masters from the sixteenth to the nineteenth century. The truth is, rather, that only the old Italian school of singing, the school of a Pistocchi, a Bernacchi and a Porpora has been able to form really great dramatic singers; and that Italy has produced more distinguished singers than our northern home, because it naturally occurred more frequently in Italy that singers formed themselves upon this true method, derived from the very constitution of human nature, whereas Germany cannot boast of ever having discovered a distinctive school of singing, though she could at all times point to a great number of bad teachers. But those of our German singers who have gone through the true Italian school, our Raff, our Fischer, our SONTAG, these have without doubt been fully peers of their trans-Alpine colleagues; and so too, on the other hand, the many Italians now traversing Europe, whose culture rests upon the modern method branded by the great Catalani as the "piccola scuola," show that they lack the genuine art, whereby Pacchierotti at the age of fifty, and past the physical bloom of life, still knew how to enchant all by the nobility of his tone, and the searching power of his delivery.

But granting even that the old masters of dramatic singing in the high culture of their throats neglected the study of action somewhat, and only knew how to embody their parts song-wise upon the stage; granting that Wild was right in his prescription, first of all to study the character of a part and to postpone the scales to this study, then against this preconceived opinion (quite opposed to our own experiences of Grisi, of Lablache, &c.) we might offset the weighty testimony of Addison, who in the thirteenth number of his Spectator speaks as follows of the playing of the then famous contraltist Nicolini*: "I have often wished, that our great tragedians" (at this time Barton Booth and Colly Cibber still stood at the zenith of their fame, and Thomas Betterton had just closed his eyes, Garrick had not yet opened his) "would copy after this great master in action. Could they make the same use of their arms and legs, and inform their faces with as significant looks and passions, how glorious would an English tragedy appear with that action, which is capable of giving a dignity to the forced thoughts, cold conceits, and unnatural expressions of an Italian opera?"

Wild was certainly a remarkable talent in every respect, and even the weak sides of his character and of his artistic culture will never blot out the remembrance of the strong sides, which he has had opportunities frequent and brilliant enough of presenting to the public during a theatrical career of nearly forty years. Nature had equipped him with a wonderfully beautiful and powerful voice, and with sufficient powers of feeling and of understanding, to achieve something significant also as an actor. Moreover his organ possessed so much flexibility, that he could command many of the technical specialities of singing, such as a respectable coloratur, without much difficulty; but he was far from being a great and finished singer after the order of Farinelli, Caffarelli, Pacchiarotti, Taccinardi, &c.; otherwise he could not possibly have had the mauvais to boqueth this non-scale-singing as a particularly useful recipe to the singers of posterity.

*His real name was Niccolò Grimaldi, and he first appeared in London, in Handel's Rinaldo.

More Letters of Spohr.

[We are enabled to present our readers with some letters of Spohr, from London and Paris, written at the same period of his life, and addressed to his friend, Speyer. They have never been made public. Herr Speyer gave these interesting documents, unconditionally, to Herr A. Schindler, at the latter's reiterated request. We, in our turn, are indebted to Herr Schindler for them.—Land. Mus. World.]

I.

London, the 27th March, 1820.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—I have purposely deferred writing until now, in order that I might be able to tell you something both of my circumstances here, and of the way in which art is cultivated. At present, after a stay of four weeks, I am sufficiently at home to be able to pronounce a decision with certainty. If, however, my procrastination has been the cause of your being at all alarmed by a piece of information in a Paris paper, which reported we were lost during the passage from Calais to Dover, I should blame myself for not having at once let you know that—though obliged to venture on, crossing at the stormy period of the year, when, according to the returns of the Exchange, more than 150 ships were either lost or driven aground on the English coast—

we arrived safe and sound, and soon recovered from the fright and illness of the transit. In the first place, then, you must know that I have been most cordially received by all those persons to whom I brought letters of recommendation, as well as by all the artists on whom I have called, and that Herr Pensa is perfectly right in saying that the English are far more agreeable at home than on their travels abroad. In the next place, I must inform you that the way in which Art is cultivated here offers great contrasts (most glaringly prominent in large cities especially); that, side by side with much that is admirable and worthy of praise, you hear the most wretched performances, and that, in a word, it is very plain the English have no vocation and no true feeling for music. It is true that they cultivate music seriously, as they do everything, but it is soon evident, as in the case of English travellers, when visiting the treasures of Art and antiquities in Italy, that it is more a labor than a source of enjoyment for them, and that, at the conclusion of a concert, they may well be supposed to say, like their compatriots, after an Art-visit in Rome, "Thank heaven, this is all over!" The very fact of their being able to sit out and listen attentively to concerts, four, and frequently five, hours long, with only a short pause, proves that music does not force its way to their hearts, for, if it did, they would be exhausted before the end of the first half. The fact, too, that they listen with equal interest, on the same evening, to the most wretched compositions; that they can, in the same concert, hear a classical piece of music by Mozart, and encore a vulgar English street ballad, without the slightest artistic value, proves them to be utterly incapable of distinguishing good music from bad. Of course this is true only of the ordinary concert-goers, for there are naturally in a city with 1,200,000 inhabitants, some few who must be allowed to form honorable exceptions, and possess the power of judging matters of Art. That, being convinced of this, I should, three weeks ago, on my first appearance (when I played my scena at the first concert of the Philharmonic Society) have felt very nervous, I can only explain by the presence of Viotti and several other distinguished professionals, whose perhaps too great expectations I had to satisfy, and although they, as well as the general public, applauded me very much, I was but little satisfied with myself, and looked forward impatiently to my second appearance. A week ago, I played at the second concert of the Philharmonic Society, my "Quatuor brilliant" in E major, with such success that, from that time, I have enlisted every one in my favor. Last Wednesday, too, when I played for the third time, at Drury Lane Theatre, in what was called an oratorio, my "Pot-pourri," in B flat, I was greeted, both on my appearance, and when I had concluded the piece, with marks of approbation, such as seldom fall to the lot of a foreign artist. At the third concert of the Philharmonic Society, I am going to conduct, and shall make my debut with a new grand symphony in D minor, which I began immediately after our arrival, and finished a day or two ago. You may easily believe I am indescribably delighted that this work, which I conceived and brought forth in a spirit of the greatest enthusiasm, is to be performed for the first time by so magnificent and full a band as that of the Philharmonic Society (28 violins, 12 double basses, &c.), and in so noble a place as the New Argyl Rooms. I shall afterwards produce my old symphony, as well as my overtures, which have not yet been performed here.

Whether we shall make anything considerable here, the future will show; that it will be something, I know already, for I can calculate pretty nearly the expense of living. Up to the present time, we have engagements, either for us both, or for me alone, to play for remuneration at three concerts. I have also begun to give lessons. It is not certain whether or no the King will hear us; he has not yet returned to town. Our benefit-concert is fixed for the 8th June; I think it will be tolerably successful. I will write to you next time about the professionals here; a concert of Mad. Mara, who is seventy, was interesting. My change on the violin has turned out excellent; the violinists here are already beginning to imitate it.

LOUIS SPOHR.

II.

London, the 17th April, 1820.

MY DEAR FRIEND,—How can I thank you sufficiently for having, by a speedy refutation of the frightful report of our death, spared my parents and mother-in-law days of grief! But for your letter, what would they not have suffered until they had read the denial of the report in the newspapers? I shall never forget this friendly act of service on your part. We are receiving, from all parts of Germany, congratulations on our escape; these, as proofs of the interest taken in us by a great many good men, have caused us great joy. I cannot, however, even now, understand how the report of our having perished can have arisen, since we were in London long before the onburst of the storm, which destroyed so many vessels.

You received, no doubt, soon after you despatched your own, my first letter, in which I informed you of my appearance at the first two concerts of the Philharmonic Society. Since then, I have played three times in public, and conducted the third concert of the Philharmonic Society, rising, I am fully justified in asserting, more and more in the estimation of the public,—at least the latter have given me the most unmistakable proofs of this at each successive appearance. In the first place, I played in a so-called oratorio at Drury Lane Theatre, my pot-pourri in B flat major, then, at the last Dilettante Concert at the London Tavern, in the City, a sonata with my wife, and, in the second part, my scena; and, lastly, at the so-called Vocal Concert, in a very fine room in Hanover Square, a new concerto in A major, which was especially successful. My wife, who on her first appearance here, where there are so many good masters of the harp, quite astonished and put me to the blush, for I was much more timid than she, created a deep sensation by the originality of her grand play and was highly praised by all the professionals that evening. That this success of our efforts as artists greatly enlivens our sojourn here, you may easily imagine.

The greatest pleasure was, however, that caused by the reception of my new symphony. Previously to my arrival in London, not one of my orchestral compositions had ever been given, either at any of the Philharmonic, nor, as far as I am aware, at any other concert; and I looked forward anxiously for an opportunity of enabling professionals and amateurs to hear some of them. This opportunity presented itself. Among other very sensible regulations there is one to the effect that, during the series of concerts, the members shall execute, on two evenings, before a small and select audience of professionals and amateurs, only compositions (mostly symphonies and overtures) with which they are unacquainted, and decide, by the applause of those present, whether the pieces thus played are or are not worthy of being played publicly at one of the subsequent concerts. At an ordeal of this kind, I gave them my published symphony and two of my overtures, that from Abramo and the new one. The enthusiastic applause with which these were distinguished (it is true they had to contend with only very weak productions—a symphony by Soliva, the composer of the opera La Testa di Bronzo, and another, still weaker, by a native composer) impelled the directors to ask me to have the published symphony performed at the next concert. This, however, I declined, telling them I had intended for my debut as a composer a new symphony, written here in London. My proposition was accepted, although the directors seemed to think the new symphony would scarcely please so much as the old one did. But they changed their opinion, even on the first hearing of the piece at rehearsal. The band, whose good-will I had already gained, by small acts of attention and politeness, at the performance of my other things, exerted themselves to the utmost to execute the symphony in a way that would meet with my approval. They were accustomed more, also, to my mode of conducting (for I had been called on to conduct at the trial of the new compositions a week previously), and found this a great help, so that not only my symphony, but all the other pieces produced at this concert (the symphony in C with fugue, by Mozart, and the overtures to Fidelio and Medea) went with much more precision than usual.

The manner of conducting at the theatres and concerts here is the most preposterous which can be imagined. With two conductors figuring away, there is really not even one. He who is styled the conductor, in the bills, sits at the piano and plays from the score, but neither marks time nor gives the tempi; this the leader, or first violinist, ought to do. As he has, however, merely a violin part before him, he cannot help the orchestra, and, therefore, contents himself with playing away his own part, and allowing the orchestra to get on in the best way they can. Artists here had perceived the defect of such an arrangement, and the impossibility of an orchestra of fifty or sixty persons ever working well together with it, before I spoke to them on the subject; but they do not dare to make an alteration, because what is once established is regarded as sacred and inviolable, for, after all, with all his political freedom, an Englishman is the most abject slave of etiquette. I conducted, however, at rehearsal, in my old and usual manner, from the score; and in the evening, when the conductor is obliged to figure behind the piano, I knew the thing so by heart, that I was enabled to help the orchestra even without the score. My symphony was, consequently, executed with more precision and nicety than I could expect, after one rehearsal, and that rather a hurried one, and it is to this, no doubt, that I am indebted for the fact that it was received by the public with greater enthusiasm than any other orchestral composition during my stay here. The minuet or scherzo was encored, and applauded after its repetition even more than before. This successful result is doubly gratifying, because it encourages me to hope that I have not yet gone back as a composer; for I dare not trust unconditionally my own opinion, according to which this symphony is the best thing I have done in the way of orchestral music, partly because one is always fondest of one's youngest children, and partly because a man is only too unwilling to confess to himself that the creative power of his youth is on the decline.

Of the other concerts and musical performances we have attended, I cannot say much. The Italian Opera is, at present, altogether bad. We were so fearfully bored there, that, till now, we have been unable to make up our minds to go there a second time. Among the singers, there was not a single one who distinguished himself. The band, conducted in the mode I have just described, is continually wavering, and you fear that it will break down every instant. The choruses are beneath criticism. Of the benefit concerts, the most interesting (but not on account of its goodness) for us was that given, at the Opera House, by Mad. Mara, who is seventy years of age. She had, probably, hoped that curiosity to hear once again as a matron a singer who had been admired here in her prime, forty years ago, would attract the English in large numbers to the theatre, and that she would once more, in her old age, make a great hit; but she was woefully mistaken. The house was empty, and, on account of the enormous expenses (the theatre alone cost 100 guineas), she will, in all probability, be something out of pocket. If, without being compelled to take such a step by the greatest want, she has, by thus appearing in public, rendered herself ridiculous, and damaged her well-merited reputation, she richly deserves having been punished by the unfavorable result. If, however, it is true that, as it is here and there asserted, she lost all she possessed at the burning of Moscow, we must give all our sympathy to a poor old lady, who, at so advanced an age, has been compelled, for the sake of what she might get, to exhibit publicly the last remnant of her once so celebrated artistic capabilities. What was heard of the latter on the evening of the concert was far too little for any one to form a judgment of her, and she escaped, probably, general ridicule only by causing it to be announced before she appeared that she was extremely hoarse and must crave the kind indulgence of the audience. Not merely has she scarcely any voice left, but everything she attempted on this unfortunate evening was so uncertain, out of tune, and even in such bad taste, that it was impossible to gather from it any idea of her former excellence.

The same evening two or three other things happened which could occur only in England. One of Cramer's pupils was to play Mozart's grand pianoforte concerto, with trumpets, kettle-drums, and a numerous band; it turned out, however, that the piano was so high, that none of the wind instruments could be employed. In any other city such a concerto would have been previously rehearsed, and then the tuner would have been able, between the rehearsal and the performance, to tune the instrument properly; here, however, this had not been done. I expected that the concerto would be entirely omitted, and that the pianist would substitute something else without accompaniment; not a bit of it; this piece, to which the wind instruments are so essential, was played without them, the first oboe and first bassoon part being merely taken by a violin and a violoncello. How the tutti, especially, sounded in the large Opera House, you may imagine. I did not observe, however, that any one among the audience resented such a profanation of a magnificent masterpiece. Did they fancy, perhaps, it ought to be given in this way? Cramer, the violinist, performed in the second part a violin concerto by Martini, which is, at least, 120 years old! It would be difficult to find anything in the world more wearisome! How a man can play such a thing in public is to me incomprehensible. If it were not done here, I do not think it would be done anywhere else. As a remarkable fact in London, it was not, therefore, without interest for me; I again felt, too, very vividly, that though in Martini's time there was vocal music, instrumental music has, at any rate, been created during the last fifty or sixty years by our heroes at Vienna. On the other hand, I heard, with the greatest pleasure, glees at several concerts, the so-called glees or four-part songs for male voices, of the same period. These are the only specimens of national music the English possess.

There are some, especially by Webbe and Smith, which are really admirable. It is, by the way, impossible for such songs to be sung more perfectly than they are sung by Messrs. W. and C. Knyvett, Vaughan and Bellamy. I never before met with such perfect equality of voice and such perfectly correct intonation. People here, however, do not seem to attach much value to these compositions, and I have always been looked at with astonishment when speaking in terms of ecstacy about them. Here, as well as elsewhere, a cavatina by Rossini is more certain to set the hands of the audience in motion.

At one of the last vocal concerts a Te Deum, by Graun, was sung. Scarcely, however, had the singers sung the first words, after the very long prelude, before all present rose, and remained standing as long as the piece lasted. This struck me as doubly ridiculous: in the first place because the English thus only pay the Almighty the same outward respect they pay the king—for, as is well known, "God save the King" is always listened to standing, whether the king be present or not; and in the second, because they regard as though belonging to the ritual of the church a piece of concert-music, which, just like all the others, is merely performed to afford artistic enjoyment to those present, who behave as though they were at church. The seriousness and gravity with which Englishmen observe the frequently absurd rules of etiquette always strikes me as exceedingly comical, and I can scarcely reconcile such conduct with the intelligence and love of freedom which they boast.

I have received from Berlin the intelligence that the vacant post of Capellmeister will not be filled up. I have, therefore, no reason for keeping my opera back any longer, and beg you, therefore, to have the kindness to forward the score and libretto, together with the enclosed letter, by the first post, to Count Brühl.

During the magnificent spring weather, we have commenced making excursions in and about London, to see whatever is worth seeing. Last Sunday, for instance, we went to Richmond, which is situated 13 English miles off, in a perfect paradise. I cannot describe to you how delightful it was to see the first green and the first blossoms on the trees, and once again to breathe the pure air without the unsupportable coal smoke. But this merely caused our chests to suffer more acutely as we approached the large mass of stone. Town is growing more lively every day, and the winter season will now at length begin with the blossoms on the trees. Is it possible to meet with greater contradictions than in London?

In my next letter, I will describe to you how music is cultivated in most private houses. The mode in which this done is, also, quite English, although some houses form honorable exceptions to the rule. For instance, I played yesterday at the Duke of Hamilton's in the presence of the Duke of Sussex, and a very select assembly. I cannot sufficiently praise the stillness and attention of all present, during the music, nor their polite behavior towards us artists. The English, especially those who have travelled, can make themselves very charming.

Farewell. Most cordial remembrances to your family. Let us soon have the pleasure of receiving another letter from you. Ever yours,

LOUIS SPORR.

Madame Clara Novello.

(From the London Musical World.)

Among the lady vocalists whose talent has given lustre to their art, compelled the world to forget the fact of their English origin, and drawn forth the acknowledgment, not only of Continental Europe, but even of their native country, no one has reached a higher pinnacle of fame, and no one has more richly merited her elevation, than Madame Clara Novello. Memories that are still green, are stored with impressions of Paton; the generation is not extinct which treasures the recollection of Stephens and Maria Tree; we have men among us who remember with rapture the singing of Salmon and Dickens; and the career of the transcendent Billington was not beyond the experience of many who live to speak of her unparalleled excellence. The warmest enthusiast, however, for any or for all of these remarkable singers, has found it impossible not to admire, not to own, the rare powers of the lady who at this moment ranks in the highest class of European singers, and who is, in a few months, to be lost to us for ever. It is not so generally known as it will be universally regretted, that Madame Novello has determined to take a formal and final farewell of the public in November next; but it will readily be believed—such is this lady's known integrity—that, having so determined, she will abide by the resolution, and not (as has before now been the case with songstresses whose professional position should have held them above the capability of trifling with the world's esteem) make this occasion the first of a series of leave-takings. It will not be until the end of the London season that she can arrive in England; she will then sing, possibly for the Sacred Harmonic Society, perhaps at the Crystal Palace, certainly at the two provincial festivals, and in farewell concerts at the chief towns throughout the kingdom, and lastly, at one or two performances in the metropolis.

The very frequent fact of the value of a treasure being unestimated until after the treasure be lost, occurs not in the instance of Madame Novello; her importance to the station she holds, without a rival, is felt; and the unlikelihood is equally recognized of her having a successor who can satisfactorily replace her. Great as are the requisites for a dramatic singer, the excitement of the scene in which she appears, and the effect of the accessories by which she is surrounded, tend materially to draw forth her best qualities, and, at the same time, to influence her audience. It is a higher grade of artistry, that can enable a singer in an oratorio to control the sympathy of her hearers; since the sentiment she embodies is, for the most part, if more exalted, less generally congenial, and she has not the advantage of action to assist her to enforce its expression. Her greater difficulty than that of a theatrical prima donna, indeed, is twofold; first, in conceiving the deeper purpose of the work she has to perform; secondly, in impressing a less ready audience with her conception. Whatever have been Madame Novello's continental successes on the stage, it is in the more arduous duties of a singer of sacred music that she is best known in England, and it is in this capacity that her retirement will leave a blank which at present appears irreparable. Her grand style, her clear enunciation, and, above all, her exquisite voice, which is wonderful for its magnificent power as it is admirable for its delicious quality; these are the characteristics which every one recognizes in the lady of whom we speak; these are what endear her to the lovers of the highest class of vocal music, and these are what render her aid indispensable to our greatest performances. Who that has heard, in the execution of "God save the Queen," at the Crystal Palace, her beautiful, bright, clear, ringing notes, pealing above the massive sound produced by the thousands of choristers and instrumentalists, distinctly audible at the remote extremes of that colossal building—who that has heard, can recall the remembrance without as much amazement as pleasure? Who that has heard, in the Hymn of Praise, of Mendelssohn, her unparalleled delivery of the phrase, "The night is departing, departing," can ever believe that such perfect loveliness of sound, so beautiful in itself, and so true to the marvellous idea of the composer, can ever be realized by a successor? These are, perhaps, the two most remarkable instances of the display of Madame Novello's unique excellence; but no one who reads our remarks will be unable to swell the list by many examples he must have witnessed, which, surpassing everything else he has experienced, are yet surpassed by these two. It is as natural as it is common, to feel a strong interest in the personal career of an artist, who has professionally pleased us.

Clara Novello first saw the light—to use a figure of speech which is scarcely compatible with that optical delusion, whereof she must have proved the fallacy during her sojourn in the brightly sunny south—in Oxford-street, London; she saw, on that occasion, at least as much of the light as ever can penetrate our misty atmosphere, for the event occurred when the air is at its clearest, and the sun is at its brightest, a fortnight before midsummer, in the year 1818, upon the beaming 10th of June. Thus it will be seen, firstly, that she is a genuine Englishwoman; and that this much musically maligned land of fogs and consequent rheums, catarrh, and influenzas, has yet to boast, in her organ, of its power of producing voices of equal beauty to those raised and nurtured in the Land of Song. It will be seen, secondly, that she will leave forty-two years behind her, when she quits this busy scene of ever-renewed excitement for the private seclusion of her own homestead, having still a natural prospect of a very long term, for the enjoyment of that repose to which she retires by choice, not by compulsion, to give her family the benefit of her maturity.

The father of this esteemed songstress, Mr. VINCENT NOVELLO, was among the most highly respected musicians of his generation in this country. Why should we say was? The respect he first earned, some half a century since or more, is still due and still paid to him, though the advance of years now checks the active exercise of those talents which have called it forth. Mr. Vincent Novello is one of the most highly respected English musicians of the age in which he flourished, and he lives in the full enjoyment of his honors, and the proud witness of those won by his daughter. He lives, one of the last of those worthies who maintained the art in this country during the first half of the present century. Attwood, Crotch, the elder Horsley, the still older Callcott, S. Wesley, F. Cramer, and his far more famous brother, J. B. (famous for playing and teaching the pianoforte, for his eternal book of studies, and for the embellishment of the facia of a great house in Regent-street with his name), Bishop, Cooke, and how many more of his co-laborers, have passed from the field of their activity. Mr. Novello is the composer of many admired, chiefly vocal, compositions; the best known of which are those written for the service of the Roman church. His name is even more familiar as an editor, his arrangements of Haydn's and Mozart's Masses being in use in every Romanist chapel throughout the kingdom, and in every family circle in which, whether with a religious or an artistic feeling, this class of music is practised; and his arrangements of Handel's Oratorios being in circulation by thousands and thousands of copies. He was one of the original members of the Philharmonic Society, an institution which has had an influence above all value upon the progress of music in England; in the old days, before the functions, or even the title, of a conductor were known among us, he used, in turn with his compeers, to "preside" at the pianoforte (as the phrase went) in this society's concerts; in later times, when, through his exertions and the efforts of others, music had made some advance, he filled the more honorable because the more responsible, office of conductor. He has stood high among organists, having been engaged for very many years in this capacity, at one or other of the chief Romanist chapels in the metropolis, and having been one of those who filled the post at the great Westminster Festival of 1834. It is said that his father was an Italian who came to London in the capacity of cook to one of the royal family; that, having set many a dainty dish before the king, he retired from office into the privacy of a confectionery shop, gladdening there the taste of the British public by the fabrication of those same delicacies which had erewhile delighted those princes and rulers, and that, while he still practiced the art of pastry the infant Vincent emulated rather that of the blackbirds, which may or may not have been sung at the opening of the kingly pies his sire had been wont to amalgamate. It is said that in a back parlor of the confectionery, young Vincent used to practise the pianoforte, and that being overheard in his pursuit of intellectual sweets, through the world of physical sweets that surrounded him, by a frequenter of his sire's emporium of dainties, this man of twofold taste perceived his talent and encouraged it, became his patron, and furnished the means for his receiving the best musical education the country could afford. We vouch not for the truth of either of these sayings, though we know of no reason to disbelieve them; if they be true, however, so much more creditable are they, both to the talent and assiduity of Mr. Novello, to whom such faculties have been as wings, whereupon he has soared into a position of high consideration in an art which makes the greatest demands upon the intelligence of its votaries.

Mr. Novello threw in his profession, gained the esteem of men, married an English wife who was the very main-spring of the family activity, and begat sons and daughters. These, his progeny, are all, more or less, distinguished in one or more department of intellectual cultivation; Mr. J. A. NOVELLO is known as a vocalist, still more as the secretary of the society for abolishing taxes on knowledge, and most of all as the originator of the reduction of the price of musical publications; Mrs. COWDEN CLARKE is a novelist of deserved repute, and she has rendered a still greater service to literature, than by her clever original works, in the production of her elaborate "Concordance of Shakspeare"; Mrs. SERLE was a singer at the English Opera House, when it was directed by Mr. S. J. Arnold, and she closed her rising career, on her retirement into private life, when she married, but too early to prove to the world the extent of those abilities which her friends knew her to possess; Miss SABILLA NOVELLO made considerable progress as a vocalist; since she resigned which profession, she has been successfully occupied in translating theoretical works upon music; and, chief of her fraternity, Madame CLARA NOVELLO needs no comment of ours to prove her preëminence in the art she brightly adorns, and from the practice of which she is too soon to retire. Thus much for the parentage of our heroine, which proves her to be both of English and of musical origin, which shows her family to have risen by the merits of its members to that most honorable of all aristocracy, the nobility of their own creation; and which evidences the influence they must mutually have shared, whatever it may have been, the influence that prompted all of them to aspire, and neither of them without success.

It is quite beyond the limits of this notice to do justice to the circumstances and the surroundings which combined to develop the rare qualities, social and artistic, moral and intellectual, of the distinguished lady whose career we have undertaken, however imperfectly, to chronicle. We must briefly state then, as a point of far too great consideration to be disregarded, that her father's house was a gathering place of many of the most eminent literary men of that notable literary period in which her early years were passed, from whose sparkling, imaginative, and profound discourse her mind must have received impressions that may well have affected its entire constitution. Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Keats, the transcendent Shelley, were the more or less frequent guests of her paternal home, and others, not less renowned for wit and wisdom were members of the brilliant circle; Charles Lamb, for one, as unmusical as he was humorous, enjoyed the meetings, though he had no sense for the occasional music, which, to some, was their chief attraction, and, in his wonderful "Chapter on Ears," describing these very reunions, has everlastingly immortalized his own unimpressibility by that art, of whose effects poets as a race are, as they should be, always most susceptible. In avowing his own total unorganization for music, the exquisite Elia gives testimony to the character of the parties at the residence of Mr. Novello, (the N. of his irresistible essay to which we have alluded) and proves them to have been the occasion of such an intermixture of all that a lover of intellectual beauty would most wish to have witnessed, that we may well believe them to have constituted the most valuable school for our young artist's budding mind. Reared in an atmosphere of which poetry, and music, and love were the component gases—the hydrogen, oxygen, and carbon of the soul—should it be wondered that the powers of the future songstress were stimulated by the nourishment they inhaled, drawing thence a quickening impulse which may well have induced their utmost expansion?

WEIMAR.—The first performance of Lassen's new opera, Frauenlob, text by Pasqué, was postponed a week from Easter, on account of the illness of Frau von Milde. . . . Liszt has brought out a new orchestral work: "Mephisto-Walzer."

Musical Correspondence.

VIENNA, JAN. 15.—It was a great day for us all. The Kärnthnertheater orchestra had determined to give, under the conduct of Herr ECKERT, four great concerts in their own opera-house. These concerts were a little delayed by the illness of Herr JOSEF HELLMESBERGER, the orchestra director. (Your readers will pardon me, if I here explain once more that the leader of an orchestra, with opera, oratorio, or without any vocal music, is called in Germany Kapellmeister; the first violin player, who sees to the true pitch of the instruments, and in general looks after the orchestra, is called Concert-meister or orchestra-director.)

To return: the first Philharmonic concert, as they are called, was given this morning at half-past twelve o'clock, and we have had the good luck to get seats together in the fourth gallery, the best place. The stage was so arranged that the music would sound as well as possible, a closed chamber being formed with scenes. Punctually at half-past twelve the musicians appeared with Eckert, and were warmly greeted by the audience, for this orchestra is a great favorite with the public. The instruments had all been tuned outside, and as the temperature of the theatre was pretty low, it was not necessary to tune again. The programme was:

Overture to "Anacreon".....	Cherubini.
Aria with orchestra, taken from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail".....	Mozart.
Fée Mab.....	Berlioz.
Concert Aria, with orchestra.....	Mendelssohn.
Seventh Symphony in A major.....	Beethoven.

The overture was new to me, and pleased me very much; the working up of the themes and the instrumentation, as in all of Cherubini's music, is excellent, and proves his right again to rank with all but the greatest musicians. The overture is difficult, and in places demands really bravour in the violin players, but served merely to show the excellence of the orchestra, for it was played with perfect precision, and with great understanding and fire. One saw in five minutes that the men all knew each other entirely, and were all playing with their whole souls. It was first-rate, and the applause rewarded them fully. ANDER, the first tenor of the opera, sang the Mozart Aria very well; his strong point is (thank Heaven!) in his head and heart and not in his voice, which is losing with his increase of years; he is a rare singer indeed. Next came Hector Berlioz's Fée Mab; one cannot call it a musical composition; it is the effect produced by very remarkable and very ingenious instrumentation. This effect is extremely interesting and striking; very characteristic and at no time unpleasant; one feels transported into some fairy region, just as Berlioz desires.

The Mendelssohn Aria is brilliant and perhaps beautiful; I did not particularly like it. The Frau DUSTMANN sang it very well, and the accompaniment was as good as in the former pieces. There are very few good concert-arias; indeed it is very hard to compose them, for they must have real worth and beauty, and yet much attention must be given to effect, and much allowance be made for the singer, that he or she may show what the human voice can accomplish. Mendelssohn's music is often a little cold, and it is a hard trial to place him between Mozart, Cherubini and Beethoven.

At last, to crown all, came the great symphony. After all, when I think about it, there is not much to say; for probably your readers know the symphony quite as well as the writer of this letter. May they hear it as splendidly played as we did then and there! It was as if the orchestra had still kept their talents back in order to show how well they could play. Eckert is often, and not always unrightfully, charged with taking the time too quickly, but this day he did not. All played like one man, or more properly like many men with one soul. The shading of the whole was beautiful, the precision perfect, and the real, deep-seated glow without which Beethoven cannot possibly be rendered, was there and was felt in all its intensity. Of course one or two movements were demanded for repetition, as all were very warmly applauded, but Eckert had the good sense to keep on without delay of any kind. The orchestra properly played of itself when not accompanying a singer; for pages Eckert neither beat time nor did he give a sign of any kind to the instruments, which enter and cease here and there. This is as it should be, for an intelligent and well-trained orchestra of real musicians do not need a human pendulum in constant movement before them.

At the end of the concert, as at the end of every orchestral number, the whole orchestra bowed in return for the applause; it was fitting that they should. But one opinion was, as far as I know, expressed of the whole performance; every one was delighted, even to a musician-friend of mine who is constantly finding fault with Vienna and everything in it, especially the artists. It was the best playing that has ever met my ears; of the programme you can judge for yourself.

APRIL 13.—The above was left unfinished, from want of eyes and time to complete it. We have now heard the other three Philharmonic concerts, and a fifth which has been added to them.

In the second concert was given:

Symphony in D minor.....	Schumann.
Walpurgisnacht, for solo singers, chorus and orchestra.....	Mendelssohn.

In the third concert:

Overture to Coriolanus.....	Beethoven.
Overture, Scherzo and Finale.....	Schumann.
Symphony in A major.....	Mendelssohn.

with an aria from the Vestale by Spontini, sung by Frau Czillag, and a quintet from Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," sung by Frau Czillag, Fräulein Krauss, and Herren Walter (tenor), Hrabanek, and Mayerhofer, (basses) all from the opera.

In the fourth concert:

"Israel in Egypt".....	Mendel.
------------------------	---------

The solo parts were sung by the opera singers, Frauen Dustmann and Czillag, and Herren Ander, (tenor) and Schmid (bass); the last was the only singer really good.

The second and third concerts were as perfect as the first; the fourth, from want of time and voices on the part of the Sing-Akademie, was not so good. The opera-house is very badly built for hearing, and in addition the position of the chorus was from force of circumstances poor. Everything went well enough, but the spirit of the thing was not equal to that of the other concerts.

The fifth concert, given on Easter Monday, was wonderfully good and successful again. The programme:

Overture to "King Stephen" in E flat major.....	Beethoven.
Concerto for the piano, with orchestral accompaniment.....	Schumann.
played by Mad. Clara Schumann.....	Schumann.
Aria, sung by Ander, opera singer, first tenor in Vienna.....	Stradella.
Symphony in A minor.....	Mendelssohn.

The overture, though not so great as some of Beethoven's, is still extremely pleasing. Madame Schumann played her husband's only Concerto as well as it deserved, which is saying a great deal; she is a great favorite in Vienna, as she deserves to be.

The aria was well enough sung, and has the same religious tone as all of Stradella's music. The symphony is too well known in Boston to allow of any comments. Suffice it to say, that it was played with a fire and expression and taste not easily found again. Eckert was for a long time a pupil of Mendelssohn, and, thorough musician as he is, was well qualified to direct it. The rehearsals were very carefully held, and led to a perfect concert. The piano of the orchestra was beautiful, and was, as is needful, often and much used. The great work was poured forth to an enthusiastic audience. Movement after movement was warmly welcomed; the scherzo, so deservedly popular, was more bewitching than ever; the andante, which is usual given in a sentimental tone, was played in an earnest and manly manner; the finale was triumphant enough for any one, and lastly the coda was splendid. The four horn players blew so fully and strongly, that I sprang to my feet in order to see if they were crazy or were reinforced by four more. It was the last great concert of the season. May every year end as well here! The members of the orchestra presented to Eckert a memorial as a token of their respect and thanks for his unwearied pains and zeal in their service. Next year the orchestra will give ten concerts, and thus enrich themselves a little, and give great pleasure to the music-loving public of Vienna. J. H.

VIENNA, APRIL 21.—Since my last the Italian opera company, promised us by MATTEO SALVI, a music-teacher, (is he not the tenor of former days in America?) has made its appearance. As before mentioned, the Italian season of three months in the Imperial opera-house, which has been customary for many years, was in the fall given up in order (as we hear) to save expense. When this became known, Salvi, who has established a large singing school here, applied for leave and assistance to collect an Italian company. He got all that he wished: the Theatre an der Wien, which is the largest and handsomest in Vienna, was taken, and the boxes subscribed for during a season of forty nights. The Emperor also granted a subsidy. Thus protected from great loss, Salvi engaged the best singers, male and female, that he could. On Monday, the ninth of April, was the season to have begun; but instead of the expected play-bills on the walls of the houses, we saw, the day before, the unwelcome notice that Signora Charton-Demeur and Signora La Grua were unwell, and that Signora Lafon was ill. No one wondered, for we have all been suffering for six weeks from colds and sore throats in consequence of this disagreeable spring weather. However, in a few days "The Barber" was given; Signora Charton de-lighted her audience, as she has done for years in Vienna, and the other characters were fairly enough given, it is said, excepting the count's. An unfortunate man, named Ballorini, undertook this part, but was so hoarse (doubtless from a cold too) that many people left the theatre in disgust. It was a bad beginning.

The third day, Norma, with Signora LA GRUA, BIANCHI as Pollione, and BENEDETTI as Orovoso, was advertised. Signora La Grua was some years since engaged at the Imperial Opera here, and had left behind her, especially with the musicians, a good reputation, as singer, as actress and as a woman. The musicians are hard to please, for they see through the sham and tricks of the stage, and know the possibilities of the different parts; so I expected a great deal from Signora Emma La Grua.

Everything was favorable. The "Theater an der Wien" is capitally built as regards hearing. The orchestra was fair, the chorus fresh and pretty well trained (the chorus is made up of Salvi's scholars from his academy). Benedetti appeared and made a favorable impression in the first five minutes by means of a sonorous voice. Then came Pollione, and though he is not a born tenor, he still sang his first scene well enough. One mistake he did commit; as he first appeared, he had a full black beard of imposing dimensions, but on returning from a little walk to the back of the stage, our Roman consul showed much more of his face; his cheeks and throat had freed themselves totally of their covering. It was laughable enough. In a minute however came the Druids, male and female, and we put up our glasses to examine the latter half of the chorus, for it is rare to find fresh, pretty faces among these accompaniments of the opera. Some of them were pretty enough. Then came Norma, and the first real applause of the season was heard from the whole as a welcome to the old favorite. And, she instead of the usual rush to the footlights with deep courtesies and sweet smiles, simply bowed her head in acknowledgment.

It is useless for me to go through the opera, for every one has heard it many times, and almost every one thinks, as I did, that come what may, there's nothing to interest an audience in it, more especially an audience to whom Grisi has sung this part. A moment showed the exterior of the Norma. She is a little above middle height, gracefully made, a head placed beautifully on her shoulders, a lofty gait, a dark complexion with like hair and sad brown eyes full of meaning, a handsome nose and a slight moustache. She is, if I mistake not, of Jewish extraction, and bears the marks as Rachel did, only she is of a darker hue and has much more beauty. Her voice is properly a mezzo-soprano, of beautiful quality, but not strong. By means of careful study she has managed to reach very high tones with ease, as any one knowing Norma must see.

Her singing of the Costa Diva was wonderful, mostly piano; and such a piano! so clear, so low, so true. She was a little hoarse, but it made little difference. Her scales, her ornaments, her singing seemed a matter of course, and her acting equally so. All came of itself. The opera went on; the Adalgisa appeared, displayed an excellent, strong, well-trained voice, looked like a "Bohemian cook," as a friend said to me (for Bohemian read Irish), without making any particular impression good or bad. The Norma was the sole figure of the evening, and she was wonderful. One thing after another proved her incontestable right to the highest rank among singers and actresses.

One of her earliest admirers, a young musician in the Imperial Opera orchestra, said to me: "How she came by this contempt for the notes which she has to sing, I cannot understand!" She sings the part as a whole, and as to paying the slightest attention to the ornaments and scales of one brilliant aria, to the right expression of another, in short to any portion of the mechanical, or even the intellectual part of her character, it never occurs to her. Her movements are perfectly graceful, and her acting is really second to that of no one unless of Rachel. Indeed it were not possible to play Norma better than she did—give her a greater part, and she might equal Rachel.

To compare Grisi with La Grua is useless—the former is a child to the latter. In cultivation of voice, I have never heard an approach to her. Not every singer, but every good singer has a firte, a mezzo-piano, a piano, a trill, and execution graceful and distinct; but La Grua has many shades of each. Her voice has a thousand different tones and expressions, just as the voice of Rachel had. Her contempt was not expressed by the curling lip; every girl can do that. Her love was not given by a shriek or even by a loud tone. It burst forth from within, and glowed fearfully. One saw how a real strong woman might and could love; only now and then do we have a chance to see so deep into the secrets of the human heart. It made me warm and cold in the same moment, for there is something fearful in such feelings. Let one but consider the terrible void of a heart rendered desolate as is the heart of Norma, by the desertion of Pollione, and it is impossible not to shudder. The audience burst forth in unpremeditated applause every moment, but our "Norma" took no notice of it; she, acting and singing thus, could not disturb the illusion by any acknowledgment of approbation from our hands; indeed it was a mere relief to our overwrought feelings. In her duets we distinguished so easily her voice not by its strength, but by its size and character. You will hardly understand me perhaps; her voice is a large, broad voice, and in the middle regions is strong, but not throughout. It does not compare in strength with many voices here in Vienna, and yet it always gives me the feeling of size, breadth, fullness.

Fran Czillag, Fräulein Tietjens, Fran Bürde-Ney, and many other singers have far more voice from nature than Signora Emma La Grua, but no one of them has known how to develop it as the latter, and no one of them, nor any singer ever heard by me, has learned to sing so wonderfully as she.

In the third act we saw that the poor thing was suffering from increased hoarseness, and yet her management of her voice under these circumstances only showed her wonderful art. If you remember the part well, you have not forgotten that trying passages are constantly occurring in it; but I could hardly find them that evening. In the last act, from the moment when she appeared standing by the gong until the fatal veil was thrown over her, she again enchained her audience. It was splendid to see her stir up the Druids in the chorus where they demand a sacrifice. This chorus was demanded again, and it was worth noticing how she waved the priests and priestesses, (they did not know whether to sing it again or not) into a circle again. Her entire quietness and self-command on the stage is astonishing. Altogether her appearance was to me an epoch in my musical and theatrical experience. More, much more. No doubt many have felt, behind great delight at the singing and playing of any considerable and noted artist, an atom of dissatisfaction at this or that little thing. Many must have had the thought, doubtless, as I did on seeing Rachel. "I knew that was possible, and at last I have it before me. I knew that a woman could be so terrible, could burn so, could be so splendid, and more than all could be charming and fascinating; but no one of them will let her nature forth so that I can see it. All other acting is all very nice, and agreeable enough, but it is nonsense compared with this reality." Entire satisfaction, stilling of the old longing, was the result. And even so is Signora La Grua. Other singers have here and there given me an insight into the possibility of being or becoming what La Grua is, and none of them more than our much prized darling, Signora Bosio. She was a singer by the grace of God; most are singers, male and female, by accident—a fine voice, a handsome face or figure, a little poetic feeling, and the like.

I went the next evening but one again to hear Norma, and watch even more carefully the whole performance. Signora La Grua was plainly ill, and coughed continually throughout the evening, but she was as enchanting, as wonderful as ever. She was indeed "Norma." Only one saw that "Norma" was suffering from vile winds, rain and cold; as all Vienna was.

Signorina La Grua is a native of Dresden, is therefore a German and not an Italian singer. As before said, she was engaged here some years since in the Kärnthnertheater; the musicians say that her Fidelio and Donna Anna in Don Juan were wonderful. She has been some years in Rio Janeiro, and returned about a year ago, since which she has sung in St. Petersburg, and, I believe, in Berlin. Next week we are to see her as Lucrezia Borgia.

Signora Lafon, who was here last year, and became a great favorite, is ill, and we fear not likely to sing this year. It is most unlucky for us. Frau Czillag is singing in Covent Garden, London.

NEW YORK, MAY 22. — The long opera struggle has proved a pecuniary loss to both houses, though it is supposed that Maretzek lost the most; for, though he had some good houses, as a general thing the attendance was very small, and this notwithstanding the production of new operas and the brilliant successes of FABBRI. This admirable singer is achieving a very great popularity, and seems to improve both in the finish and vigor of her performance. Maretzek has brought out Verdi's Nabucco in excellent style and with more than ordinary care. It has pleased immensely, and, though not superior to Ernani, must hold a high place among Verdi's works. Only, it has the fault—an unusual one with the skillful composer—that it is not worked up to a good climax; the last act is the weakest and the first, the best. Then there is, strange to say, no tenor part in it, or not enough to speak of, for the tenor has only about ten bars of solo and takes part in two or three concerted pieces. MIRANDOLA, a good basso, with a pleasant, musical voice, though not very powerful, has been brought to the surface by this opera. Where he came from, or who he is, nobody knows, but he turns out to be a good, true singer, and acts with dignity. Maretzek still continues his season indefinitely and promises to produce I Masnadieri, written by Verdi for Jenny Lind (?), and Il Bravo, by Mercadante. ERRANI, the tenor, will appear, and there are a number of new singers engaged; though, like Fabbri, they are names that have never been heard of here before. May they turn out to be such consummate artists!

Signora CORRESI has taken the Academy of Music and expects to open shortly with some new operas, including the Madra of Pacini, and Gemma di Vergy of Donizetti. MUSIANI, the tenor of whom Havana fame speaks highly, will be one of the chief attractions of the company.

GAZZANIGA leaves here this week for Boston, whence she will sail in the Europa for Liverpool with her sister. She has been bidding us farewell for several years.

ADELINA SPERANZA is the unfortunate young prima donna imported by Maretzek, and the same who failed on her debut in Traviata. It appears she was sick, and a number of artists have offered her a complimentary benefit; but as if to insure a losing affair they select the hacknied opera of Trovatore, to be played by GAZZANIGA, WISSLER, TAMARO and DUBREUIL, a cast, with the exception of the prima donna, much inferior to what is usually offered to the public. If the benefit turn out a substantial one, it will not be owing to the attractions of the programme.

The Harmonic Society has been rehearsing Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen," and next week expect to perform it in public. TROVATORE.

NEW YORK, MAY 16.—On Saturday MASON and THOMAS gave their fourth and last Soirée, with a very short, but choice programme. There were but two concerted pieces and two solos. The former were a lovely quartet by Haydn, op. 64, in D, and one of Beethoven's last masterpieces, the quartet, op. 132. Besides these, Mr. Mason played the Sonata Appassionata of the last-named composer, and Mr. Thomas a Reverie and Caprice of Berlioz. It is a great rarity to hear so much good chamber music in one evening, and to hear it done justice to in such a degree as on this occasion. The contrast between the compositions of each kind, too, was very striking. Two different worlds are represented in Haydn and Beethoven in his latest works—each in its way so beautiful—while the wonderful, ever-glorious Sonata, as compared to the weird and rather far-fetched, though still interesting fancies of Berlioz, set at rest all doubts as to the real "Music of the Future." With this Soirée we bade good-bye to this association of artists, to whom we owe so much enjoyment; but only, we hope, to give them a hearty welcome again next winter.

MAY 22.—An interesting novelty was held out to the musical public last Saturday evening, in the shape of HILLER's new oratorio, "Saul," sung by the German Liederkrantz at the Academy of Music. It proved a success in every way. The house was full, the solo parts were well sustained, and the choruses uncommonly good. The principal solo parts were Saul (Mr. WEINLICH), David (Sig. STIGELLI), Michal, (Mme. ZIMMERMANN), and Samuel (Mr. URCHS). Mr. Weinlich had taken the part of Saul at very short notice, instead of Mr. Philip Mayer, who was too ill to sing. It is a difficult and elaborate part, and Mr. Weinlich deserves the highest credit for the manner in which he acquitted himself. The music of David is not only thoroughly representative of the character, but admirably adapted to the powers of Sig. Stigelli. I have never heard him appear to more advantage. A beautiful little Romanza, his first number, in which David longs for his paternal roof, his flocks, etc., won him the most rapturous applause, and an impetuous encore. The sweet singer, David, was never better represented. Madame Zimmermann (why not call herself by her husband's name, Mad. Anschütz,) surpassed herself, and surprised every one by her excellent interpretation of the part of Michal. This lady is so unassuming and keeps herself so much in the background, that her powers are little known. She has of late years been heard only in secondary parts, as, for instance, the second soprano in the ninth symphony, at the last performance of which, by the way, she was the only one of the quartet who did really well. The music of this oratorio is very beautiful,—lively and interesting throughout—but there is too much of it for one evening, and although pleasing and grateful to the ear, it has too much depth to be thoroughly judged of and analyzed at one hearing. After the trouble evidently taken by the Liederkrantz in practising it, we may hope for another performance, till which I defer all farther details.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 26, 1860.

ITALIAN OPERA AGAIN!—Yes, Trovatore. The anvils are to be beaten in the Boston Theatre (we beg pardon, the Academy of Music) on Monday night, and the gypsy, with the fire in her brain, reflected and foreshadowed gleam of those roastings alive, which give this tragic-comedy a hold upon the sympathies hardly inferior to the bloody Sayers and Heenan business, is to go singing round the stage her reeling, whirling, fire-waltz melodies. The favorite opera of the Verdi-ists has not, we presume, yet lost its popularity. The Trovatore fires still smoke and smoulder round the old stake; let the crowd gather, and there are magicians, (singers) who will blow them up again to bright and crackling flames. For Verdi's music many claim a politico-revolutionary meaning. Perchance the Trovatore hath a hidden sense; perchance the burning gypsy must be taken as a type, an emblem of the wrongs and the revenge of Italy:—is that the notion? The five letters, which compose the name of Verdi, have been found (wonderful hint of destiny!) to be just the initials of Vittore Emmanuele Re d'Italia. Can there be a doubt about it, that he is also the predestined man and that the Trovatore doth contain a charm, potent for the upheaval of dark old dynasties, as well as for the filling of opera manager's pockets? Yes, Verdi shall be Victor.

But to return to our Academy. It probably is not the charm of the opera, the music in itself, which is relied on to draw us within those walls next week, so much as it is the attraction of certain famous singers' names. Mme. CORRESI, "the great lyric tragedienne," who whilome appeared here in that dreary opera "The Martyrs," having returned from Havana, rented the Boston Academy for one week, for the benevolent "purpose of introducing to the American public the GREAT tenor, and only rival of Tamberlik, Signor MUSIANI, who has made an immense sensation during the late opera season in Havana and other theatres in Cuba." He will be the Troubadour on Monday, and no doubt there will be curiosity to hear him. The Signora Impresaria herself will be the Leonora. Our own ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, the best of the contralti, good in every thing, will do the gipsy part as finely as it can be done, so say all the lovers of the opera who have seen and heard her in it. Sig. AMODIO does the cruel business, in his old part of Count di Luna. By lucky chance, too, Mme. GAZZANIGA comes to Boston to take her departure for Europe in the steamer of next Wednesday, and she too will sing once, of course on Tuesday, kindly reserving for us the real farewell. Other singers posted on the bills are Sig. SUSINI, Sig. TAMARO, BARILI, &c., &c. Sig. MUZIO, the Verdi man, is the conductor, and Sig. DUBREUIL stage manager. What the pieces after Monday night will be is not yet (while we write) divulged; but we are assured that there shall be a change of opera every night.

A STRIKE FOR HIGHER MUSIC.—It seems that the magical five letters, V-e-r-d-i, are the watchword of insurrection and of popular rights not only in Italy and in politics. The spell has penetrated even to New England singing societies. The Norwich (Conn.) Courier, of May 17, devotes a leading editorial to the internal politics of a local society, called the Norwich Choral Union. An apple of discord has fallen among them—green apples, of the Verdi sort, have proved so appetizing to the many, that they have rebelled in favor of the forbidden fruit against their leader, who has used that autocratic power, with which it has been commonly found best to clothe all musical conductors, to the exclusion of the Verdi music in his selection of the pieces for practice. Accordingly after rehearsal one night, some one of the disaffected rose and proposed to rescind the rule whereby it was made the duty of the conductor "to select the music to be performed." The resolution succeeded, and the discomfited conductor at once resigned his place. What his peculiar tastes were in regard to schools and styles of music, or what more classical standards he upheld against the revolutionary tide of Verdi, we have been at a loss to gather from the following statement in the article referred to:

As an instance of the unsatisfactory working of a regulation which gives authority to the conductor, against which there is no appeal, we may state what has been told us by good authority. It seems that some of the choruses in Verdi's operas are favorites with the members of the Choral Union, and that the desire has been expressed for their rehearsal; but the conductor's opinion of the musical skill of the great composer being unfavorable, he has refused, point blank, to assign the wished for morceaux for rehearsal. His preference—as our public well know—and as we have ourselves once kindly, but plainly, hinted—has been for musical selections belonging to the general fugitive school, remarkable for nothing so much as their rather poor taste, and their adaptation to an association in an advanced state of "caducity"—(vide Worcester, Webster and Caleb Cushing,) which the Norwich Choral Union is not, and, by help of its energies, does not intend to be. We have good musicians in Norwich; refined judgments and tastes in music; excellent foundations on which to build up skill in execution; a little more ambition among our amateurs than what originates from merely primary school musical accomplishments; and these judgments, tastes and qualifications have some right to speak for themselves, and to be heard and respected. The public appreciation comes in to support this claim of right, and the public verdict is proverbially superior to the dictum of an individual—no matter how highly titled or qualified as a Mentor he may be, or assume to be.

There is democracy for you! But pray what is meant by "the general fugitive school" of music? Does it mean fugue music possibly, and was it an issue between classical and popular, the learned and the entertaining? Or does it mean light, transitory, fugitive in the same sense as when we speak of "fugitive poems," small ephemeral chirpings in the "poet's corner" of a newspaper? Perhaps "original" productions, of the conductor's own composing, "caducous" as the apple-blossoms of this blessed week of May, if not as fragrant. The majority, it appears, preferred green apples in hand to such mere blooming promise. But we are curious to know what was dismissed as "fugitive," when Verdi was selected as the type of what is solid and enduring.

A German paper gives the following characteristic answers, alleged to have been made by JENNY LIND, HENRIETTA SONTAG, and WILHELMINA SCHROEDER-DEVRIENT, when they were asked how they regarded the stage decorations in their performances. Jenny Lind said: "For me there exist no decorations; I do not even know to what end they are there. I step forth and am conscious of nothing but that I sing and must sing." Sontag answered: "In my performance I constantly regard the decorations as just what they are; but I strive, as discreetly and as zealously as possible, to use them for my artistic ends. I think and feel myself into them until they can inspire me in their turn, but never so that I become no longer conscious of their presence." Schroeder-Devrient answered: "That is all stuff and rubbish to be sure, but it has to become what I will. It must have life breathed into it, until it actually lives to me and becomes plastic. In the next moment again it is mere naked rubbish; but for the time being the trees have rustled for me, the flowers have scattered fragrance, the cascades have foamed, the stars have shone, the clouds have lightened and thundered. One to whom that cannot happen, cannot flash and thunder himself."

Mme. COLSON has been singing in New Orleans in Albert Grisar's French fairy opera, Les Amours du Diable (originally produced at the Theatre Lyrique, Paris, on the 13th of March, 1853, and at the Theatre d'Orleans, March 24, 1856.) Uriel, in this piece, is pronounced the best of this fascinating prima donna's parts; Colson has also appeared with Melchisedec in the one-act opera of Paër, Le Maître de Chapelle. Halévy's "Charles the VI." was given at the same theatre, with Melchisedec as the King, and Mlle. Geismar as Odette.

In Philadelphia, CARL HOHNSTOCK was assisted in his farewell concert, Thursday evening, by Mme. Johansson, the singer, Messrs. Wolfsohn and Warner pianist, and Carl Sentz, with his Germania orchestra increased to forty. The programme contained: the overture to Oberon; a song composed by Satter, Die Sommernachts Legende; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, played by the concert giver; Thalberg's Don Giovanni fantasia, played by Mr. Warner; a "Symphonic Fantasia" for grand orchestra, called Sur la Mer, composed by Hohnstock; Verdi's Bohémien, sung by Johansson; Liszt's Les Putineurs, from the Prophète, played by Wolfsohn; a violin solo, "Fantaisie héroïque sur la Marche de Ferdinand Cortez," composed and played by Hohnstock; a song by Schubert; and the "Fredonia Overture," by Hohnstock.

The marriage of Miss Balfe to Sir John Crampton, late English Minister at Washington, and now representing Queen Victoria at St. Petersburg, has excited some interest among Sir John's numerous acquaintances in the United States, and justifies the publication of the following bit of biography, copied from the Philadelphia Press:

Lady Crampton, who is a remarkably pretty woman, is twenty-three years old, having been born in the Rue de la Victoire, Paris, on the first of September, 1837. Her mother is a French prima donna (Mademoiselle Sona Rezer) who married Michael William Balfe, the well-known Irish composer and singer. His operas are well known everywhere, from "The Siege of Rochelle" and "The Bohemian Girl," down to "The Rose of Castille" and "Satanella," his latest productions. Even in childhood, Victoire Balfe showed great taste and feeling for music. Her voice, a pure soprano, was developed under the instruction of Emmanuel Garcia, and subsequently in Italy, under her father's care, with the aid of eminent masters. Her first appearance upon any stage was at the Italian Opera House, London, (Mr. Gye's) May 28, 1857, as Amina, in "La Sonnambula," in which opera she was supported by Madame Tagliafico, Signor Ronconi, and Signor Gardoni. Her success was great, and was real. Her voice proved to be a high soprano of great flexibility and even sweetness, ranging from low C to C in alt. She subsequently sang, the same year, at the opera in Turin, and, returning to England, in 1859, at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane Theatre, where one of her greatest hits was in the role of Arline, in "La Zingara," (her father's "Bohemian Girl" Italianized,) in which she gave wonderful effect to the air: "I Dreamed that I Dwelt in Marble Halls," or "In Una Reggia Splendida." Her voice, which is remarkably sweet, rather than powerful, was scarcely able to fill such a large theatre as that of Drury Lane. Last year the young lady accepted an engagement at the Opera in St. Petersburg, where the event has occurred which happily converts Victoire Balfe into Lady Crampton.

Music Abroad.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The first performance of Lucresia Borgia, on Friday night last week, although not belonging to the subscription, attracted a full attendance. Signor Everardi was the Duke; Signor Mongini, Gennaro; and Madame Borghi-Mamo, Maffeo Orsini. Mlle. Titieni's Lucresia was as grand as ever. Her "M'odi, m'odi," in the last act, as an example of brilliant vocalization, could hardly be surpassed. Lucresia Borgia was repeated on Thursday, this time Signor Viale representing the Duke.

On Saturday Almina was performed for the second time, and on Monday, for the third and last time—the occasion being Mlle. Piccolomini's farewell appearance. The theatre was not so crowded as might have been expected. Every place, however, was paid for, and the stalls, pit, amphitheatre, and gallery were filled.

Mlle. Piccolomini's career has been equally brilliant and unaccountable. Perhaps no artist with such slender means ever before achieved so great a reputation. That a good deal of the sensation must be attributed to her energy and command of expression will be admitted; but still more, we fancy, should be referred to the entire originality of her style. It was impossible to compare her with any one else, and thus she was exempt from a judicial process often dangerous to questionable reputations. Mlle. Piccolomini may not perhaps be greatly missed from the lyric boards; but years are likely to elapse before so decided a favorite with the general public is seen again.

Otello was given for the second time on Tuesday, and attracted a full attendance. Madame Borghi-Mamo sang even better than on the first night, and was again rapturously encored in "Aseissa à pied d'un salice." Signor Mongini (Otello) was as striking and vigorous as before, and the quick movement of the duet, "Non m'inganno," with Signor Everardi (Iago)—was encored with acclamations.—Mus. World, May 5.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Saturday, La Favorita was given for the second time. The performance offered no new feature, with the exception that Signor Mario sang with greater command of voice than on Tuesday.

On Tuesday, Fra Diavolo, presented for the first time since 1858, brought back Sig. Ronconi as Lord Allcash. The cast has undergone some changes, Mad. Miolan-Carvalho being substituted for Mad. Bosio in Zerlina, and Mlle. Corbari for Mlle. Marai in Lady Allcash. The other characters are sustained as before. While some parts of the opera went to perfection, we confess to have heard a better performance of Fra Diavolo at the Royal Italian Opera. Mad. Miolan-Carvalho feeling, perhaps, the responsibility of coming immediately after Mad. Bosio in one of that lamented singer's best parts, and consequently did not do her eminent talents justice.

Nevertheless, she evidenced her supremacy as a brava singer of the French school, and created the greatest sensation of the evening, in an interpolated air (Act II.) her execution of which for brilliancy and fluency could not be surpassed, and which obtained the only encore of the evening.

LIVERPOOL.—The fourth grand subscription concert of the Philharmonic Society, took place on Tuesday night. The great feature in the programme was Handel's Acis and Galatea, with Mozart's additional accompaniments. Madame Hayes took the part of Galatea; Mr. Perren that of Acis; Miss Fanny Huddart, Damon; and Mr. Weiss, Polyphemus. Mr. Weiss, in the recitative, "I rage, I melt, I burn," was most effective. Mr. Perren's "Love in her eyes sits playing," was tastefully sung. That charming air, "As when the dove," sung by Madame Hayes, was rendered in that rich, expressive style for which she is so remarkable. The instrumental music throughout the serenata was of the very best description, and nothing could be finer than the manner in which the accompaniments to Mozart's duet from Il Seraglio, (sung by Mr. Perren and Mr. Weiss) was performed by the orchestra. Miss Huddart, in Hullah's "Storm," received a well-deserved encore. Of Madame Hayes' singing of "The last rose of summer," it is needless to speak. A "fantasia violoncello," by Mr. Collins, was very much applauded. The manner in which the overture to Dinorah was performed testified to the ability of Mr. J. Z. Hermann as conductor.

DUBLIN.—The University Choral Society's Concert took place on the 17th April; the programme was made up of Jephtha, the last oratorio of Handel; Spohr's 84th Psalm (first time in Ireland); Mozart's motet "Ave verum corpus" (adapted to English words), and also his fugued chorus "Pignus futuræ" (from the Liturgy in B), together with the following pieces by Mendelssohn: "Da nobis pacem," "It is enough" (Elijah); "Be thou faithful" (St. Paul); three sacred songs with chorus, from the catalogue of Simrock, in Bonn, adapted to English words, by Mr. Broadley. Mr. Lockey was brought on to sing the tenor music; the soprano and bass were allotted to Miss Julia Cruise and Mr. R. Smith, of Dublin; Dr. Stewart conducted. Spohr's "Hymn to St. Cecilia," which was produced at the previous University Concert, and the 84th Psalm at the present one, were given with effect, and were hailed as great additions to the stock of available choral music.

Germany.

COBURG.—An extract from a letter in the Signale states: "The basso Carl Formes, who has lately given several performances in Gotha, was presented by the Duke with a fine building spot in our city, and it is supposed that the distinguished artist will take up his permanent abode here."

LEIPZIG.—The twenty subscription concerts at the Gewandhaus were completed on the 29th of March. The programme of the eighteenth contained Gade's fourth symphony (in B-flat); Recitative and Aria, with basset-horn obligato, from Mozart's Tito, sung by Frau Krebs-Michalesi, from the royal opera at Dresden; Fantasia Appassionata, by Vieuxtemps, played by Concert-meister R. Droyschok; a couple of Lieder, by Capellmeister Krebs; overture to Shakespeare's "King John," by Robert Radecke; aria from Semiramide; Capriccio for violin, by Riets, played by Droyschok; overture to Der Wasserträger, Cherubini. Radecke's overture is spoken of as musician-like, but not particularly rich in fancy. One critic wonders what it has to do with Shakespeare's tragedy, and says "the What must never be allowed to shield the How of a descriptive composition." It was not very warmly received; the composer himself conducted. The singer of the evening is highly praised, though she is said to have lost something of the freshness of her voice.... In the nineteenth concert the orchestra played Beethoven's eighth symphony, and Schumann's Manfred overture, with rare perfection. Herr and Frau Milde, from Weimar, sang airs from Nozze di Figaro and Fiddio, and a duet from Wagner's Fliegender Holländer, to great acceptance. Weber's Clarinet concerto was performed by Hr. Landgraf, and Mendelssohn's piano-forte concerto in D minor by Mr. John Francis Barnett, from London, just graduated from the Leipzig Conservatory, who won much credit.... The twentieth concert was the last appearance of Rietz as conductor, who takes the post of Kapellmeister at Dresden; and he was greeted with a Tusch from the orchestra, and a Hoch! from the audience; at the end, too, he was called out with enthusiasm and pelted with flowers.

The programme reflected the tastes of the retiring conductor; it was historical-classical, and true to the motto of the Gewandhaus hall: Res severa verum gaudium. The Neue Zeitschrift, while describing Rietz as a man of perfect musical culture, great energy, decided force of will, &c., complains of him as one-sided, prejudiced against the more modern efforts in musical production, and also as not governed by a very intelligent principle in making his historical selections. A Suite by Bach (played by David) was followed by "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (sung by Fräulein Ida Dünneemann.) Then came Gluck's overture to Iphigenia in Aulis; then a motet by Haydn; and a trio by Mozart, in G major, (piano, Fräulein Hauffe; violin, F. David; violoncello, J. Rietz). Beethoven's C minor symphony formed the second part.

The performances of church music by the boys at the Thomas Church,—on every Saturday and oftener—offer always opportunities of hearing motets, anthems, &c., by old and modern masters seldom heard elsewhere. For instance: March 17, 3½ P. M., Motet: "Praise the Lord," by Döles. March 24, Motet: Misericordias Domini, by Durante; Nimm von uns, Herr Gott, by Hauptmann; March 25: "Holy," by Hummel. March 31: Motet: Gross und die Wogen, by Richter; Seele, was betrübst du, Rietz; April 1, Passion Music by Handel. April 4, Final chorus from "The end of the righteous," by Schicht. April 5: "Behold the lamb of God," by Homilius. April 7: "Why do the heathen rage," Motet, by Mendelssohn; "Thanks to the Lord," Romberg. April 8, 8 A. M., Mass, by A. André; Te Deum, by A. Hasse. April 9: "Great is the Lord," hymn by Handel. On Good Friday, Bach's Passion music was performed.

DRESDEN.—In the concert on Palm Sunday, Beethoven's ninth symphony and Mozart's Requiem were performed. Julius Rietz entered upon his new kapellmeistership, as Reissiger's successor, by conducting the symphony. The Requiem was conducted by Kapellmeister Krebs.

Paris.

(From Correspondence of New Orleans Picayune, April 26.)

The theatres are all busy and driving good business. Will you let me begin my account of them by telling you of a projected marriage which is raising a great many smiles? The bridegroom is none other than your quondam acquaintance, Sir John F. Crampton, the bride Miss Balfe, the opera singer. He met her at St. Petersburg, where he represents Her Majesty, and where she is representing the Bohemian Girl, Lucy Ashton and other interesting and distressed creatures. Presto! he fell in love with her over head and ears and reason, and sues for her hand. Talk of Greek fire for its unextinguishable vehemence, but give me love: here's a fellow whom neither the freezer of diplomacy, nor the frost of years, nor the ice of the Arctic Circle have been able to make love proof. If that isn't as good as a play, write me down an ass. The Grand Opera is in some embarrassment from a serious indisposition of M<sup>me</sup>. Laurens-Guymard, which checkmates Pierre de Médicis, and came very near proving fatal to her. To do the best they could, they give us operatic roast beef, those old resisting pieces, which, let appetites be never so hungry, may be carved and carved without being cleared. What do you think of "Gul-laume Tell" being served up for the three hundred and ninety-fifth time, and "Robert le Diable," four hundred and seventy-five times? Deny their powers of resistance! We have Michet's appearances at the Grand Opera; he is a singer of excellent voice, but unpolished person, who is popular. Adolphe Adam discovered him and pushed him forward; since his death Michet has been pushing himself forward by most persevering study, and will go far before his voice breaks. They had the other morning at the Grand Opera, their semi annual dancing review. There are three or four dancing schools attached to the Grand Opera, where the prettiest girls to be found are gratuitously instructed in Terpsichorean tactics: every six months there is a review of them, and the most skillful or prettiest are promoted to the agility of ballet girls, and I have been a wretched tutor if I have not taught you by this time that feminine beauty behind footlights is fortune made. Judge of their emulation! It is a great favor to be allowed to witness these reviews, and one ardently sought, for beauty in stocking-net has irresistible attractions here. Few persons are allowed to see them; the most inveterate frequenters are old Dr. Veron, Mons. Fould, the Minister of State, Count de Morny, the Aguados, Count Walewski, &c. The judges were the other day Miles. Taglioni, Ferraris and Livry, the stage manager and ballet masters; these were on a platform. On one side of the room were the mothers of the girls, on the other side were the amateurs. It is always a pretty sight. The Grand Opera is busy getting La Muette de Portici ready for Michot to play Masaniello, and Semiramis for the two sisters Marchiso, who came near being swindled a few days ago. They received a letter through the post telling them unless they sent 2000f. to one Nesini, he would be at the pains to have them hissed down when they make their appearance. Doubtless thinking it a great hardship to be obliged to pay not only the regular claqueurs for applauding, but volunteer guerrillas for not hissing, they asked advice from the police, who bade them trouble themselves no more about the matter. The police wrote a letter to the address indicated by Nesini, and when he claimed the letter he was arrested. I am afraid he will scarcely have a chance to hiss soon in a theatre. If the police would only send to similar cells other people here who levy black mail on artists, we would require a new jail. Mlle. Taglioni, the Taglioni, has been appointed professor at the Conservatory: the ballet she has written for Mlle. Livry, will be brought out next winter. Faure and his wife, sometimes Mlle. Lefebvre, have quit the Opéra Comique, and, rumor says, France, too, for some time. He is in London, singing the Pardon de Ploërmel in Italian: he is to return here to sing in Boieldieu's Le Petit Chaperon Rouge, and then he is to go to St. Petersburg for years. His place of professor at the Conservatory has been given to a man named Paulin, an excellent musician and singer; but his voice is thin, while he is as thick as poor Dixon H. Lewis was; the consequence of which contrast was, whenever he appeared on the stage, the audience would roar with laughter to see such a tiny mouse of a voice issue from so large a mountain of flesh. He was obliged to abandon the stage for teaching, by which exercise of talents he has made a comfortable income. The walls are posted with Government notices, announcing the Grand Opera house is to be built opposite the rue de la Paix; the city of Paris is to build it, the Government giving it as the price of construction Louis Philippe's beautiful park of Monceaux, the loveliest park near Paris, the Bois de Boulogne not excepted; it is not much known, however, for even now there is no admission to it, save by ticket. A portion of the park will be sold for building lots, the remainder thrown open to the public. Workmen are busily engaged on two new theatres, situated Place du Châtelet; it will be eighteen months before they are finished. The Italian Opera draws near its close; the season has been extremely brilliant; they say the manager, who has lost one thousand dollars at least every year since he took it, clears this season the enormous sum of eight hundred dollars! I think you know he is a wealthy Cuban, who finds the best mode of enjoying his millions of dollars is to expend the interests and leisure it affords him in governing Italian singers of both sexes.

Mons. Carvalho, the manager of the Theatre Lyrique, has surrendered the reins to Mons. Charles Rety, after a dictatorship of four years, and with $30,000 debts and $80,000 costume, scenes, &c., for he has lavished money in "getting up" his pieces with prodigal hand. He has had one of the best companies in Paris, and sometimes gave us his wife, (Mlle. Miolan,) Mme. Ugalde and Mlle. Duprez, together in the same opera. He has given us some of the best music ever heard in Paris—Marriage de Figaro, Der Freyschütz, Oberon, Orpheus,—he discovered Mme. Marie Cabel's talents and placed Messrs. Gounod and Felicien David in a better light than we had seen them. The new director is a mere puppet in the hands of Prince Poniatowski, and a banker: the Prince manages the music—the banker, the money.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Lord is my shepherd. Quartet with solos. S. M. Downs. 25

Suitable for a closing piece in church. The piece has very telling solos for tenor and bass voices. It has been performed several times at the Old South church, and gave great satisfaction.

The snow is falling fast, love. Ballad. 25

'Twas one, 'twas two, 'twas three. Song. S. Lover. 25

You ask me to forget the spell. Ballad. Susini. 25

Be but the same. " G. Linley. 25

Shortly the evening is closing round me. Anne M. Kerr. 25

Little Mollie. Ballad. J. H. McNaughton. 25

A bouquet of eminently pleasing parlor-songs, strongly recommended to amateur singers in search of new vocal music of a simple kind.

The Rose. Song with Flute (or Violin) and Piano accompaniment. Gauz. 25

This will do admirably for a novelty in a concert room. Written for amateurs. Very pretty, although quite easy.

O, I'm a merry maiden. Alice Foster. 25

A gay, frolicsome strain, easy to remember, which will be very welcome to juvenile singers.

I've been dreaming. Song and Quartet. W. J. Wetmore. 25

Pleasures of Song. Song and Chorus. D. B. Worley. 25

Very popular with Quartet Clubs.

Instrumental Music.

Courtship (Die Werber) Waltzes. Four hands. Lanner. 75

A full and effective arrangement of a set of waltzes which are now considered almost classical. Four-hand playing must become more and more frequent, and hardly anything will please better than a set of these old German waltzes, played with spirit and energy.

Johanna's farewell. Albert Lindake. 25

A "Song without words," which bears for its motto the words addressed by Joan of Arc to her native hills previous to her departure upon her mission, in Schiller's drama of the same name. The music is highly expressive, full of sweet melancholy and tenderness. The piece will make a hit.

THE AMERICAN MUSICAL CLASS BOOK. Designed for Female Colleges, Institutes, Seminaries, and Normal and High Schools. Containing Elementary Instructions, Vocal Exercises and Solfeppios, and a Valuable Collection of Duets, Trios, and Concerted pieces. By T. Bissell. 50

Among the numerous works of the kind this new candidate for popular favor cannot fail of a prominence, since its peculiar features are such as will commend it at once to the patronage of those for whom it is chiefly intended. Its rudimentary lessons proceed with a regularity of precision that cannot fail to fix permanently on the mind of the pupil the essentials of success in future studies,—the exercises are in a form to attract the attention, and the selection of music is one of the best if not the superior of all similar collections. Principals of Educational Institutions, music teachers, and others interested in books of this class will find it advantageous to examine this volume.

The Shepherd's Song of Complaint.

(From the German of Goethe.)

On brow of yonder mountain
A thousand times I've stood,
On my crook so sadly leaning,
And gazed o'er field and wood.

I follow my flocks as they're grazing,
My dog he watches them well,
I come to the foot of the mountain,
Yet how, I hardly can tell.

And, strown with beautiful flowers,
The meadow before me lies;
I gather them all, without knowing
On whom to bestow the prize.

In rain, in storm, and in tempest,
I stand there under the tree,
But ah, 'tis all an illusion—
Yon door never opens for me!

Above the lowly cottage
A rainbow stands to-day—
Yet she, alas, has departed,
Has wandered far away.

Far over the land and farther,
E'en over the sea she's gone—
Pass on, ye sheep, pass onward,
Your shepherd is sad and lone.

Italian and German Singing.

Translated for this Journal from the Deutsche Musik-Zeitung of Vienna.

(Conclusion.)

Amongst all really great singers and teachers of singing there never could have been a doubt, that the study of the Scales, continued regularly through all phases of the artistic career, afforded the only means of developing and building up the voice for great performances, such as the stage requires; the only means by which the voice can acquire and permanently maintain all the qualities essential to the artistic tone. This study involves by no means the mere alphabet of singing, it extends to its highest reach of perfection. Only by this is it possible for the singer so to mould the natural rough ore of tone to his control, that both the speaking and the singing voice shall become independent of all accidental peculiarities and defects of the organism, and absolutely subservient to the proper ends of Art. Upon the Scales is based the production of a beautiful, large, noble tone; the equalizing of the registers; the mesa di voce and the Coloratura;—all things never found in full perfection in the cradle even of the most gifted natures. Only through the Scales is a singer in a state to use his instrument like a master and transmit the feeling that dwells in him to his hearers. Finally, by them alone is the natural formation of—what is so absolutely necessary to tenor voices—the Falsetto, with its peculiar carriage of the air, made possible; the Falsetto, which, properly developed, is so indispensable to the preservation of the chest voice, and which Wild first learned to use in the year 1825, through the instructions of Rossini. But how far from perfect this study had been with him, is proved by the remark he adds: that "in the use of the Falsetto he always had to seek a word which contained the e or i (Italian sound), and carefully avoid making the transition from the chest tones to the falsetto between immediately consecutive tones; but he contrived his ornaments so that they should end in falsetto after leaping over several tones." This frank confession would deserve all credit, had the autobiographer designed thereby to show the faultiness of his own culture and to warn others against like faults; but since he adds, that he writes down these communications upon the history of his vocal development "with especial reference to young and striving singers," as kindly counsels, "which they may profit by and be rewarded, like himself," it becomes too clear that he labored under a certain self-deception as to the degree of culture to which he had attained as a singer. That the practice of the Falsetto, as he says, unless it be undertaken with caution and under the guidance of an experienced teacher, may easily prove the ruin of an originally fine voice, certainly admits of no doubt; but it is equally certain, that he personally had acquired the artistic use of it only very imperfectly, and therefore does wrong to set up his own culture as a pattern to younger generations.

Every voice, the deep bass as well as the high soprano, has a falsetto register, which connects immediately with the highest chest tones; and nothing but the undeniable difficulty of rightly binding the two registers together has induced the false opinion, so deeply rooted in many so-called singing teachers, that the Falsetto cannot be developed in all organs. This opinion—if we may not refer to the example of the yodling natural singers of the Tyrol—is refuted by the single fact which C. G. Nehrlich makes prominent in his "Art of Singing" (2d edition, Leipzig, 1853, page 142), that all great singers formed in the classical school, of earlier and of later times, have possessed the Falsetto; the soprani, Mara and Catalani, as well as the alti, Pisaroni and Pauline Garcia; and Handel's best basso, Montagnana (who had all the tones from E in the great bass octave to the once-marked a in the treble in equal beauty), as well as Ludwig Fischer, Carl Stromeyer in Weimar and Louis Lablache*; not to speak of the great tenors, in whom the necessity of the falsetto culture is self-evident. The chief restriction put upon it by incompetent teachers is this: that, instead of allowing the use of the falsetto where it naturally comes in after the three tetrachords of the chest and the two middle registers, they are accustomed to force out a few more throaty tones with the same management of the breath as in the second middle register, which they call "forming the height of the pupil," but which in reality leads only to his ruin. Nehrlich is right then, when he says that "Nature produces nothing useless and superfluous, and that therefore the well formed falsetto in all classes of voices is the true means of preserving the highest chest tones to the latest years; because, according to natural laws, the working of organic bodies, as here in the production of tones, not only depends on the harmony of the organs themselves, but this harmony is a necessary furtherance of the whole, although in the natural state a product of the organic bodies; and if by the neglect of any part Nature is hindered in her legitimate requirements and conditions, the whole organism must suffer, as well as the result it is intended to produce."

From this we may easily conjecture to what Wild's inability to join the falsetto to his chest voice immediately, without leaping over an interval, was owing. Plainly he never in his life had sung the Scales sufficiently, or at least not in the right way; and if he was obliged to avoid the vowels a, o and u entirely in using the falsetto, then he has disregarded another principal rule in the Scale practice, namely this: that one must sing them not merely upon one, but upon all the vowels, at first upon a and e, and then upon the rest, with the help of the syllables in use among the French and the Italians, do (ut), re, mi, fa, sol, la, si.

I shall rejoice if these cursory remarks may find a place in the Deutsche Musik-Zeitung, which makes it the most essential problem in its programme, to further the grand mission of the German people in the realm of music in its widest sense. But to a worthy solution of this problem it belongs above all, that the attention of the nation so distinguished for universality, and so quick to assimilate all good things offered from abroad, free from all prejudice, should also be called to the shadowy sides of its musical capacity and culture, that is, to the very points where it may really learn from others. Think what we will of the Italian opera, one thing we must never forget: that in the art of singing we stand far behind the Italians, and that, not merely for the artistic rendering of an air of Verdi or of Donizetti, but also for the reproduction of our own masterworks, even to the fugues of Bach, we cannot dispense with that great, old Italian singing school, which nowadays becomes less and less understood, as the passages just cited from the biography of one of our country's greatest singers show too painfully.

The common assertion that the Italian school is only suited for soulless bravura pieces, but not for the feeling delivery of the deeper German music, is perfectly absurd; for that is just the chief advantage which the Italian singer enjoys over the German, that he, formed in his school, whether it be sustained or ornamented music, sings with far more soul than the latter, who so seldom sees not only that Scales and Solfeggi are a necessary evil for the technical formation of the voice, but, what is far more important, that they also serve the soul, since they first put into the student's hands, by the pure tuning of his instrument, the æsthetic means of expressing the ideal feelings which he would impart to his hearers. A singer, who ventures upon great dramatic parts, before he has been most thoroughly drilled in the A B C of the Scales, and has brought his voice completely under his control, without the addition of words, is like a child that would dance a ballet before it has learned to walk. Our theatres and concert halls are swarming with such ballet dancers; and so it is really no wonder, that Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti and Verdi, even in this our own land, so often carry off the victory in the opinion of the public over Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven and Weber. It is not alone the sensuous ear-tickling of the sweet Italian melody that causes a result so shaming to us. Hear a Lucrezia or Semiramis, a Barber or a Norma rendered by cold, stiff, perhaps naturally musical, but hardly half-formed German opera singers, and the effect, which this music produces on the masses, will really be no greater, than when the eternal masterworks of German art, a Don Juan or a Freyschütz come out upon the stage in equal imperfection. On the contrary, let even a Trovatore or a Rigoletto be produced by real singers, and by their side an Iphigenia by bunglers—and what wonder that the mass should feel itself more drawn by a poor music, which seems raised to finest effect by the art of the singers, than by a good music done to death by the unskilfulness of the performers! Is it then so hard to understand, that sterling music, which deals not merely with superficial forms and therefore falls not so easily into the ear, needs doubly accomplished singers to give it its legitimate and full effect? What German could ever have completely seized the wonder-world of Mozart's Don Juan, until it had been opened to him by Italian singers? Where have we had such an Ottavio, or Don Giovanni, or Leporello, as Rubini, Garcia and Lablache have shown us in their presentation and—their singing of these parts?

But we repeat it, not the land makes the singer, but the school; and our German singers therefore ought at last to begin once more to fashion themselves in the only saving Italian school, for the great tasks, which their immortal national composers have left them as a sacred heritage. So, and only so, will they be in a condition to compete with their Italian colleagues, by whom they are now everywhere beaten from the field; so may they surpass them as much as the works, which they have to interpret, are superior in value to the ordinary parade-horses of an Italian opera stage. But as matters now stand here in Germany, in regard to singing, this goal certainly lies very far from us, and we shall yet have to wander many a year to the new Babylon, to Carvalho's Théâtre Lyrique, to hear our own Mozart, Weber and even Gluck sung by Frenchmen, as we cannot hear them on our German stage.

The Right to Hear.

A good deal of talk, of one kind and another, bellicose, critical and philosophic, has arisen out of the rebuke administered, in no very gentle terms, by Baron Bramhall, a London judge, to a young English officer, for disturbing the audience during the performance of an opera, by loud talking. Commenting on this affair, our cotemporary of the Philadelphia Press, Dr. Shelton Mackenzie, has some remarks, which seem to us to be of such general applicability that we make no apology for concluding our chapter of chat with them, to day:

The practice of chattering at musical or dramatic performances is extremely irritating, uncourteous and ill bred. Every member of an audience is entitled to hear, and it is low breeding to prevent his enjoyment of this right. If people want to chatter, they should take a suitable time and place for performing that process. To have an under-current of small talk droning in your ears, before or behind you, at a theatre or opera house, distracting the attention and making you hear only one word or one note in ten, is an abomination which cannot be sufficiently reprehended, and the sufferer has a right, beyond all doubt, to speak to the offending parties, in a tone of grave remonstrance and quiet rebuke.

The late Duke of Cambridge—the dinner-eating Duke—was a constant and flagrant offender in this way. He had very little taste for music, and had a box at the opera, simply because it was the fashion. A great man was he for presiding at public dinners, at which he would eat as much as five and drink as much as ten ordinary people. Leaving the table, full of beef and flushed, but scarcely flurried, by an enormous quantity of wine, this Royal Duke—uncle to Queen Victoria—would drive to the opera, probably arriving during the last scene, and, wholly regardless of the performers, would call out to his friends, across the house, "Ah, Devonshire, glad to see you!" or "Cardigan, I shall breakfast with you to-morrow," and so on. Being a "Royal Highness," he was actually tolerated. One night, when Jenny Lind was performing the rôle of Amina, in "La Sonnambula," the old and portly Duke went on in this manner. Disturbed by his talk, the vocalist suddenly paused, and the Queen, who was present, stretched a little out of her box, to ascertain the cause.

Jenny Lind simply looked at the Duke's box, and the Queen turning round, followed her look, and saw the culprit, who was speaking loudly to some people in a neighboring box. The eyes of all the audience were directed, at once, to the Duke of Cambridge, who certainly then became fully aware that he was "spotted" by several hundred persons. He continued talking, however, as if to brave it out. A gentleman in the pit jumped up on his seat, and in a loud voice and in an earnest manner, called out: "Who disturbs the audience? Who but that old man with the star upon his breast? Do we pay him £40,000 a year to annoy the public in the opera house? Three groans for the Duke of Cambridge!" The call was unanimously complied with, every eye being fixed upon the portly prince, and at last he sneaked out of his box, followed by his wife and daughter, and not until then did Jenny Lind resume her singing. It was said that the Queen was greatly annoyed with her uncle's rudeness, and told him so. It is certain that, ever after, he avoided going to the opera, and behaved very well when compelled to attend.—N. O. Picayune.

Church Music.

The Republican has said a good deal first and last upon the subject of church music—much that the churches by their acts have shown that they do not agree with. More than six years ago we expressed the conviction that the country was not ready for congregational music. It was admitted that it was very fine in theory, but utterly impracticable in the present stage of popular musical culture in this country. We wish to recall attention to this point. With religious papers, and a general movement in the religious world to help the thing along, we believe there is less congregational singing to-day than there was two years ago, and we do not know of a congregation that practices it and is not sick of it. Rev. Mr. Parsons' church in this city tried it, with the organ and a precentor, and gave it up for a choir; so did the Unitarian society, after a longer experience; and the various congregations of the city are settling down upon the conviction that the best, and, in the long run, the cheapest, way for them is to have a small choir, the principal singers in which are paid. This is what the North church in this city has had for the last seven years. This is what the South church has had for two or more years, having made a thorough experiment with a large volunteer choir. This is what, after various experiments, the Olivet church has just adopted.

The people do not all understand the reason of the movement that has been so strenuously pushed forward for the adoption of congregational singing. They know very well that it has not originated with them, save in some instances, as a matter of economy.

The truth is that the whole fever has been worked up by book-makers. A set of hungry men, who have been accustomed to get out a book of church music every three years, found the market glutted, and wished to get a new market. Having worked for choirs all their lives, they became at once converted to the theory of congregational singing. All they had done thus far was a mistake. They published articles in the secular and religious papers, they delivered lectures, and they succeeded by various means in turning the minds of the churches in the direction they sought. Then they put out their books, and the market is now flooded with congregational tune-books—not because the churches called for them, but because it was for the interest of these men, as it was their regular business, to make books. Just as soon as the working of this comparatively new vein ceases to be profitable, it will be abandoned, and we shall find our enterprising friends, the book-makers, developing the popular mind in another direction.

There is a general idea among the churches that the music of a paid choir costs too much; that a congregation may as well pay their money, as a choir spend their time. A volunteer choir, with any ambition to sing creditably, assume a great burden. They assume, first, the burden of always being at church, whether they may be sick or well. They assume the expenditure of a great deal of time for rehearsals. They assume a thousand vexations. They expose themselves to the criticism of those who will not touch their burden with one of their fingers. Who blames free men and free women for refusing to become the slaves of others? We have known those who voluntarily carried the burden of the music of a church for many years, as a Christian duty, and we give them all honor; but we have no right to ask it of them—no more right, really, than to ask a minister to give us his time for nothing, "and find himself." It is very pretty for a congregation to gather and hear good singing, and not have it cost them anything; but the fact is, all good singing—all singing worthy of the house of God—costs somebody something—nay, costs somebody a good deal. Why should a choir bear the whole of this cost, and the congregation none of it?

Those who devote their lives to music are those best calculated to perform acceptably the music of the sanctuary. We should add to this class all who by the expenditure of abundant time and money have become excellent in this accomplishment. To the first of these, music is the instrument by which they win their livelihood; to the last, it has been a costly thing, and they deserve return. It is just as reasonable, and just as legitimate, for a man to sing God's praise for a living, as it is to preach God's truth or lead in any other department of Christian worship for a living; and a church or a parish which shrinks from assuming its part of the burden of church music, can only justify itself by the plea of poverty or constitutional meanness.

One reason for the difficulty which churches meet with in their music is the fact that it is intrusted to the hands of incompetent committees. We do not know why it is, but the music committee of a church almost invariably contains one man who cannot tell "Old Hundred" from "Yankee Doodle." If a parish can find a man who is utterly stupid and stolid—a man who has no music in his soul and none anywhere else,—they will be sure to put him upon the singing committee. There is nothing which assues feel themselves so competent to manage as church music. Such men and such committees are always disgusting singers, making trouble in choirs, introducing the most senseless changes, and raising a row generally. The best singers in a congregation make always the best and the only competent singing committees, and the further the number on such a committee is raised above one, the worse for all concerned.—Springfield Republican.

Mme. Borghi Mamo.

Madame Borghi-Mamo—or rather Mlle. Borghi—manifested at a very early age a genius for dramatic singing. She was not twelve years old, when, having taken her to a representation of Rossini's Tancredi, her parents were astonished on the following morning to hear her repeat all the most striking melodies from that opera, among which we may be sure the celebrated "Di tanti palpiti" was not forgotten. Nor did the little girl recollect the music alone. Every scene, with the dramatic action appropriate to each, had impressed itself upon her memory; and a few days after this visit to the Opera, which must be regarded as one of the most important events in Mlle. Borghi's life, her father and mother, returning home unexpectedly, found their drawing-room converted into a theatre, and their child declaiming and singing on that portion of it which represented the stage.

The youthful Adelaide's passion for the Opera was so evident, that her parents, who had no sort of liking for theatrical pursuits, resolved, if they could not restrain it, at least to do nothing in any way that could stimulate it. But Adelaide studied in secret, and, one happy day, succeeded in prevailing upon a friend to take her to the house of Rossini, where the great master heard her sing several of his compositions, himself accompanying her on the piano. The young artist—which by instinct and intelligence she already was—trembled with excitement, as she awaited the decision of the illustrious composer respecting her capabilities and chances of success in the career for which she felt so strong a vocation. Rossini did not keep her long in suspense, but embracing her affectionately, said with enthusiasm—"You will one day be a great singer!"

The Borghi family, however, seemed determined to prevent little Adelaide from following the path she had chosen. Rossini was informed of this, and consoled the interesting aspirant by explaining to her that her parents, when they became sensible of her great talent, would see the propriety of abandoning her resolution. They were more inflexible, however, than the maestro had supposed, and did their utmost to impede the child in what was really the fulfilment of her destiny.

Adelaide Borghi's passion for singing was so strong, and it was so obstinately thwarted by her father and mother, that the consequence was a nervous fever, beneath which the poor girl was near succumbing. In her delirium she constantly repeated the name of Rossini, and exclaimed, in accents of despair, that he had told her she never would be a great singer. Adelaide's interview with Rossini appears to have been kept a secret from her relations; but the doctor, finding that her brain was tormented with ideas which Rossini alone could dispel, called upon the composer, who lost no time in returning with him to his patient's bedside. There he repeated to her, again and again, that she would indeed be a great singer, and his assurances and general kindness had the effect of allaying the delirium of the sick child. Rossini then convinced the parents of the inutility, not to say cruelty, of ignoring—from a feeling which, however conscientious, was, after all but a prejudice—an inclination that was irresistible, and which, properly directed, might lead to the happiest results.

Thus the admirers of Borghi-Mamo owe a double debt of gratitude to Rossini: first, because it was in his operas that she learnt to sing; secondly, because, but for Rossini's personal influence and interference, she would probably never have lived to be, in his own words, "a great singer."

After opposing their daughter's wishes until it was unreasonable to do so any longer, Adelaide's father and mother showed their parental affection by carefully watching over her during the difficult period of her debut. She had been singing, however, only a few years when she lost them both, and she was already an orphan, then in Malta, where she had a three years' engagement to fulfil, when she accepted the hand of M. Mamo, a member of one of the most respectable families in the island. Madame Borghi-Mamo left the Malta Theatre, where she had very lucrative "appointments," for the Scala at Milan. Here she received a smaller salary, but at once established a reputation which has since become European.

For several years after her first appearance, Mlle. Borghi, naturally of a delicate, fragile organization, was so slender, being at the same time somewhat diminutive in stature, and her voice was so powerful, that she used to say of herself: "La Borghi is heard, but is not seen." Fortunately however, she is heard and seen too, for she is not only one of the most accomplished singers, but also one of the finest actresses on the lyric stage.—London Musical World.

Music for the Japanese.

An agent of the Opera, from New York, is at Washington, "arranging preliminaries," as one of the correspondents says, "with the Japanese, about the national music of that country."

As a grand musical entertainment will doubtless be part of the festivities that will brighten the visit of the Embassy to this city, it is important to know with what order of melody they are best pleased. They will, of course, appreciate the compliment of a performance of their home airs, although the soft strains are not well adapted to our instruments, and, as far as our information goes, no one of our resident musicians is possessed of a samsie or a tom-tom. But, after all, the strangers will care more to hear our own characteristic music. We suggest that a grand whistling chorus be a chief feature of the programme at the Academy.

Trivial as the suggestion may seem at first, it is strengthened by plain fact. The Japanese are utterly incapable of the tuneful packer. Our Special Correspondent informs us that they received no attention with more genuine and unmistakable satisfaction than the simplest whistling. They gathered together and listened, with absorbed attention, to the national airs as they were propelled from active lungs over flexible lips. At the close of each air, which they heard without the slightest interruption, their expressions were grateful and joyous, and they instantly put their own mouths to great trouble to emulate the example of their instructors, with effects more or less ludicrous.

On the contrary, the music of the brass bands brought a very small amount of comfort to the hearts of the uncultivated heathen. That which accompanied the Philadelphia to their reception from the ocean steamer, and discoursed violently at short intervals on the way up to the capital, was regarded with a sort of awe. Our Correspondent was unable to detect the touching of a sympathetic chord in a single Japanese bosom, and at times, when the brass was particularly obstreperous, and the drums rattled heavily, a light shade of disappointment passed over the faces of the Orientals.

We believe a piece of whistling would enrapture the Japanese, and certainly no more national music could be offered them. Where are our most talented whistlers, then? Let them be called from the echoing streets! Let them gather from the cars and the public saloons where their shrill tones are ever heard! There should be a daily rehearsal, under the direction of some master of the ventose science, and novel and curious effects might be introduced.

Will the committee who have the melodious affairs in charge heed this suggestion? It will be wise to strictly consult the taste of the Japanese; and, however much we may affect to despise it, whistling is really our musical gift, as a people.—Philadelphia Bulletin

A Prediction.

(Translated from Elise Polko's "Tales, Fancies, and Sketches, about Music," by FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.)

In the lovely land of Saxony lies Tonsdorf, in the midst of Upper Lusatia. With its pretty white houses and neat roofs, it looks like a peasant girl in her Sunday clothes, over luxuriant meadows and large bleaching grounds. About eighty years ago, however—and this is the time of which I am about to speak—it looked like a beggar-child by the road-side. A few poor little houses were strewn about; a little church stood by on guard, and dark fir woods frowned above the village: the whole landscape had a mournful, oppressed aspect. Only one little spot looked gay, and this was a green meadow not far from the village; it belonged to the most industrious man of the neighborhood, served as a bleaching place for yarn, and was then the only bleaching ground far or near. On a May afternoon there might have been seen a pretty genre picture; young girls were spreading out in the clear sunshine the yarn they had themselves spun, laughing and jesting the while. They were all robust women, in dark woollen dresses, black bodices, with neatly turned-up white sleeves, and handkerchiefs closely folded over the bosom. The prettiest among them was, without doubt, the daughter of the owner of the meadow—as fresh a maiden flower as ever bloomed in Saxony, where, it is well known, pretty girls flourish as plentifully as weeds. On account of her long, fair hair that almost reached her knees already, though she was only sixteen years old, people called her "Gold Mary." With kindly blue eyes, red cheeks, a little turned-up nose, a laughing mouth, a slender, yet well-rounded figure, she was the very picture of a village rose, who reigned queen over many a heart, and turned many a head. Now, this general favorite was by no means a paragon of understanding and extraordinary gifts; she was simply good—good through and through; never did harm to living creature, generous enough to give the bread from her own mouth, a true, industrious daughter, the support of her father since her mother's death, a pious, harmless maiden. Whoever saw her now, laughing, springing about among her companions, all besprinkled with water, and heard how clearly she sang her merry songs, would rejoice at the sight, and say to himself—"God protect her innocent soul!" Work was over; the girls began to think of returning home, gathered spring nosegays, and then sat down to rest, and to eat their vesper-bread. As the first shadows of evening fell on this animated group, an ugly old woman hobbled from the adjoining fir-wood. The foreign dress, the tarnished yellow turban, the glowing southern black eyes, betrayed a child of Bohemia's wandering race—she was a gipsy. The girls were silent as soon as they saw her, and drew nearer together in an alarmed manner. "Let me drink from your pitcher," said the old woman, in a tone half-beseeching and half commanding: "I have wandered far, have yet farther to go, and I am so thirsty." She pointed, as she spoke, to a half-empty pitcher of milk that had passed from one fresh mouth to another. But the girls, frightened, murmured—"No we cannot drink with you; it would bring us misfortune." One of them drew the pitcher toward her, and covered it with her spoon. Gold Mary had hitherto said nothing; but now, rising, she took the pitcher from her companion with a look of displeasure, and, turning to the gipsy, she said—"Drink, poor woman, and may God make it a blessing to you!" The old woman smiled, took a long draught, gave back the pitcher, and said—"Charitable maiden, I will tell you your fortune in return; give me your hand!" And as Gold Mary, blushing, held out her strong and rather large hand, the gipsy followed the lines in a careful manner, shook her grey head significantly, and murmured the following words in a singing tone—"You have no lover to-day, but he will soon come a courting; of a merry tailor's race is your husband, and yet one that can neither stitch nor mend; your first son will be a general, and yet he will carry no weapon of iron or steel; he will command with a look and a nod, and bring fame and good luck to his house. The second son—"

"Himmel kreuz million schock donnerwetter-r-r-r," rattled out an endless oath behind the prophetic. Gold Mary jumped back with a cry; her father stood beside her. He was a short, broad shouldered man, with a good-natured, red and brown face; was dressed in knee-breeches and a short jacket, and carried a pipe in his mouth; thick gray hair hung over his shoulders from under his broad-brimmed hat. "Will you be silent, old woman," scolded he, "and stop putting such rubbish into the girl's head; as if I would throw her away on a tailor, who does not understand his business. And the first young one is to be a soldier? No, no! she shall have a bleacher, and no one else; and the young ones shall be bleachers, too. We'll see who is right—an old vagabond witch, or I, John Praise-god Hanisch, of Tonsdorf. And now, march off home, girls!" The young people hastened away; Gold Mary cast a stolen glance behind her, but the gipsy had vanished without a trace. Her father scolded on the subject all the way home: yes, even until bed time.

It was the year 1794; ten years had passed since the gipsy's May-day prophecy. And what had become of pretty Mary! We find her again in a little village near Zittan, in old Gersdorf, as the wife of the Cantor and schoolmaster, John Praise-god Schneider (Taylor). He was an excellent man, and played the organ so finely, that the women cried in the church when they listened to him, and the men waited till service was over to shake hands with him.

Many thought that his organ-playing was far more useful and better than the pastor's sermon; but people only whispered this together. The fortunate Cantor had won the greatest treasure of his existence by his organ playing: his good, true wife, Maria Hanisch, of Tonsdorf. She went once to visit an aunt in Zittan, when, on a fine Sunday morning, Johann Praise-god Schneider, the schoolmaster from New Watersdorf, a village near her home, came to play the organ for the city Cantor, who had been taken suddenly ill. When the service was over, and the people had gone out, the schoolmaster sat down again, and sent up a tone-prayer for his sick friend; and such a prayer has stronger wings than any other, and flies straight into Heaven. But not God and the Angels above, alone, heard this prayer; a rosy maiden, who remained behind the rest, prayed also, flew with the tone-prayer into Heaven, and gave away her heart for ever to him who had borne it so high. Then followed a season of tears and silent heart sorrow; for secret love always brings trouble with it. But her kind aunt understood how it was, and brought the young people together—and then the modest Cantor's heart soon glowed with the purest and warmest flame. And then came new trouble; pretty Mary's father would not hear of a musician as a son-in-law, who was called Schneider (Taylor,) too, and brought back to his mind the gipsy's prophecy; and it was only the consideration that the Cantor might assist him in his commercial relations abroad, that induced the lord of the bleaching-ground to give his final consent to the marriage. Schneider had formerly been a ticking-weaver's apprentice, and had exchanged the weaving-stool for the organ bench, on account of his unconquerable love for music. The Cantor was almost adored by the people of the place where he dwelt; the children whom he taught hung on his soft eyes, and obeyed him more willingly than father or mother, while he loved them almost as much as his own children. He had now three sons, but the eldest, his grandfather's image, was the pride of his heart. His grandfather tried to make a bleacher of him, while his parents would not hear of such a thing; his mother cast many a stolen glance on the soldiers that paraded through the village, thought of the gipsy's word, and rejoiced in her heart. His father, however, had very different views, which he kept to himself. Mary took the children to Tonsdorf every summer to see their old grandfather, who took little Christian Frederick to the bleaching in his arms, laid him on the grass, let the sun shine upon him, and the merry girls sprinkled him with water. How the old man laughed in his heart when the strong child crowded, kicked, and shouted. "He shall be my heir," he would say to himself; "all my work will not have been in vain." At Christmas time he brought the child playthings, resembling the utensils used in bleaching, and would willingly have adopted this first-born, had father and mother permitted him. When two more sons appeared, the regular visits to Tonsdorf were, of necessity, discontinued; but Christian Frederick often visited his grandfather, whose especial darling he ever remained. But the father secretly rejoiced, from the bottom of his heart, in the musical talent of his children, whom he carefully and patiently instructed in harmony and piano-forte playing; and when his eldest son, scarcely eight years old, brought to him, on Christmas eve, his first written-out musical idea, the Cantor entered his own chamber, and fell on his knees; with overflowing eyes, he returned thanks to God. He then initiated the boy in the art of organ-playing, made him study the construction and mode of playing the violin, viola, flute, clarinet, fagotto, hautboy and horn, and allowed him to teach his younger brothers. Thus prepared, he entered his son, when in his twelfth year, in the gymnasium at Zittan. He procured him lodgings at a master shoemaker's, and recommended him to the then music-director and organist Meyer, as well as to the latter's assistant, Flaschner. But these gentlemen could not have failed to remark so eminent a musical talent, even without recommendation. In a short time Frederick became prefect of the chorus, practised himself in directing, gave pianoforte lessons industriously, and composed to his heart's delight in his leisure hours. Soon the modest village boy became a welcome guest in the first families of the city; every one was glad to hear him play, all rejoiced in his talent, and at length no musical meeting was thought complete without him.—The most flattering reports reached the Cantor house at Old Gersdorf, and shed sunlight around; then they wandered to the staunch bleacher, who would hear nothing of the kind, and declared that the boy was only losing his time over such stuff; he was too strong a fellow for a musician. When the holidays came, and the student returned to the house of his parents, he related to his father all that he had learnt and heard, and played new melodies to his mother and brothers: all was joy in the Cantor's family. And then the hearty, cheerful young man went over to Tonsdorf, and became, during the last half of vacation time, a bleacher. So passed weeks, months, and years, until a messenger came to Old Gersdorf with a special invitation to the Schneider family from the Musical Society of Zittan, to a large concert that was to be held on the following Sunday: so, on the appointed day, every one of them—father, mother, brothers, and grandfather, wandered off on the two hours' journey to Zittan. It was already evening when they arrived, and, without delay, rest, or refreshment, the expectant family entered the concert-room, and modestly took their places in a corner. The father looked anxiously around for Frederick; and now an overture by Cherubini commenced; but who directed? The father saw, with a thrill of joy, that it was a bashful young man, Frederick Schneider, of Old Gersdorf. But once at the conductor's desk, the movement of his hand was firm and assured; the glances of his eye were serious and quick. Then came a mass by Lotti; it was executed in a masterly manner; and, finally, the young director sat down to the piano, and produced three sonatas composed by himself. Loud applause was the reward of the pianist and composer: the Cantor folded his hand—he could no longer see his son in the orchestra; the lights of the hall, shattered into a thousand points of light, danced before his sight—not his eyes alone, his whole heart swam in tears of joy. The other boys looked delightedly on: Mary bowed her head, and whispered to her husband—"See how well our son commands; now I know what the old woman meant; our Frederick is a true general, God bless him;" and John Praise-god Hanisch whispers—"She was right, after all!"

This day was the commencement of Frederick Schneider's fame. The firstlings of his creative muse, those three sonatas, soon appeared in Leipsic as "Work 1st," published by Breitkopf and Härtel, and were universally praised, even by the most critical musical judges. In the year 1805, Schneider entered the University of Leipsic, and there obtained the appreciation and love of the famous Cantor Schicht, of the Thomas School, and the friendship of many celebrated men. The Schicht Singing Academy was soon given up to him entirely; and he also obtained the position of singing master in the Platonian free school. In the year 1807, Schneider first became organist of the Church of the University; two years later he was director of the Seconda Opera Company, and finally Music-director of the City Theatre. Now he worked on all sides in a truly happy manner. The organ-bench always remained his favorite position, and church-music the peculiar field of his exertion. He composed several masses and organ pieces; and, in 1819, brought out his "Last Judgment," which placed him in the rank of great oratorio composers of all time. The first representation of this remarkable work obtained for him that comfortable resting place in friendly Dessau, which also, according to the will of God, became his eternal place of rest. Under the protection of an art-loving Prince, he brought out his latter compositions—the oratorios of "The Deluge," "Pharaoh," "The Infancy of Christ," "Gethsemani," "Golgotha," "Gideon," and "Absalom;" besides his fine chorales, psalms, and masses. Schneider also made happy essays in secular composition—symphonies, sonatas, cantatas, songs, and many overtures, in which he tastefully introduced the well known melodies, "Gaudemus," "God Save the Queen," and the "Dessauer March." Enthusiastic recognition rewarded him; his works were universally brought out, principally under the composer's own direction: Frederick Schneider's name was one of good report. Yes, pretty Mary's genial son became a commander; not only lord of counterpoint and master of orchestra and chorus, but also a powerful and wise king in the empire of tone. Who has not seen the excellent master, Frederick Schneider, (now resting in God,) as he stood at the director's stand, his hand raised with the baton, his eyes commandingly fixed on his musicians? Who does not remember his face, surrounded with gray hair, and of an uncommon brown and red complexion? His coloring was an ineradicable memorial of the bleaching experiments at good old grandfather Hanisch's, in Tonsdorf.—N. Y. Musical World.

M. CHEVÉ'S SYSTEM.—The following interesting account of the success of M. Chev  s new system of musical instruction, is translated from a Paris paper: "One evening, a few weeks ago, Monsieur Wagner presented himself at Monsieur Chev  s music class, and handed to the professor some choruses which he had just composed, and wished to hear read. Monsieur Chev   asked his son to go on with the lesson he had himself begun, went into another room, wrote Monsieur Wagner's music on the black board and had it brought in to the pupils. Instantly, the whole class, without the help of any instrument, without any other indication than the tone by the tuning-fork, sang Monsieur Wagner's music—note, Monsieur Wagner's music!—with such a perfection of intonation, such a solidity of rhythm and indication of the principal shades of expression as to produce the effect of a performance, not a reading at first sight. Monsieur Wagner went away confounded with astonishment, after having thanked the unique choristers and their admirable professor. He had never witnessed such a feat in his life.

"Such results are truly extraordinary. Pupils of a course where hundreds are taught together, where all who present themselves are received without any choice whatever, do what artist choristers of the conservatoire society, and of the opera, could not do. But, some will say, such results can be obtained only after years of labor. We answer: the pupils of the course held by Monsieur Chev   at the Polytechnic School, as we ourselves witnessed, read at first sight in parts after a very few lessons. After a few months they were able to read at sight, without any hesitation, all the pieces of the r  pertoire of choral music."

Classes on this system are in operation in this city, at 835 Broadway. In the second number of our paper we called the attention of our readers to this interesting and important fact. Mademoiselle Sauvageot, from Paris, where the system originated, devotes herself to the promulgation of music among the masses. We commend her and her subject to all who have reflected on the great uses of music in furthering the development of the race.—Herald of Progress, New York.

Decline of Italian Opera.

Does legitimate Italian opera border on dissolution?—is a question which must have presented itself frequently of late to those who regard the subject as one of no little importance. If Italian opera goes, the art of singing, distinguished from that of vocal declamation, must go with it. There are some who maintain that such a catastrophe would in no way affect the interests of music in an intellectual sense, and that the great masters would retain their influence just the same if the vocal art, from the earlier Italian point of view, were irretrievably lost. We cannot agree with their premises or deduction.

It is notorious that those who have been nurtured in the Italian school of singing are also the best interpreters of the classic German models, and equally so that the voices of the Italians of the last and preceding generations were more enduring, and preserved their vigor and freshness far longer, than those of the present age. Not to travel, however, from our own time, compare Alboni's execution of the airs in Figaro and Don Giovanni with that of any singer whose youth and adolescence have been chiefly devoted to the operas of Signor Verdi. The one is even, flowing, well-balanced, natural, and expressive—artistically faultless, in a word; while the other, with here and there a fine point, springing from the successful embodiment of a happy impulse, is unequal, anti-rhythmical, strained, and convulsive. The existence of such manifest disparity between singers, perhaps equally endowed by nature, leads to a consideration of its origin. Why does Alboni sing "Batti, batti," "Voi che sapete," all the airs, in short, of Zerlina and Cherubino to absolute perfection, while Madame or Mademoiselle —, with real genius, artistic fire, and a voice as beautiful in quality, and wealthy in tone, as it is extended in register, comparatively fails? The only inference to be drawn is, that one has learned to sing by the proper method, and has exercised herself in the proper music, while the other, with all her magnificent endowments, has done neither. The method was the Italian method, the music, the music of Rossini and his immediate predecessors. So that even those one-sided thinkers, who refuse to see the extraordinary musical merit of Rossini's purest Italian operas, must perforce admit that, as a means towards a most desirable end, they are indispensable.

Rossini's florid music has done the same thing for Italians as Handel's bravura songs (which have as frequently been condemned by prejudiced critics) did for our own greatest singers, from the time when Handel wrote Italian operas to that of our own Sims Reeves, a great part of whose unrivalled excellence is attributable to his constant practice in Handel's florid airs. But where did Handel obtain this particular secret of his art?—during his travels in Italy, of course, and from the Italian singers whom, from time to time, he brought over from Italy, to aid him in that enterprise which, though it resulted in his temporary commercial ruin, was a powerful auxiliary towards the attainment of that excellence which ultimately left him without a rival.

We must be careful, too, while rejecting altogether one side Rossini's art, not to fall into the error of Herr Wagner, whose Art-work of the Future supports the paradox that music cannot exist independently. If we are never to look for anything in vocal music but the natural expression of words (as in a great measure did Gluck), we clip off one of its wings. Music can be occasionally a minister, but never a slave; and it may be accepted as certain that one reason why Gluck set up his intolerant theory was a consciousness within him of not being sufficiently a master to invent such music as would delight on its own account, without reference to words or even to situations—music conceived and realized exclusively of all conditions but such as regulate its own plan, development, and symmetrical proportions as independent art-work.

Whether this privilege of creating absolute forms and varieties of forms for itself should be denied a composer for the voice, while it is unanimously (the dogma of Herr Wagner is an exception which the more firmly establishes the rule) granted to a composer for instruments, is worth an argument. We hold such a binding of the musician to his words to be as cruel and tyrannical as the fastening of Ixion to his wheel. It is also unnatural, inasmuch as it prevents the free play of the musician's fancy, and thus deprives the world of one half the rich gifts he would have it in his power to bestow. There is a great difference between violating expression and multiplying its resources. Mozart might have set "Una voce poco fa" in a very different style from Rossini, and yet both have been truly natural and expressive. We will go even so far as to say that the florid mode of expression, when skillfully used, is just as legitimate as any other; and that Handel, when he set "Rejoice greatly," set it in the florid style as most appropriate to the sentiment of the text he had to illustrate. And if the voice is to be deprived of this peculiar medium of display, why accord it to instruments? Why tolerate "passages" (so-called) in concertos and sonatas, for the violin or pianoforte? When Beethoven lays out an ordinary chord, in arpeggios, from one end of the keyboard to the other, it is quite true that what he has to say would be all expressed if the harmony were simply struck at once; but his aim was to convey it in a brilliant and peculiar manner, and this was only to be effected by the device to which he had recourse. Mozart, too, in many of his airs (for example those awarded to one of the supernatural personages in Die Zauberflöte,—Astraffamente, Queen of Night) resorts to the same appliance with similar consistency and the like success. Half the art of early Italian vocalists consisted in their florid exhibitions; and though often, we are aware, absurd, or employed illogically (and therefore ineffectively), they have as often revealed to us what the musician had to convey by means of his art, far more completely than could have been accomplished through any other expedient. That the sentiment belonging to the verbal text of "Una voce" or "Di piacer" could have been more felicitously expressed than by Rossini we are wholly indisposed to admit. In their way these songs are just as perfect as those of Zerlina and Cherubino.

But if this one side of Rossini's art had only tended to educate singers (like Handel's florid music), and enabled them to continue singing, year after year, without disparagement to their voices, it would possess sufficient claims not merely to respect but to admiration. These things it has effected; and what is more (as we have hinted), by giving the singer a ready and invariable command of his resources, has made him a more thorough master of styles, from the florid bravura to the simply expressive, than he could otherwise possibly have been. With these strong convictions we are disposed to view with alarm the phase through which the Italian vocal art is passing (a phase of transition we may hope—but transition to what better state?) The art of singing is no longer taught in Italy; and now even in this vast city of London, where the Italian Opera has flourished for a century and a half, it seems impossible to obtain a company of Italian singers, or to compose a repertory of Italian music. Look at our two great houses, this year. On the first night, at Her Majesty's theatre, the opera was by a Russian composer, the prima donna was a German, the seconda donna a Belgian, and the primo basso (why do we employ the Italian idiom?) a Frenchman; at the Royal Italian Opera, on the same occasion, the opera was by a German, while the prima donna and primo basso-barytono were both French. What is threatened at Her Majesty's Theatre in a short time, is still more extraordinary, viz., Semiramide, the most essentially Italian opera seria by the most essentially Italian composer, with four out of the five principal characters sustained by non-Italians: Semiramide, by a German (Fraulein Titiens); Assur, by a Belgian (M. Errard); Idreno, by a Spaniard (Senor Belart); and Oroce, by a Frenchman (Monsieur Vialette).—Lon. Mus. World.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, October 20th, 1770.

We arrived here on the 18th, after staying a whole day at Padua. The Philharmonic Academy of Bologna has unanimously admitted Wolfgang among its members, and delivered to him the letters patent. This was done without all the usual forms and preliminary ordeals. On the 9th September, at four o'clock in the afternoon, Wolfgang was obliged to appear in the hall of the academy. There the principes academicæ and the two censors (who are all old-chapel masters) gave him an anthem from the antiphony, which he had to arrange for four voices in an adjoining apartment to which he was conducted, and shut up under lock and key by the apparitor. When he had finished, it was examined by the censors and all the chapel masters and composers, and the votes were taken with white and black balls. All the balls came out white. He was called in; at his entrance the applause was general, and congratulations greeted him from every side. After the principes had intimated to him his admission, he returned thanks, and the thing was done. During this time I was shut up in another direction, in the library of the academy, with the persons who accompanied me. Every one was astonished that he should have executed his task so rapidly, seeing that many have been three hours finishing an anthem of three lines. But you must know that it is by no means an easy matter; for this species of composition excludes a number of things which cannot be admitted into it, of which he was informed beforehand. He had finished in something more than half-an-hour. The apparitor brought us the diploma of the establishment. Among other things it contains these words—"Testatur Dominum W. A. M. inter Academia nostra MAGISTROS compositores adscriptum fuisse."

P. S. from Wolfgang.—My dear Mamma, I cannot write, my fingers ache with writing recitatives. I beseech, you dear mother, to pray for me that my opera may succeed, and that afterwards we may all happily meet together. I kiss your hands a thousand times, and to you, dear sister, I shall have a thousand things to say. But when? God knows, and God alone. If it be God's will, I will open my heart to you, and that ere long, I hope. Meanwhile, I embrace you a thousand times. And so we have lost poor Martha. We shall join her, with God's help, in a better world.

Milan, October 27th, 1770.

We shall leave Milan, with God's help, after the middle of January. We shall proceed to Venice by way of Brescia, Verona, Parma, Vicenza, and Padua, and await at Venice the end of the carnival and a few concerts during Lent, which is, they say, the best time for making one's appearance. I should like to return through Carinthia, for I have seen the Tyrol, and have no pleasure in travelling the same road twice, like the dogs.

We often had a visit from Miliwetschek, at Bologna, and frequently went to see him. He wrote an oratorio at Padua, and is starting for Bohemia. He is a man of honor, and we have contracted a sincere friendship with him.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—All-beloved sister! Thou knowest I am a great chatterbox, and that nevertheless I have abandoned you. What is to be done? I no longer speak, and only make signs, for the son of the family is deaf and dumb. But my time is chiefly spent in writing my opera. I am very sorry I cannot serve you for the minuets you desire; however, if it be God's will, you shall receive them at Easter and myself into the bargain. I know nothing more. Adieu, pray for me.

Wolfgang thanks you for all your good wishes on his anniversary, and he hopes, when God shall permit, to see each other again to become your joy and happiness, by realizing all that you desire concerning him.

For the rest there is nothing new. We await with impatience the new year, or at least Christmas. Until then there will ever be something to be done, something to think of, something to apprehend; a failure may perhaps await us—oranges instead of bouquets—and consequently anxious and agitated days. Patience! So many enterprises have succeeded with us, God be praised, and have turned to our honor. We shall, in like manner, with God's assistance, pass safely through the annoyances and inevitable grievances which every chapel-master has to endure from the rabble of virtuosi (virtuosocannille.)

P. S. from Wolfgang.—All beloved little sister of my heart, thanks for your good wishes! I am consumed with longing to see you again at Salzburg. To return to the subject of your congratulations. I almost suspected it was M. Martinelli who had drawn up your Italian phrase. But as you still preserve your character of Mother Prudence, and have had the sense to subjoin immediately after, in Italian, the compliments of M. Martinelli, I was ashamed of my suspicions, and I said to papa, "Good Heavens, when shall I possess as much wit and wisdom as my sister?" "Yes," replied my father, "it is true!" Whereupon I rejoined, "I am sleepy." "Well," said he, "then lay down your pen;" The which I am doing. Adieu. Pray God my opera may succeed. I am, your brother, tired of writing.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, November 10th, 1770.

When from time to time my kind friends add, as they lately did, a piece of pleasantry to their letters, they really perform a work of charity, for Wolfgang is at this moment so seriously occupied, and, therefore, so serious, that I am glad when anything amusing falls into his hands. Let my friends pardon my silence. I am less apt at writing than ever. Thou wilt be astonished one day at the large share of presence of mind, prudence, and foresight required of us to escape safely out of the storm. We have, God be thanked, gained the first battle, and beaten an enemy who betook himself to the prima donna, with the pieces which she was to sing, persuading her to refuse those of Wolfgang. We have all these pieces here. They are quite new. Neither she nor ourselves knew who has composed them. She refused them all at the hands of this plotter, and she is beyond herself with joy at the pieces which Wolfgang has composed for her according to her wishes and desires; her Maestro Lampugnani, who has rehearsed her part with her, praises it unceasingly to the skies. Another storm is gathering in the theatrical horizon, which we can descry afar off. We shall weather it with a little dexterity and help from Above. But do not get wondering at all this; these are inevitable occurrences which happen to the greatest masters. Provided we keep our health, the rest is nothing. All this is not to be taken too much to heart.

No. 89.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, November 17th, 1770.

Wolfgang has had his usual cold.

Between this and yesterday we have encountered the second storm. Whatever may yet happen, and all sorts of difficulties are likely to arise, we are full of hope. It is a piece of good fortune to see in Italy an opera gain the approving votes of every one. Too many factions exist to prevent it. One thing is certain, however, that we have surmounted many obstacles. We shall also get over the storm actually raging. We usually go out a-walking in the afternoon, for I will not have Wolfgang write after meals, except under the most pressing necessity.

You imagine the opera is finished—you are greatly mistaken. As regards our son, he would have had time to finish two operas. But in Italy everything goes to the devil's content. The primo uomo does not arrive till to-day. Wolfgang is waiting for him to write his second air; he does not want to have double work, and prefers that he should be here, in order to make the coat to his measure.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, 9th December, 1770.

This evening, after the Angelus, we shall have the second rehearsal of the recitatives. The first went so well that the pen had only to be taken up once to change a letter, della instead of dalla. This does great credit to the copyist, and every one was much astonished at it. I wish the instrumental rehearsals may proceed in the same manner. As far as I am able to judge, apart from paternal leanings, I find the opera a good one, and written with much spirit. The singers go on well. Now the thing depends on the orchestra, and at the end of the reckoning, on the caprice of the audience; consequently, in all this, there is much uncertainty—it is a perfect lottery.

No. 91.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, December 13, 1770.

On the 12th we had the first rehearsal with the orchestra, consisting however, of only sixteen persons, to ascertain that all was correctly written. On the 17th, the first rehearsal with the whole orchestra will take place, which consists of fourteen first and second violins, two harpsichords, six double basses, two violoncellos, two bassoons, six altos, two hautbois, two flutes, to be replaced, if necessary, by two hautbois, four French horns, and two clarinets, consequently, sixty performers.

Before the first rehearsal with the small orchestra, there were not wanting folks whose satirical tongues cried down beforehand Wolfgang's music as something which must necessarily be puerile and wretched, and who prophesied a defeat, maintaining that it was impossible a child of fourteen, and especially a German, could write an Italian opera: admitting him to be undoubtedly a great virtuoso, they did not think he could have had that intelligence and knowledge of the chiaro ed oscuro necessary for theatrical success. All these people, since the first rehearsal on a small scale, have become dumb. They have ceased to utter a word. The copyist is enchanted, and this is a great guarantee in Italy, because if the music succeeds, the copyist often gains more by sending away and selling the pieces than the maestro by his composition. The singers, male and female, are highly satisfied; the prima donna and prima uomo are delighted with their duo. Now all depends on the caprice of the public. Saving a little vain glory, it is a matter of no great concern to us. We have already undertaken many things in this queer world of ours, and Heaven has already assisted us. We are now at the last stage of an affair of which circumstances conspire, perhaps, to aggravate the importance. God be our protector!

On St. Stephen's day, a good hour after the Ave

Maria, you may picture to yourself Maestro Don Amadeo, seated at the harpsichord in the orchestra, his father in a box above him, and you will please in your heart to wish us a fortunate performance, adding thereunto sundry Paternosters.

Italian Opera.

The first taste of the new troupe, organized under the auspices of Mlle. CORTESI, was enjoyed last Monday evening at the Boston, instead of at the New York, Academy of Music. The crowd was immense, and the demonstrative enthusiasm, that of the bravo, hand-clapping kind, as loud and long and frequent as on any such occasion that we can remember. It was like a Presidential campaign caucus. What was the occasion? The opera was Il Trovatore, which in itself offered nothing new and needs no remark; nor was the music thereof as a whole brought out so well as we have sometimes heard it. But there were new singers; and especially a new tenor, MUSIANI, young and fresh, and laden with fresh laurels from Havana, in whom all were prepared to find a tenore robusto of (to us) unexampled power and compass. Here was a phenomenon indeed rare, long looked for as it were despairingly, and now vouchsafed to little Boston—the American debut of a new great tenor! Nothing could have so stirred up the quid-nuncs; for is not he the greatest man who has the greatest voice? and is it not the greatest of all Art experiences to hear it—and for the first time too—yes, and even before the New Yorkers! All things have their audiences, and the most curious thing to study at an opera is the audience. It is indeed curious how the audience, how the enthusiasm, how the whole tone of the house differs on various nights. Last Monday night we seemed to be sitting in a New York theatre. It was the applause that made it seem so, the screaming enthusiasm upon small provocations, measured by any standard higher than the physical and the external.

Now once upon a time it happened—but a few years since—at the Grand Opera in Paris, that a tenor singer, Duprez, singing in Rossini's "William Tell," astonished everybody by the full, clear ring of an uncommonly high note, actually taken in the chest voice; which startling phenomenon instantly became the topic of all Paris and the world which Paris covers. The "Ut de poitrine," "Do di petto," C in the chest-voice, was all the rage. Night after night Parisians thronged the theatre, not to hear music, not to admire Rossini's wonderful creation, but to wait for the new phenomenon and realize a highest pitch of momentary ecstasy when ut de poitrine should ascend and cleave the skies. It was the Paris fashion; and rumored Paris fashions tantalize, torment us all until we can import them. And here now was a most rare opportunity—the actual first advent on these shores of "Do di petto!" In the bills of the evening it was especially set forth as the central and principal attraction, that Sig. MUSIANI, in his great solo in the last part of the third act, would use the famous, his famous Do di petto. Of course all were on the qui vive till that came. The singer might have done beautiful things, expressive things, have shown traits of a most rare artistic feeling and refinement, have sung sweeter than an angel, or than Mario, earlier in the evening; but all that would have passed unnoticed, save as by some extra robust signs it nourished and confirmed the expectation of the great climactic note. All very well, Mr. Verdi; capital music, no doubt; hot and strong as we old toppers like; all very well, but we shall see; pray give us a high C, and give the man a chance. The eventful moment came; and all were breathless. Well, he did it; did it honestly and well; there certainly was no mistake about it; they who wondered how they were to know high C from any other, or feared it might have passed them in their ignorance already, were suddenly and startlingly relieved. Everybody was delighted with the note, and still more delighted that he recognized it.

In truth it was a splendid, pure and telling note, and set the crown upon a voice of most extraordinary power and volume. It was a pleasant incident in the performance; but when it sent the whole crowd into screaming enthusiasm, when it became the paramount and central interest of the evening, did it not furnish a measure of the artistic taste and feeling of the audience by no means very flattering? Does the possession of a strong voice, with an extra note or two, prove a man an artist? Doubtless it gives him a great advantage, if he has learned to use it not for its own sake, like an exhibition of a feat of strength, but in subordination to the expressive ends of lyric art. In itself it is no more merit of his, and no more deserves applause, than the holding up of six fingers on one hand.—Observe, it is the audience we criticize, and not the singer; it is the making much ado about what is really nothing in an artistic point of view.

And now as to the singer himself. Signor Musiani, as first heard, in his guitar song behind the scene, made us aware of a voice very voluminous and powerful, but not sweet, ripe, sympathetic—nay, even a little pinched and strained in the higher tones. The tone at first was not entirely pleasant; the singing somewhat cold and stiff. But the impression went on improving; the power and richer quality developed by degrees. Some parts, in the last acts particularly, were beautifully, as well as simply, sung. In general it was plain and honest singing, with little ornament or straining after false effect. One enjoyed the luxury of a really large, well-nourished tenor voice, adequate to any demand of trying and impassioned music. That he is yet a very finished singer, or that the soul and feeling in his singing claim as much regard as the mere organ in itself, is more than we are prepared to say. There can be no doubt, however, that Signor Musiani made a decided mark that evening.

But he was not the only object of enthusiasm. The reception of Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS was as warm as it was worthy—a refreshing act of justice. For her Azucena was in truth the artistic feature of the evening. Although her health is not yet perfectly recovered, her rich, warm contralto warmed us all as ever, and her execution of the music was as finished and as beautiful as it was chaste and expressive. We hardly know a better example now upon the stage of the true, the older, unperturbed Italian school of singing, than this earnest pupil of Garcia and faithful follower of Jenny Lind's advice affords us. The only drawback is a slight organic trouble, now indeed in a great measure but not entirely conquered,—a certain thickness in her utterance. But expression, truth of conception, faithful and felicitous embodiment of character in each and every moment, she never lacks. Her acting is admirable; and there is the charm of heartiness and nobleness of nature in it all.

Mlle. CORTESI has a certain earnestness in tragic parts which goes a great way, and a good stage presence. But there is a painful overdoing in her singing and her acting. Her efforts to give voice to impassioned crises overstep the bounds of music, and offend the ear too often. Nor does the intensity, the energy of her action redeem it from coldness. The brave AMODIO occupied no less than his usual share of the scene, and was in good voice for the Count di Luna. Of course he sang well, and he looked as jealous and as cruelly revengeful as he could. The gentleman who strutted as Ferrando, Signor NANNI, seemed somewhat of the Beneventano order; va superbo! But with a solid, powerful baritone and much energy he made more than usual of his secondary part. The second lady, too, was an improvement upon the Mme. Morras, &c., that we have had. Chorus and orchestra were powerful, but the ensemble was not always quite so smooth or clear as one could wish. Signor MUZIO perhaps has not had his present forces long enough under drill.

Tuesday evening gave us GAZZANIGA in her great rôle of Sappho, which she has made peculiarly her own. The interest of the occasion, too, was heightened by the fact that it was really her farewell to America. She sailed for Europe, in the Europa, the next morning. Her reception was justly enthusiastic, although the audience was not quite so large as on the previous evening, or as both the character of the prima donna and of Pacini's beautiful opera deserved. The music is certainly of the most pleasing, genial, and in parts delicious, of any written by Italians since Rossini. If not strikingly original, it is at least natural and fluent, expressive, and free from modern extravagances. It is good to listen to occasionally, but not too often. This time the rendering, as a whole, was not so fortunate as it was last winter. The ensembles particularly were rough and overpoweringly noisy.

Mme. Gazzaniga looked the part of Sappho, the inspired improvisatrice, and the loving woman, now denouncing a false lover, and now sublimely sacrificing herself in friendship for her rival, to a charm. The open, intellectual fervor of her countenance, the classic dignity and beauty of her poses and the movements of her arms, the birdlike thrill and heart-earnestness of her penetrating and sweet voice, so fine and lyric in its quality, her subordination of all mere execution to the expression of the character and of the moment—every thing indeed, except the one misfortune of a clumsy gait, made her a true impersonation of the part. It is the most complete thing that she does; symmetrically developed from the beginning to the end. It is true, she is not a finished vocalist as compared to Lagrange and others; but she has a beautiful voice, much facility of execution, and something like genius. She has her inspired moments, when her singing is all you can require, for you are carried away with the expression of the part: the poetry of the thing is what enchants you, the music of the soul. Gazzaniga was in good voice, and seemed to give herself to her part with a right good will. She was applauded and recalled heartily and often.

ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS seconded her admirably in Climene. The innocent and tender melody of the part, as well as the rapturous and florid passages, were beautifully executed. The duet with Sappho in the second act was exquisitely done on both parts, and had to be repeated. Signor TAMARO, the tenor, made but a feeble Phœon, though his singing is not without merits; and Sig. BARILI's vocal presentation of Alcandro, the high priest, seemed like a shadow painfully striving to become substance.

On Wednesday evening, owing to the illness of CORTESI, Mlle. PARODI took her place as Lucrezia Borgia, having been sent for from New York. SUSINI, of the noble voice and bearing, was the Duke, and ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS was Orsini. Signor TAMARO, Gennaro.

Further announcements (as we write) are Norma, for Thursday, with Parodi; the "Barber of Seville," Friday, with Miss Phillipps as Rosina; and a Matinée on Saturday.

The Leipzig Conservatoire.

Doubtful rumors and opinions are afloat about the present character of this institution, which has hitherto enjoyed the reputation of being the most excellent among the musical schools in Germany. Consequently there is much questioning and running to and fro among those young Americans, who have been thinking of becoming pupils there, and we have been not a little puzzled how to answer those who have sought our advice as to the best place in Germany for musical instruction. Disparaging reports from certain dissatisfied pupils at Leipzig have found their way into newspaper correspondence here; and whether the fault lay in the pupil or the institution, who knows? Our "Diarrist," too, has evidently had his mind wrought upon unfavorably with regard to Leipzig. We only hope that his informants have been too active, and that he and we shall hear the other side of the matter brought out convincingly. We wish it clearly understood that we espouse no side in the controversy, and that what we have published in this Journal we have given simply as reports, without endorsing them. Our columns will be most gladly open to any honest refutation of the charges. For our part, we have not yet seen sufficient proof that the Leipzig Conservatory is not still as desirable a school for the study of music as can anywhere be found. Meanwhile here is a letter just received from an American pupil in that institution; we do not know the writer personally, and it must pass for what it is worth.

LEIPZIG, MAY 10, 1860.

MR. DWIGHT,

Dear Sir,—You can hardly imagine the astonishment produced in the small circle of American music students here resident, by the article on Leipzig which (extracted from the Taunton Democrat) appeared in your worthy Journal of March 31st. I hope you will allow me the privilege of saying a few words in relation to some most unfounded statements which it contains, and which I, as an American, should be very sorry to see pass unrefuted. Those concerning the Conservatorium it is quite unnecessary that I should notice any further than by remarking that, instead of being kept for so long a time as "Mr. T." complains of on elementary exercises, each pupil advances in proportion as he has talent or industry; it being thus plainly only the fault of the gentleman designated as "one of the finest Pianists and Organists in New England," if he was kept on "five-finger exercises" for a space of nine months. The little anecdote respecting the pupil who neglected his lessons to such an extent that upon going to his teacher for his diploma he mistook another gentleman for him, is certainly very funny, with the exception, however, that instead of being an American at the Conservatorium, (where diplomas are given only by the Board of Directors,) it happened to be a German student at the University.

Finally, regarding those American Music-students alluded to as "idle and dissolute fellows," as far as my knowledge extends, they exist only in the fertile imagination of the gentleman who furnished the information contained in that not over-truthful article.

Very respectfully yours,

O. W., of Albany, N. Y.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The principal musicians of our Boston orchestras have organized a society, to be called the "Boston Philharmonic Society," for the purpose of placing the business of symphony concerts henceforth on a more permanent basis. THOMAS RYAN is their President, and F. SUCK, Vice President. They will probably make Mr. ZERRAHN their first conductor. . . . The DRAYTONS hold their Parlor Operas just now in Worcester. . . . Little PATTI, with the STRAKOSCH family, have been concertizing of late in Cleveland, Buffalo, and other cities on the lakes.

RICHARD WAGNER has been repeating his Paris programmes in Brussels, and was expected to do the same, with one of them, in Basle, on the 15th of April. . . . Mme. SZARVADY (Wilhelmina Clauss) has given three concerts in Paris the past season, in which she played, of Beethoven: Sonata, (op. 2, no. 3), Trio, (op. 70, no. 2), Sonata, op. 111; of Mozart: Sonata in A (piano and violin); Haydn: Trio in G major; Bach: Prelude and Fugue for Organ, with pedal; Rameau: Les niais; Mendelssohn: Sonata, op. 55, (piano and cello), Rondo capriccioso and Presto scherzando; Chopin: two Nocturnes, Impromptu, Fantasia Impromptu, and Etude (C sharp minor); Schumann: Quintet, Quartet, op. 47, and Symphonic Etudes; Stephen Heller: No. 14 from Frucht-und Dornenstücken, and Auf Flügeln des Gesanges. Also in another artist's concert she played the great B flat Trio of Beethoven, and the F minor Sonata of Bach (piano and violin). . . . CLARA SCHUMANN has taken leave of Vienna, having played in her last concert things by Mozart, Bach, Chopin and R. Schumann. . . . The music of SEBASTIAN BACH seems not to lose its freshness for the Germans, but to be continually opening new charms. His great Oratorio, the Passion-music, was performed both in Cologne and in Leipzig during Passion week. . . . Beethoven's great Missa Solennis (in D) was performed in Leipzig, in the Thomas Church, by Riedel's singing society, on the first of April.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this Society was held last evening, at the rooms of Chickering & Sons, on Washington street, the President, Col. Thos. E. Chickering, in the chair. The annual report of the Secretary was submitted. The number of persons admitted into the Society the past year was 25; number of persons discharged, 29. Three oratorios have been performed in public during the past year, and the Society did not pay its expenses at either performance. It costs not less than $500 to bring out an oratorio in a successful manner, without engaging outside talent. The report was accepted and placed on file.

The report of the Treasurer was also presented, by which it appears that the receipts of the past year amounted to $4189.10; expenditures $4476.60—making a deficit of $287.50.

There is also a note against the Society, which falls due in August, for $1200, which makes the total amount of the indebtedness of the Society $1485.50. The financial condition of the Society is not so good as it was at the last annual meeting. The report of the Librarian was also submitted.

The following officers were then elected for the ensuing year: President, Thos. E. Chickering; Vice President, Oren J. Faxon; Secretary, Loring B. Barnes; Treasurer, Matthew S. Parker; Librarian, George H. Chickering; Trustees, George Fisher, John A. Nowell, George W. Hunnewell, Thomas D. Morris, Theophilus Stover, Ephraim Wildes, George W. Palmer, James Rice.—Transcript.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

MUNICH.—Haydn's "Creation" was performed on Palm Sunday. The last subscription concert of the season gave Mozart's G minor symphony, an aria from Gluck's Iphigenia, an Octet for wind instruments by Mozart, three part-songs by Mendelssohn, and Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen."

BREMEN, APRIL 3.—Our cyclis of "private concerts" was brought to a close last Tuesday, on which occasion we had an eminently classical programme, Haydn and Mozart, Beethoven and Cherubini, Spohr and Weber, being represented in it. The old master, Bach, also, was included in the band of illustrious deceased composers, and only one piece reminded us that we belonged to a later age. We allude to the violin concerto, performed by our visitor, Herr Joachim. This valuable and comprehensive composition has not long been completed. It was performed for the first time, not a fortnight since, before a large audience in Hanover. But it is not merely written in the Past, and conceived in the spirit of the age; it will also produce its effect on the public of the Present; it is far from being Music of the Future, inasmuch as it will not have to wait till the Greek Kalends before its success is decided. There are, perhaps, not many modern musical compositions which, while so conscientiously carried out, and so carefully avoiding clap-trap, produce so immediate and constantly increasing an effect. But there is also a future in store for it. We feel that this composition contains many treasures, which will be completely appreciated by the hearer only when he has heard it repeated several times, and since, on account of the great technical qualification it demands, qualifications which few of our present violinists, besides its author, possess, it cannot be repeated very often, it will not soon cease to be new. This concerto, which bears the title "Nach Ungarische Weise," consists of three movements—an allegro, a romance, and a finale, "alla zingaresca" ("in the Zingaro fashion"). The last transports us, by its very title, to Hungary, but, even on the second movement, the Hungarian rhythms are perceptible, while in the first allegro, as well, the motives present the same character. As is well known, Joachim was born in Hungary, and thus it was an easy task for him, guided by the reminiscences of his youth, to give the music a natural color, without borrowing any particular melodies. The work is far from being calculated for the exclusive display of virtuosity, as the composer has done full justice to the claims of the orchestra. In the first movement, indeed, the orchestra, to a certain extent, predominates, expressing, in a pleasing introduction, nearly the whole melodious substance of the movement, before the violin chimes in and develops what has been thus performed; even in the interesting and elaborate cadence the solo instrument feels lonely, and calls to its aid some gentle sister instruments from the band. In the romance, however, this subordination ceases, and the orchestra and violin, as equal powers, enter on a course of beautiful melodic rivalry, at last combining in graceful harmonic unity; while, finally, in the third movement—the impulsive, sparkling, foaming presto, as restless as the inconstant Zingaros themselves—the violin, as a matter of course, assumes completely the upper hand; it decidedly takes the lead, although, even here, a few strains from the orchestra, now and then, mingle most charmingly in the musical maze. Both the composition and its rendering were received most warmly by the audience, and, after the second piece played by our guest—the songful adagio from Spohr's seventh concerto, given with the most feeling tenderness—the applause was so unusually great, that, in return, he could not avoid making such a return as only he is capable of making. He played one of Bach's chaconnes—the same which he introduced on a previous occasion. Whenever Herr Joachim performs one of these compositions, we think that greater perfection of execution is impossible, but every repetition seems to prove that such an opinion is erroneous. Even in the chaconne, the delicate threads of this marvellous web of tone appeared finer and clearer than ever.

The selections from Mozart and Haydn were again confided to Madame Engel, who sang with good taste and her usual neatness, an air from the latter composer's Creation, and an air from the Idomeneo of the former (an air which is easily recognizable from its similarity to the Tamino air in Die Zauberflöte). The concert opened with Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, in which our orchestra is well up, and which it played once this winter at one of the "Symphonic concerts." The symphony was admirably rendered. Of the two overtures, that of Cherubini to Medea was but coldly received, while that of Weber to Der Freischütz, enthusiastically executed, produced its accustomed exciting impression.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The performance of Israel in Egypt on Friday week does not call for any lengthened comment, inasmuch as its right to rest on the same basis as the Messiah has long been accorded by the public, who evidence their appreciation of its excellence by the enormous attendance invariably present whenever and wherever it is performed. Exeter Hall, therefore, presented its usual appearance on the night in question; every part being densely crowded long before the commencement of the oratorio. To speak first of the choruses, which occupy by far the largest share of the work, it is sufficient to remark that they were given generally with that precision, combined with due attention to light and shade, which their recent training under Mr. Costa has led us to expect, and produced the customary effect upon the audience, who loudly encouraged the "Hailstone chorus," and were frequent in their applause. Mr. Sims Reeves declaimed the terribly trying air, "The enemy said," with such tremendous energy that it was impossible to resist the calls for its repetition. Mlle. Parepa did her best with the only air affording her an opportunity for display, "Thou didst blow," but, whether it was owing to the recollection of Madam Clara Novello (whom we are so soon to lose), did not altogether satisfy the critical ear. Mlle. Parepa has fine natural gifts, but has not yet learned all that is necessary to make a Handelian singer. Of Madame Sainton-Dolby we have only praise to utter, delivering the air, "Thine hand brought forth," in her most ingenious and finished manner. Miss Fanny Rowland sang with excellent skill and judgment, although her voice was somewhat overweighed by the more powerful organ of the composer. The duet, "The Lord is a man of war," met with the customary encore, and was sung by Signor Bellotti and Mr. Santley without straining after that violent effect which generally makes this piece a shouting match rather than a vocal performance. Perhaps it might be owing to the fact that neither gentleman can be considered a "basso profundo," being, strictly speaking, baritones. At the next performance Haydn's Creation is to be performed.—Musical World, May 5.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The Hanover-square Rooms were crowded on Monday night, at the second concert, and yet the programme contained scarcely a new feature, as the following will show:

Sinfonia, No. 7..... Haydn
Recit. Aria (Figaro), Mr. Santley..... Mozart
Concerto, No. 1, pianoforte, Herr Ernst Lubeck..... Mendelssohn
Scena (Oberon), Mlle. Parepa..... Weber
Overture (Muryanthe)..... Weber

PART. II.

Sinfonia Pastorale..... Beethoven
Aria (Siege de Corinthe), Mlle. Parepa..... Rossini
Berceuse, Tarantelle, pianoforte, Herr Lubeck..... Ernst Lubeck
Duetto (Agnes), Mlle. Parepa and Mr. Santley..... Paer
Overture, (Pré aux Cleres)..... Herold
Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

If any proof were wanting that the Philharmonic Concerts owe their fame, and must be indebted for continued longevity, to the influence of a certain series of acknowledged great works, the success of last night's entertainment would suffice. Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, Cherubini, Weber, Spohr, and Mendelssohn—with proportionate examples from the vocal music of the Italian masters, and occasionally, where incontestable merit warrants the innovation, an instrumental or vocal piece by one of our best English writers—would suffice to sustain the Philharmonic Society for another half century. The Musical Society of London and the New Philharmonic Concerts may find it in their interest to produce novelties, while the Monday Popular Concerts—the most remarkable institution of the kind ever established in this country—can afford to be universal, and to ransack the libraries of chamber music, both ancient and modern; but the Philharmonic Society has an exclusive mission; that of periodically affording its subscribers the opportunity of hearing, well executed, the most unblemished masterpieces of the art. And, after all, it is hardly too much to listen to the symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven (not to go further into particulars) once a year, or once in four-and-twenty months.—Mus. World, May 12.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—At the fourth concert of the second season, which took place on Wednesday night in St. James's Hall, this new and flourishing society—which contains among its members nearly all the chief professors and amateurs of music, foreign and native, residing in the metropolis—furnished a programme in strict consonance with that element of its constitution which principally distinguishes it from other associations of the kind. It will be seen, by the following, that a new work of importance, from the pen of an eminent living composer, was one of the prominent features in the selection:

Symphony in G minor..... Mozart
Cantata, "Christmas," (First time of performance)..... G. A. Macfarren
Concerto in G, Pianoforte, Mr. Charles Hallé..... Beethoven
Aria, "Cangio d'aspetto" (Admeto), Madame Sainton-Dolby..... Handel
Grand Air, "Je suis sauvée enfin," (Le Domino Noir), Madame Lemmens Sherrington..... Auber
Overture, (Guillaume Tell)..... Rossini
Conductor—Mr. Alfred Mellon..... Ibid.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The entire programme of last Monday was devoted to Mendelssohn and as the musical public but a few days previous had been presented with a performance of the immortal master's Elijah, on by far the most important scale that has yet been attempted, so the selection of this evening formed, as it were, an appropriate pendant, by affording an opportunity of listening to some of the choicest selections from the chamber music of the ever-to-be-lamented musician. The instrumental portion comprised, among other things, two quartets, E flat major (Op. 44) and F minor No. 6 (posthumous)—the latter for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts; together with the Trio in D minor, for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, also for the first time. Sainton, Goffrie, Doyle, Piatti, and Charles Hallé (pianoforte), as executants, were a guarantee for a performance of the highest excellence, and the hearty applause of the audience bore testimony to the thorough appreciation of their efforts. In addition to this, Mr. Charles Hallé gave two solos in his most masterly and finished manner; the fantasia in F sharp minor, dedicated to Moscheles, and a selection from the Lieder ohne Worte, played so exquisitely that the second and last were unanimously redemanded. Mr. Sims Reeves was also encored in "The Garland," and "The Hunter's Song," both, we need hardly say, sung to perfection. A like compliment was also paid to Miss J. Wells and Mr. Cumming in the duet "Zuleika and Hassan." The London Glee and Madrigal Union, under the direction of Mr. Land, contributed "The Lark's Song" and "The Nightingale," and, the former being encored, most unaccountably substituted a glee by the late Mr. Horsley. Mr. Benedict, as usual, showed himself a first-rate accompanist.—Ibid.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—During the first week in May, Grisi and Mario, with Madame Csillag (as Azucena), sang in Il Trovatore. Meyerbeer's Dinorah followed on Saturday. Of the next performance, the Musical World says:

On Tuesday the first representation of Il Barbiere for two years attracted the most brilliant audience of the season. The fact of Mario having resumed his old part of Count Almaviva—his most finished and admirable impersonation in the opinion of many—gave additional interest to the performance: while the first appearance of Mme. Miolan-Carvalho, in Rosina, was anticipated with general curiosity. On no former occasion have we heard the great Italian tenor sing the music so exquisitely. So thoroughly does it suit him, that it is unaccountable how, under any circumstances, Mario should have resigned the part of Almaviva to another.

Another powerful attraction was Ronconi's Figaro, a masterpiece of a different kind, but no less incomparable than Mario's Almaviva. The singing and acting of the two in the famous duet, "All'idea di quel metallo," could not have been surpassed; and without entering into further details about the performance of the prince of Figaros, we may state that Ronconi was in the true vein, and sustained the character of the mercurial barber with wonderful animation and esprit from "Largo al factotum" to the end. Mme. Miolan-Carvalho was a charming Rosina, acting with infinite nuances, and singing with wonderful brilliancy; but her voice being a high coprano, she was scarcely so much at home with the music as with that of Dinorah.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail, the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Spirit of Light. Song, M. W. Balfé. 25

A song with some pretensions in regard of expression. Balfé evidently has taken more care with this song than he usually does with the numerous light ballads he composes.

Fairy dreams. Duet. S. Glover. 35

Very pretty. Will soon be known extensively.

Two mutual hearts. Song and Quartet. Leonard Marshall. 25

Parlor music in the best sense of the word. Those, who are at all acquainted with the pleasing style of the composer, will not fail to obtain a copy.

Song of the silent Land. H. Strachauer. 75

A fine poem, translated from the German of Sails by Longfellow, and set to music for solo and chorus. Well adapted for singing societies. Not difficult, yet effective.

Come on the sea. From "Moore's Irish Melodies." 25

Norah Creina, or Lesbia hath a beaming eye. " 25

THE NIGHTINGALE. A choice collection of Songs, Chants and Hymns, designed for the use of Juvenile Classes, Public Schools and Seminaries; comprising, also, a Complete and Concise System of Elementary Instruction by W. O. & H. S. Perkins. 20

This will prove a very acceptable volume to those for whose special profit and amusement it is intended. The songs are all excellent and highly attractive; the elementary portions of them from their easy and progressive nature will render the acquisition of a primary knowledge of vocal music free from those difficulties which often attend the efforts of the young. For these reasons the Nightingale will be found a volume of superior worth for children at school or at home.

Seed Time.

Now, by the rose's crimson heart,
And the robin's brooding wing,
There never dawned on the waiting earth
So full and fair a spring!
For the splendor of uncounted Mays,
Through many a century fled,
Beams in the eyes of the latest-born—
Heir of the lovely dead.

O, the odor of the opening leaves
Comes like a breath divine,
And the mountain air is a richer draught
Than Hebe's rosiest wine!
The dells are blue with violets,
And, over the garden wall,
At the lightest waft of the south wind
The apple blossoms fall.

Thank God! we breathe the balmy air,
We hear the soft winds blow,
And our hearts are glad at the violet's blue
And the apple blossom's snow;—
So, lightly down, through shower and shine;
To the Summer-Land we go.

Yet more! God's dearer fields of Truth
The centuries have ploughed,
As, over them, through calm and storm
His laborers, toiling, bowed;—
What shall we plant in the furrows wide
Beneath His sun and cloud?

They cry to us, the glorious Dead,
"Why do ye linger so?
The soil was never so warm above,
So mellow and moist below;—
We wrought to clear the cumbered ground,
And yearn till the grain shall grow—
Till the weeds are crushed in the garden bowers,
And the rose and the lily blow."

O helping God! we long for Thee!
Our hearts are all a-glow!
And the deeds of a loving life shall be
The precious seed we sow,—
For Hate may kill, but only Love
Can make the roses blow!—
Then gladly on, through shade or shine,
To the Harvest Land we'll go! DEAN.

Wagner's Music and the Art of Singing.

BY A SINGER.

(Translated for this Journal from the Deutsche Musik-Zeitung, of Vienna.)

Caspar. Thou know'st my respite is nearly up.
Samiel. To-morrow! Freyschütz.

The scene from the Wolf's Glen in Weber's Freyschütz, beginning with the words above, was constantly floating before me lately, when I heard and saw for the first time the Lohengrin.

The painful situation, into which Caspar has fallen in regard to Samiel and to difficult intonation, seemed reproduced continually with rare interruptions, and I could not help fancying that this extremely characteristic little scene had furnished the model for Wagner's intention. It seemed to me to be the grain of mustard seed, which had struck its roots so deep in Wagner, until there stood out an exotic tree at last, of which the Future is to pluck the fruit, although to many it seems like the Upas tree, the breath whereof is deadly.

I purposely held no text (libretto) in my hand, either before or during the opera; I was even sorry that I knew the subject beforehand. My object was to receive an immediate impression; I had a right to expect that from a composer who makes so much account of the genius of the word.

But I did not fully understand the text.—Unquestionably Wagner's reformatory ideas with regard to the purification of the Opera from many disturbing incongruities are great; the genius of the German language especially has much to thank him for. But in his battling for the word, he has become its slave, and with him too the bearer of the word—the singer.

If Wagner's intention is to sacrifice melody and rhythm in favor of the word, and if in spite of the best efforts of the singers I am unable to understand the text precisely, than I have lost that very commentary to his music, for the sake of which he has sacrificed specific melody.

If I find myself condemned in the opera to understand nothing of the text, shall I not gain by going to another opera where I may at least hear melody and singers? Or else I must learn the text by heart and hear the opera repeatedly, to catch the intentions of the composer.

In the midst of the opera the odd thought occurred to me: "Were it not better if Wagner wrote an opera merely for ballet, that is to say, for mimics? Then there would be no sort of disturbance; the words sung, which one never rightly seizes on account of the eternal obligato reflection of the instruments, would be replaced by a printed programme, and programme music is just now flourishing in full bloom.

For Wagner the singer is merely an instrument, a speaking-trumpet of his tones, whom you may actually—with the text before you—understand. But why trouble oneself with this last tradition of the opera, the singers—so easily replaced by mimics and a printed programme? Put it boldly out of the way, this last one; make an opera without singers, and lo! the Art-work of the Future stands before you!

The singer, as the interpreter of Wagner's music, who merely has to bring the commentary thereto—the text (with suitable mimic action of course), surely does not deserve so much regard, as to be allowed to come to words, when he is no longer allowed to come to melody. Or is that melody, perhaps, which falls like crumbs from the rich table of the instrumentalists?

If Wagner has a melody, it is commonly a mere harmonic accident, a melody not self-subsistent, begotten by the over-richness of his harmony; and if one of them happen to stray into a singer's mouth, it is for the most part a declamatory chance melody thanklessly dragged after the word.

Wagner strives, as it is well known, to blend the two historically recognized and well settled facts: Recitative and Cantabile, into one, and produce a unique style; and what will be the result? An abortion—neither fish nor flesh—a Recitative that tries to be Cantabile, a Cantabile that tries to be Recitative—an Arioso—everything you please, but which is nothing but specific Wagner Music of the Future.—From Wagner's excessive puritanism also springs his anxious surveillance of the singer element, a despotism quite as little justified as the despotism of the singers was in the preceding century, as opposed to the better conviction of the composer. The technical qualification of the singer has ceased to be of any account; the capital of his voice lies unproductive. The singer must be actor, pantomimist, declaimer, must have strong voice and lungs, health and long life, if possible. All this the singer may and must have; if he have this, he may make his tedious mordente this way and that way; but the melting charm of a Sontag's or Lind's voice must pass for little;—that would disturb the ensemble, would divert the public from the composition in favor of a cultivated, noble voice; the composer might for a moment be ignored; the Art-work might be sullied, the principle profaned.

If it is made out, that the old, genuine art of singing is lost, and must be re-discovered, it is equally true also, that salvation for it is not, surely, to proceed from Richard Wagner. Already there are many singers, who can sing only Wagner, which on one side seems an excellence, but which in fact proves, that the idea of a pure cantabile has already become a real rarity.

If to a composer like Wagner we hear attributed the most accurate knowledge of instrumentation, yet in many quarters it is maintained, not without justice, that he is a second voice-murdering Verdi.

It was with real satisfaction that I heard the sparingly introduced song-oases loudly greeted by the public; the callings out were doubtless intended in the second place for the singers, when they succeeded in solving their ungrateful problems; the public knows how to respect such cheerful sacrifices.

There are signs and wonders just now, which may well confound the most inveterate Zukunfts man. In Berlin the back-sliding public listens to the seductive sounds of a—Rossini, from the mouths of technically cultivated Italian song-artists; in Berlin the most incredible things occur; the idolatrous people dance there about the golden calf of melody.—Who will wonder if the thirsting people yield themselves confidently to melody so long denied them, gushing from what they had believed a dried up spring, because a man, from obstinate riding to death of principles (if not from poverty) had thrown away the good with the bad, and had humbled the bearers (interpreters) of his operas (to speak with Berlioz) to the condition of his slaves!

O divine Mozart, should'st thou come back to earth, thou surely wouldst not, even as a man of the future, deny thine own nobility of genius; and even if it were with newly enlarged means of modern instrumentation, thou wouldst not forget to write thy operas for thy singers.

Ready-made Puffing.

The author of the Biglow Papers wished to save the world the trouble of criticizing his performance, and inserted, at the opening of the volume, a series of newspaper commentaries. He made them himself; and they were at least as impartial and as apposite as they would have been if they had been the genuine expression of newspaper criticism. The example set in fun on the other side of the Atlantic has never been seriously followed on this side, but very near approaches have been made to this culminating stroke of puffing. Here, however, the publisher, and not the author, generally undertakes the business. The opinions of the press are collected and clustered beneath the advertisement of the book's title. There are many stages in the art with which this is done. The lowest stage is scarcely distinguishable from the method adopted by the author of the Biglow Papers. Those of our readers who have purchased books at railway-stalls may have observed that one of the most enterprising purveyors of that kind of literature fills the initiatory pages of his volume with accounts of other books he has published, and that the titles are followed by disjointed criticisms to which the name of no paper whatever is attached. Certainly there is no fraud in this. Rather there is a sublime contempt for the public in inserting criticisms which do not even pretend to be the criticisms of any one. What a curious trade it must be to have the composition of these irresponsible bursts of admiration! Their author and the poet retained by Messrs. Moses must survey life from the oddest point of view. For both do their work well, and yet they must have the most fixed conviction of the inexhaustible folly of the world. Their fellow-creatures are so constituted as to be sure to be tickled by the most palpable devices and yet are worth tickling neatly. There must be a kind of cynical and monotonous fun in penning these criticisms. A new novel, for example, is written by A. B. and is put into the puffer's hands. He invents a number of little epigrammatic sentences which seem to have come from half the newspapers in England, and are ranged in a series under the advertisement of the novel. "A. B. has eclipsed himself." "Here we once more have our favorite, A. B., with his old quiet pathos, and more than his old aptitude for adventure, passion, and philosophy." "Pregnant, practical, precise," and so on. The next stage in this branch of puffing is to add the name of a paper no one ever heard of. The Ross Sentinel thinks "A. B.'s book a better realization of the ideal of fiction, than we have seen since the days of Pelham and Tom Jones." The Inverary Freeman considers that "A. B.'s novel may safely lie in the lap of youth and on the toilette table of beauty." We believe it to have been a well directed contempt for the panegyrics of these obscure journals that drove the publisher to whom we have alluded into the simpler and honest plan of having no journals mentioned at all. Then comes the stage in which the puffs are real extracts from real criticisms, but, the context being entirely omitted, the praise is rather invented than borrowed. For example, the critic has perhaps really said, "A. B.'s novel is well written, considering that, as he tells us, he only took a month to compose it, but this foolish haste and his inherent vulgarity have spoilt his plot, which he has borrowed from a well-known French tale, and which in itself is very interesting." In the puffing advertisement this criticism is somewhat abridged, and appears thus—"A. B.'s novel is well written, and the plot is very interesting." Of course, really respectable publishers who insert newspaper criticisms in their advertisements deal quite fairly with the public, and only repeat what has been actually said, but the advertisements followed by literary criticisms which proceed from such houses form but a small portion of the whole.

But what is an author to do who is unknown, or who cannot get his publisher to do all this for him? How is he to help himself? We can tell our readers exactly what, as a matter of fact, authors have adopted as their best engine of puffing. They print on separate pieces of paper, about a dozen short, telling extracts from their work, taking care to put the full title of the book at the tail of each extract. We have lately received a packet of such extracts, and the volume from which these extracts came bore the magnificent and imposing title of Grossmith's Government upon First Principles. This packet was accompanied by a letter from the author, intimating that these extracts might be conveniently inserted in a review of the book, and that, if this were done, he would do us the favor of advertising in our columns. Only to think of a man writing on First Principles and going in for such a little job as this! Certainly it is a disappointing world. In his volume, nothing is half good enough or great enough for Mr. Grossmith. He finds fault with the British Constitution and the Established Church. He wants to establish a pure theocracy; he cannot put up with any government unless it is "based upon the pure, innocent, and good." He has got a scheme for paying off the National Debt in two years. He asks a quantity of questions easier to ask than to answer. For instance, "Why have not the State and Protestant Church adopted Plato?" He is a learned man, and knows Hebrew, and Sanscrit, and Greek, and in fact almost every language, except perhaps English. And yet the end of it all is, that he offers to advertise, if the right extracts are inserted in a review. The worst of it is, that we cannot suppose that these pages of extracts were printed merely to be used once. These telling paragraphs must have been offered elsewhere, and the author of a theocracy has, we fear, inaugurated the advent of "the innocent and the good" by a sly attempt at wholesale corruption.

Among the thousand shades of puffing, these newspaper criticisms from no newspapers, and these extracts offered with a pledge of advertising, are perhaps the coarsest; but they make us think of the nicer and finer shades from which it is so much more difficult to free ourselves. The most innocent, and yet in some ways the most dangerous, form of puffing is that which takes the form of habitual, lavish, indiscriminating praise. We do not find fault with mere friendly criticism. Critics are men, and cannot avoid having tenderness for their friends. We may all honestly overrate the performances of a person whose works have much more beauty and meaning for us than for others, because we can see in them traces of character that we know and like. It is not dishonest to deal gently with the faults in our friend's book that we cannot help seeing. We do not even seriously quarrel with such an infantine audacity of friendship as recently prompted the author of a book on British novelists to include in the list his friend who was only going to write a fiction. But what we dislike is the habit of being evenly and universally civil to everybody. The same fear of small evils and hopes of small gains which prompts the coarser efforts of puffing prompts also this civility. Perhaps the critic is sometimes sincere. He likes namby-pamby writing, provided it accords with his school of theology, or betrays the power of catching his favorite smartness of language. But very often the critic allows himself to think so because he fears, if he reflected further, he might have to say things which would raise up enemies to himself personally, or to his friends, or to the publication in which he is interested. Thus he becomes encircled in a conventional sphere of laudatory platitudes. He is also haunted by a fear lest he should discourage a writer who, like himself, is trying to write his best, who has done as well as he could, and has to make his way.

All this runs into puffing. A critic has nothing to do with the feelings or prospects of a writer. If a book is a bad book or a foolish book, it is his business, so far as he can, to prevent it having influence or success. If soft hitting will not effect this, he must hit hard. It is not by any means a pleasant thing—and, at the moment, it is by no means an improving thing—to sit down and think how an attack on a book can be made as telling and severe as possible. But a bad book is a critic's enemy; and there is no use in firing with blank cartridge at a foe that it is our duty to get rid of. Fifty years ago, criticism was much more sharp and stinging than it is now. We do not wish to return to the sharpness and pungency of that time, because the fierceness and the attack then originated in the fact that the critic and the criticized belonged to different political parties. We have become wisely tolerant of difference of opinion; but in doing so, we have become unwisely tolerant of difference of merit. On the face of it, all this uniformity of favorable opinion is absurd. Every second book that is published, at least, meets with what is called a welcome from the press; and yet every one agrees that most books published are very bad.

People like our friend of the First Principles do good in their way, and by a kind of accident. From time to time they bring some peculiarly bad sort of puffing into contempt. They expose the machinery by which a stupid trick is worked, and for the future the public is so far more fastidious as to require machinery of a finer and more delicate construction. Henceforth, when we see an extract from a book no one ever heard of stuck between two accounts of gigantic cauliflowers, we shall know that it is all mere "Grosssmith," and shall look to the advertisement sheet to see if the compliment to Plato and purity has been paid for. Soon the public will begin to disregard the flattering encomiums from anonymous panegyrists that accompany the additions to Railway Libraries. Already we have got so far that the illustrative anecdotes that go to prove the unrivalled excellence of some sort of snuff, spectacles, or pills are generally required to be paid for and proclaimed as advertisements, and not inserted, as formerly, among pieces of public intelligence. The whole character of the English press gradually improves. If we take the exceptional instances, and contrast them with the highest standards, we find much to condemn and regret. There is an infinitude of twaddle, of prejudice and bigotry in nine-tenths of English newspapers; but still it is not only much the best press that has ever existed, but it is a great deal better than any other country could produce. If we compare it during any two periods, can we doubt that it becomes more decent, honest, and better informed? What it fails in is in power and freedom of thought. Puffing in some shape or other has too strong a hold of it. It sings in a very mild way the praises of all the sects and cliques and interests that occupy the country. It puffs whatever an orthodox majority thinks worthy of being puffed in politics, society, and religion. This puffing acts as a lamentable hindrance to independent thought. But, in the end, we have little doubt that independent thought will master it. It ought to be acknowledged that puffing is only one side of toleration. Praising everybody is a silly exaggeration of enduring everybody. Toleration is the great lesson of the present day; but, as it is purely negative, it will, we may hope, be followed by something that is fit to fill the vacant place which toleration has cleared. What we now think the finer shades of puffing may then perhaps seem as absurd as the imbecile stratagems of an author who expects, by forwarding a bundle of extracts, to procure a favorable notice of a book beginning with an inquiry into the Sanscrit name of the Deity, and ending with a plan for raising a revenue of four hundred millions a year without any one feeling the burden.

Mr. Macfarren's "Christmas" Cantata.

The cantata of Christmas (produced for the first time at the last concert of the Musical Society of London*), will undoubtedly add to the high reputation already enjoyed by its composer, whose May-Day (originally produced at the Bradford Festival of 1856) created so lively an impression at one of the performances of the Musical Society of London, last year. That May-Day was a work of remarkable ability, was universally admitted; but that Christmas has still greater merit is, we think, unquestionable. On the whole, it may be unhesitatingly stated, that no English musician, from the time of Purcell to the present epoch, has written anything in its way more genuine and masterly. With the poem, Mr. Macfarren has been quite as fortunate as in the instance of the Bradford cantata. The subject may be less essentially dramatic, but it has been treated by Mr. Oxenford so ingeniously that, in the absence of any bona fide story, we have a stirring dramatic scene, every incident of which is more or less interesting. The cantata opens with an antiphonal chorus, in which the two choirs alternately celebrate the dark and the bright side of winter. The grumblers begin:—

2nd Choir.—"The trees lift up their branches bare Against the sky:
Through the keen and nipping air,
For spring's return they seem to cry,
As the winds with solemn tone
About them sadly moan."

Whereupon the advocates of the frost period retort:—

1st Choir.—"Old Winter's hand is always free,
He scatters diamonds round,
They dart their light from every tree,
They glisten on the ground;
Then who shall call the branches bare
When gems like these are sparkling there."

At the conclusion of this Penillion-like contest, the opponent minstrels chime together—in song, at least, if not in sentiment:—

2nd Choir.—"Come in, and closely shut the door
Against the wintry weather;
Of frost and snow we'll think no more,
While round the fire we sit together."

1st Choir.—"Rush out from every cottage door,
'Tis brave and bracing weather;
A madder throng ne'er met before,
Than those which now have come together."

The music expresses with great felicity the contending feelings suggested by the words—the strains allotted to the proselytes of winter being as energetic and jovial as those in which its detractors give vent to their antipathy are lugubrious. This fine choral introduction is succeeded by a recitative and romance for soprano, "Welcome blest season"—an apostrophic to Christmas, the general tone and purport of which may be gathered from the opening lines of the second division:—

"Christmas comes; and friends that long have parted
Meet to change the loving grasp once more;
Many who have wandered, weary hearted,
Gladly seek the old familiar door."

The soft and soothing character of this piece is in thorough keeping, and rarely have the endearing associations connected with the subject been wedded to more graceful melody. The romance gives way to the famous old English "carol," first given in unison by the chorus; then with harmony, on which two sections of the choir are engaged, while the other two sing the tune; and lastly, in combination with a new subject, in a different measure, allotted to the orchestra, the theme of the "carol" being sustained by the entire choir as a plain song. The effect of all this is as fresh and vigorous as the contrivance is masterly. The next division consists of a "Christmas tale"—for contralto solo, with chorus—

"A bleak and kindless morning had broke on Althenay, Where, shunning Danish foemen, the good King Alfred lay."

This is built upon the story of King Alfred, on the eve of a victory over the Danes, relinquishing his last loaf of bread in favor of a mendicant pilgrim—and is so admirably treated in the poem, that had we space we should be tempted to cite it in extenso. We must be content, however, to add that the music is worthy of the poetry, and that in the introductory recitatives the imitation of the old English style of melody—which, by the way, is a prevalent and characteristic feature of the whole cantata—is here most signally successful. The burden, at the termination of each verse,—

"The heavenly King who reigns on high Bless him who hears the poor man's cry," first delivered by the solo voice, and then echoed, in full harmony, by the chorus, has something analogous to the response of the people in Mendelssohn's Elijah (Part I.), when the prophet petitions for rain, the serene loveliness of which, however, it modestly emulates, without in the slightest degree being open to the charge of plagiarism. An exquisite little duet for women's voices "Little children, all rejoice"—agreeably contrasts with the foregoing. The words remind us that to manhood the enjoyment of to-day may be checked with anxious thoughts for the morrow, while, to childhood, the happiness of the moment is all in all, tempered by no sad experience, weakened by no conflicting doubt. The contrast is well presented in the last four lines:—

"There is not a joy so true,
But we dread its change to sorrow;
Ah, it is not so with you,
Having days without a morrow."

Nothing can be more unaffected and spontaneous than the music to which Mr. Macfarren has wedded this duet. The finale—in chorus throughout—represents a festive celebration of the Christmas day's amusements, the various incidents that make up the sum of its substantial cheer and innocent sports being successively portrayed in brief and appropriate terms. The mistletoe, with its envied privileges, is, of course, not overlooked. Here the chorus again assumes the antiphonal form, the first choir giving a (useless) warning:—

Nay, be cautious, gentle maid,
As you pass that hanging bough
With the berries white arrayed;
For there's one has made a vow
That those lips he will invade:
And he'll keep it, we're afraid."

To which the second choir emphatically retorts by repudiating the idea of mistletoe-law ever being abolished. Perish the thought! The wassail-bowl, blind-man's buff, snap-dragon, &c., ad infinitum, are all remembered; and the subjoined "general chorus" brings this merry cantata to an end:—

"Varied sports the evening close,
Dancers form in busy rows;
Hoodwink'd lovers roam about,
Hope to find the right one out,
And when they fall how merry is the bout!
Round you flickering flame of blue
Urchins sit—an anxious crew;
Dainties rich the bold invite,
While from the fire the timid shrink with fright.
Welcome all, welcome all.
'Tis merry now in the vaulted hall,
The mistletoe is over head,
The holly flaunts its berries red,
The wassail-bowl goes gaily round,
Our mirth awakes the echoes round,
All eyes are bright, all hearts are gay,
Thus ends our Christmas day."

In setting this concluding scene, Mr. Macfarren has produced a most effective and exhilarating climax to a composition that does him equal credit in an artistic and a national sense; the thoroughly English tone which he has maintained from first to last—while only interpolating one existing melody (the "carol")—being no less worthy of admiration than its abstract musical beauties, or the ingenious contrivance and successful treatment for which it is everywhere remarkable. A question might be legitimately raised as to whether, when—the subject-matter being national—the aim of a composer is to preserve a strictly national feeling, the point of view should be, invariably and as a sine qua non, taken from the English melody of between two and three centuries ago? No one will deny that the Italians, French, and Germans, have a national style of music at the present time; and yet Rossini, Auber, and Weber—who may fairly be accepted as types of their respective nationalities—have little or nothing in common with their harmonious ancestors of ages back. Christmas is as appropriate to the nineteenth as to the sixteenth century; and Mr. Oxenford might with quite as much justice have parodied the vernacular of Spenser and Jonson as Mr. Macfarren the melody that prevailed in the time of Elizabeth, or during that which succeeded the Restoration. We are bound to add that in Christmas this imitation of the elder melody is not slavishly done, and that several numbers—instance the romance (for soprano), the song about King Alfred (for contralto), and the charming duet for women's voices—while quite as English as the rest, are the unquestionable inspirations of an Englishman, by the side of whom even Sir Roger de Coverly would figure as an ancient. But in his choruses, Mr. Macfarren seems to have considered it indispensable to seek his tune at the same well as his forefathers. Were we not convinced that this gentleman is one of the few capable of writing music, neither Italian, French, nor German, nor even a mixture of the three, but purely English, and at the same time English of the period in which we live, we should have refrained from these remarks, and indeed from any critical objection, satisfied with awarding well-earned praise to a composition of distinguished merit and originality.

The performance on the whole was remarkable—considering that the work had only the benefit of a single rehearsal (a fact, by the way, of which the Musical Society of London, while professing so much, has no reason to brag). The principal singers—Madames Lemmens, Sherrington and Sainton—were all the composer could possibly have desired, both in their solos and in their duet. The band, too, under Mr. Alfred Mellon, as usual, did wonders; but the chorus was by no means as efficient as might have been wished on such an occasion as the first public trial of a new and important work by an English composer. The audience, however, thoroughly delighted with the music, were not merely indulgent but enthusiastic in their applause. There is, indeed, every reason to believe that this performance will prove the forerunner of others, and that Christmas is destined to add one more to the brief catalogue of lasting musical works which our national repertory can boast."—London Musical World, May 12.

THE PARIS OPERA.—A plan relative to the construction of a new opera-house in Paris has been exposed to public inspection at the Mairie of the 9th arrondissement, in the Rue Drouot. The following history of the French opera will interest some of our readers. The French opera carries us as far back as the poet Baif, who, under the reign of Charles IX., assembled together a musical company, exclusively devoted to religious compositions. They held their meetings in a house in the Rue des Fosses Saint Victor, and were protected by the king. It was not until the ministry of Cardinal Mazarin, that the opera was in earnest introduced into France: at that period the words and music were Italian. The first opera in the French language was produced at Vincennes, and afterwards at the Hotel de Nevers, in 1659. It was a "Pastorale" in five acts—the words by Abbé Perrin; music by Gambert, organist of Saint Honoré, and composer to the queen mother. Ten years afterward the Abbé Perrin obtained letters patent, authorizing him to "establish in Paris, and other towns of the kingdom, musical academies for singing in public, as carried out in Italy, Germany, and England." A theatre was soon opened in the tennis grounds of the Rue Mazarine; the opera of "Pomona" was represented, but without success; and the establishment was threatened with complete ruin, when Louis XIV. by new letters patent, invested Lulli with the privilege of founding in Paris, on the largest scale, a royal academy of music. It was on the tennis-grounds of Bel-Air, in the Rue de Vaugirard, near the Palace of Luxembourg, that Lulli placed his theatre: it was opened on the 15th November, 1772, by the first representation of "Les Fêtes de l'Amour et de Bacchus." The death of Molière having left the theatre of the Palais Royal unoccupied, Lulli transferred his opera there. On the 5th April, 1763, a terrible fire destroyed the opera-house; and the 24th January following, the singers took possession of the "Théâtre des Machines," which formed part of the Palace of the Tuilleries. In the meanwhile the reconstruction of that of the Palais Royal proceeded actively, and the inauguration took place on the 26th January, 1770, by the reproduction of Rameau's opera of "Zoroaster." A new conflagration reduced the building once more to ashes. "On the 8th June, 1781," says Mercier, "a rope of the prosenium took fire by coming in contact with one of the lights, set fire to the curtain, the curtain to the scenery, which spread the flames throughout the boxes. All the theatre was consumed."

In seventy-five days a temporary house was constructed on the Boulevard Saint Martin, under the direction of Lenoir, (called Le Romain), an architect of some talent. This theatre, actually that of the Porte Saint Martin (in which the "Closerie de Gênes," a chef d'œuvre of the modern French drama, is now nightly represented), was first opened to the public by the first representation of "Adèle de Ponthieu," an opera in three acts, the words by Saint Marc, music by Piccini. In 1794, the opera quitted the Boulevard, and was installed in the theatre built by order of La Demoiselle Montansier, in the Rue de Richelieu, opposite the Bibliothèque Impériale, where it remained twenty-four years. On the opening representation in this house, for the first time benches were placed in the pit. The present French Opera-house was built on the spot formerly occupied by the Hotel de Choiseul, by M. Debret, architect.

La Juive.

The New York Musical World gives the following abstract of the plot of Halévy's famous opera, which has been attracting so much attention in New York, as produced by Maretzek at the Winter Garden.

The scene of the celebrated opera is laid in the city of Constance; the time about the year 1414.

The curtain rises and displays a representation of a public square; on the right are seen the doors of a church; on the left stands the store of Lazarus, the Jewish goldsmith and jeweler.

The first act introduces us to Leopold, Prince of the Empire, who has but just returned from a campaign against the Hussites, and if incognito, awaiting a public reception which the ecclesiastical and lay authorities have vouchsafed to him.

He is discovered in the disguise of an humble painter, hunting for the habitation of Lazarus the Jew, with whose daughter, Rachel, he has become violently smitten.

The day is full of interest. It has been proclaimed a general holiday, and a grand procession of princes and prelates is about to enter the city for the purpose of holding a grand council. The nation has recently been vexed by infidels; and he retires, and the council is convened to determine in what way the ascendancy obtained in late victories may best be maintained.

Lazarus, who is not only a thrifty and industrious type of his tribe, but a Jew, proud of his ancient faith, disregards the general holiday, and pursues his labor as a goldsmith.

Ruggiero, an over zealous magistrate of the city, who has just read the proclamation to eager masses of holiday loving citizens, perceives that Lazarus and his daughter Rachel heed it not. Indignant at this apparent disrespect to his authority, he orders their arrest, on the ground that they are contumacious infidels. Lazarus pleads that being an Israelite he is exempt from Christian laws. Ruggiero cries out that he thus imprecates the Christian faith, and Lazarus replies sternly that he has cause to do so, seeing that his children have perished upon the pyre by its edicts.

Ruggiero condemns them to death.

At this moment Cardinal di Brogni, president of the grand council, enters, and the prisoners are placed before him. He recognizes in Lazarus the features of a man who had witnessed the destruction of his wife and daughter, in a conflagration of his palace at Rome, before he, the Cardinal, was a follower of the Cross. The goldsmith recalls the circumstances to the Cardinal's mind, and touched by the remembrance of the agony he then endured, the latter pardons the Jew, appeasing the populace by saying that if rigor and violence made him hate the Christian faith, it is but right that forgiveness and clemency should be allowed to reclaim his heart.

Lazarus accepts the Cardinal's mercy with ill-favor, and retires to his store.

The crowd having dispersed, Leopold once more comes on the scene, and sings a serenade to Rachel.

The laws which separated Christians from Jews in those days were of the most stringent character. The penalty of intercourse was death to both. For this and for other religious reasons, the Jews were especially cautious of any intimacy between the members of their own families and those of Christians.

Leopold, fully aware of these circumstances, yet eager to gain the smile of Rachel, pretends to be an Israelite, and assumes the name of Samuel.

An interview takes place between the maiden and her lover, and Rachel finally makes an appointment to meet him at her father's house on an approaching holy feast, when all the sons of Israel are received under his hospitable roof with kindness and equal favor.

The interview is then interrupted by the return of the populace, who assemble in the square to witness the grand procession which is about to enter the city.

Rachel, and her father, Lazarus, pressed by the increasing multitude, strive in vain to find a place of safety. To protect themselves from the passing throng, they ascend the steps of the cathedral, thinking that there at least they may be secure for a moment or two.

Ruggiero, the magistrate, already once foiled, and anxious for revenge, no sooner sees this than he excites the people to avenge what he calls a profanation of the temple.

Lazarus, and his daughter Rachel, are now menaced by the populace, and in imminent danger of their lives. They are so near being sacrificed to the blind fury of the mob, that Leopold, unmindful of his disguise, rushes in with his drawn sword and gives them protection. He is recognized by the officers, who fall back, and as the grand procession now begins to move, the people soon forget one excitement in the promise of another.

Rachel and Lazarus, stupefied at this instance of power possessed and exercised by Leopold, whom they believe to be of their own tribe, retire to their dwelling, and the scene closes with a gorgeous spectacle of mediæval splendor.

THE ENTRY INTO CONSTANCE.

The second act conducts us to the abode of Lazarus, the Jew, where friends and co-religionists are assembled at table, and about to partake of the sacred feast of unleavened bread. Leopold is also there, but when the moment arrives for sharing with his host the hallowed morsel, throws his portion away. The act is observed by Rachel, whose suspicions, already excited, are heightened by this strange circumstance. For the moment her inquiries are stopped by the arrival of the Princess Eudoxia, who has called to purchase a jewel of great repute and value which Lazarus possesses. The suddenness of the arrival of this distinguished lady, and the magnificence of the retinue which she brings with her excite the alarm of the Jew, and he asks Leopold, whose prowess he has witnessed in the first act, to remain with him. Leopold does so, and to his astonishment recognizes in Eudoxia his own wife.

The situation is peculiarly striking. On the one hand, a faithful wife sacrificing her little all to procure a suitable gift for the victorious husband who is about to return to her arms; on the other, a perfidious man secretly pursuing a wrongful passion in disguise, and smitten dumb with this proof of affection of his own wife.

No mutual recognition ensues, but Leopold, overcome with remorse and agony, speaks a few words with Rachel, and follows Eudoxia from the room. Lazarus, who has observed his confusion, is embarrassed at its meaning, but suspecting nothing, invokes the blessing of Heaven on his child, and retires.

Overwhelmed with conflicting emotions Leopold returns and passionately divulges to Rachel the secret of his faith—that he is not a Jew but a Christian; prays that she will fly with him to some obscure retreat, where all the troubles of the world may be forgotten in solitude and love, and promises even to renounce the faith if she will do so.

Rachel, although sorely distressed and agitated by his recital, is on the point of yielding, when Lazarus, who has overheard the project of flight, surprises them. Leopold once more proclaims that he is a Christian, and the Jew, unable to restrain himself, or pardon the affront put upon his tribe, pronounces a deadly curse upon the head of the deceiver.

The whole of this eminently dramatic scene is powerfully wrought both by composer and author.

In the next act we are transported to the magnificent gardens of the emperor, prepared with lavish display to give welcome to Prince Leopold on the occasion of his return from the wars.

The festivities in honor of this event are progressing, when Lazarus and Rachel enter, bringing with them the jewel purchased for the occasion by the Princess Eudoxia, which they lay at her feet. The Princess receives it, and in the name of the Emperor, of honor, and of love, bestows it on Leopold, her husband and her lord.

Rachel who thus hears for the first time that Leopold—whom she has recognized—is a married man, tears the proffered gift from his neck, and in an agony of rage derides him as a coward and a thing unworthy of a badge of honor. Unmindful of the consequences, she publicly accuses him of her ruin—an offence punishable with death.

The intense consternation which this declaration produces, finds at length a voice in the Cardinal, who pronounces the anathema of the Church against the offenders, and accompanies the malediction with the sentence of death.

This scene is regarded by the ablest critics as one of the most powerful in the entire repertoire of modern music.

In the fourth act, Eudoxia, whose love for her husband warms with the recollection of his valor, and the knowledge of his peril, seeks an interview with Rachel—now in prison—and beseeches her to disarm the merciless judges, who have condemned Leopold to death, by declaring that her statement was false, and suggestive jealousy. At first Rachel is deaf to these pleadings of her disconsolate sister; but when she finds that they are purely unselfish, that she sues for Leopold simply that his life may be spared, and not that she would see him again, her pride is touched, and she resolves that a follower of the Christian Faith shall not, in liberality of soul, surpass a Jewish maiden. When the proper time arrives, she promises to save him and to die.

The Cardinal interposes his charitable offices, and endeavors to persuade Rachel to become a convert to the Christian religion, in order that her young life may be spared. It is in vain, and equally vain his essay with the sturdy Lazarus. The latter spurns the proposition, and scornfully laughs at the terror of death. But, if die he must, he would revenge his sorrows on one of the Christian faith.

For this purpose he relates to the Cardinal the particulars of the destruction of the latter's palace at Rome—referred to previously in the first act—when his wife and infant child were destroyed. The Cardinal, unable to bear the narrative, begs that the unhappy past may be buried in oblivion, and not recalled to agonize his soul.

"All was not lost," replies Lazarus; "a child was saved, your child, and still lives; but no one knows who saved her, and where she is, but myself."

The Jew's revenge is to die with this secret on his lips, but undivulged.

It is in vain that the Cardinal implores him to reveal the name of the conservator of all his hopes.

Lazarus is inflexible, and tauntingly tells the Cardinal that it was he who decided that the secret should be buried in the grave.

In the final act—that of the execution—Rachel and Lazarus are alone brought in, Leopold having been banished by supreme decree. Lazarus demands why the deceiver should thus be permitted to live, and the object of his deception compelled to die. He is told that a witness worthy of credit has declared Leopold to be innocent.

Rachel steps forward and says that she was the witness.

The moment of death approaches, and the Cardinal once more solemnly entreats Lazarus to reveal the secret of his lost daughter's whereabouts; to point out to him that only child who was surely saved from the flames to be restored to her father's arms.

An exclamation suddenly directs their attention to the place of execution.

"She is there!" shrieks Lazarus, pointing to the boiling cauldron into which Rachel has just plunged.

The Cardinal, overwhelmed with emotion, falls on his knees; the Jew proceeds firmly to execution.

BLIND TOM AND THE JAPANESE.—A Washington correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin writes:

The Japanese are very fond of children, and care all that they meet in the halls of the hotel. They have lately been in the habit of going out in groups of two or three, and sometimes singly, walking the whole length of the avenue, visiting shops, and gratifying their curiosity concerning our affairs. Usually they are attended by lads that have made their acquaintance, and they walk along, holding their hands, and smiling on their young white-faced friends, as if perfectly happy in their society. At a private concert in Willard's saloon, last evening, little Tommy was surrounded by Washington boys, and he sat with an arm around the neck of each of the two next him, evidently proud of his young American acquaintances.

The concert, which was for a short time attended by the head men of the Embassy, was a singular one. It was given to introduce to the Washington public the blind negro lad "Tom," ten years of age, whose marvellous talent as a pianist has been frequently spoken of in the Southern papers. "Tom" belonged to a gentleman of Georgia, in whose family were some proficient in music. No pains were taken to teach him, but, one day, according to my informant, the family were startled at hearing some one play with remarkable correctness and brilliancy, and going into the parlor, found "Tom," who had got possession of the piano, and without ever having touched it before, was playing a piece he had heard his young mistress play. This is the story given: as his showman says, "it broke out on him like the small-pox." True or not, the child is a marvel. He plays with great force and freedom, requiring to hear a piece only once to be able to re-produce it with great exactness. His touch is strong, his fingers are thin, tapering and flexible, his hands small, and he holds them with a natural ease and grace that a master cannot always give to a seeing pupil. His playing is not by any means faultless, but for a blind, untaught boy, it is astonishing, and his memory is utterly beyond all comprehension. A day or two ago, he was taken to a private house here, where two young ladies played a four-handed arrangement of the overture to Rossini's Semiramide, which he had never heard. When they had finished, he took the place of one of them, and played it correctly from beginning to end, without missing a bar, and actually correcting his accompanist, when, by turning over the leaves accidentally, she was playing wrong. The boy is the blackest and ugliest of negroes, and has shown no especial talent for anything but music. His nervous organization is excessively sensitive, and he weeps whenever anything annoys him. Last evening, after playing two hours, he cried bitterly at being taken from the piano. His other passion, besides music, is sugar-plums, and these will reconcile him to almost any disappointment. He has had no instruction, and has heard no great pianists. If he could do this, it would be of great advantage to him. He sings ballads in a hard, unpleasant soprano voice. Last evening he played at one time Fisher's Hornpipe with the right hand and Yankee Doodle with the left—bar for bar and perfectly well. This is only wonderful as the work of a blind child. The Japanese looked on and listened with stolid indifference, and it is pretty plain they have no enjoyment of our music.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

April 18.—The performances at the Grand-Opéra, of Pierre de Médicis, have been interrupted, by an indisposition of Mad. Gueymard-Lauters. Guillaume Tell was given last week. Meanwhile, the sisters Marchisio have arrived in Paris, and the rehearsals of Semiramide have commenced. There is some talk of Mlle. Marie Sax, of the Théâtre-Lyrique, being engaged here. The Château Trompette, of M. Gavaert, that had been put back at the Opéra-Comique in its rehearsals by the serious illness of M. Couderc, is now rehearsing, with Mocker in Couderc's part. The Roman d'Élvière is being played. The Belle Chocolatière, in one act, by M. Paul Dupuch, is also in rehearsal, and there is also some talk of the Petit Chaperon Rouge, of Boieldieu, being given ere Madame Faure-Lefèvre leaves. Mlle. Marmion, of the Théâtre-Lyrique, has been engaged at this opera. The privilege of the Théâtre-Lyrique, which was to have expired in a year, had recently been renewed by M. Carvalho till February, 1867. M. Réty will thus have nearly seven years of managerial career before him; and more, in 1861, he will inaugurate the new Théâtre-Lyrique, as the foundations of this building are already begun, and it is to be terminated by the 12th of next December. Madame Viardot's benefit will soon take place, and Tamherlik will probably sing at it. Madame Viardot is going to sing one act of Armide, and the sleep-walking scene in the Macbeth of Verdi, with Graziani. After Beethoven's Fidelio, the Reina Balkir, of Charles Gounod, will be given.

April 26.—The great question as to building a new opera-house for the French operas is at length quite decided. The building will be erected at the beginning of the Rue de Rouen and a street that is to run between the Boulevards des Capucins and the Chausée d'Antin. The direction of the works is confided to M. Ronault de Fleury. The general plan was deposited the 15th of this month, at the Mairie of the Ninth Arrondissement, in the Rue Drouot, and where for twenty days all observations of the public relative to the plan of the building will be received. As it is an undertaking that will probably cost twenty millions of francs, the pros and cons of the site chosen cannot be too attentively studied. Meanwhile, in what will be some months hence the old Grand-Opera-house, all goes on actively. Mad. Gueymard, who has recovered from her late indisposition, is gaining fresh laurels in Pierre de Médicis. The Sisters Marchisio are already studying their parts in Sémiramis; the part of Assur is definitively given to Obin: indeed it is probable that the singers will be ready long ere the scenery is. The latter is on a scale of unwonted magnificence, and Ancient Babylon is to be resuscitated in all her splendor in this modern Babylon. We can thus judge, which is the most preferable—I should say the latter. Decidedly, operas written by princes are windfalls to a theatre. The illustrious composer of Pierre de Médicis has presented M. Dietrich, the leader of the orchestra, with a magnificent platina chain; to M. Vaudrot, leader of the singing, a diamond ring; and to M. Victor Massé, director of the choruses, diamond sleeve buttons. Such brilliant tokens of gratitude are not to be disdained, though often a few words of heartfelt acknowledgement possess greater weight and more real value. Amongst such, we must cite the letter of Mad. Girard, the widow of the late chef d'orchestre, at this house, to the artists of the Conservatoire, thanking them for the concert they gave for her benefit, and in memory of the old chief. In a short time the Italian Opera will be deserted, and the foreign nightingales, that have so often charmed us there, will have taken wing. Last week, Tamberlik appeared in the part of Poliuto, in Donizetti's opera of the same name; Mesdames Penco and Merly filling the other characters. It was a grand "succès" for Tamberlik, who, with Mad. Penco, was recalled several times. Last Friday, Mad. Viardot's benefit took place at the Théâtre-Lyrique. Mad. Viardot sang the duo and sleep-walking scene of Verdi's Macbeth with Graziani, the third act of Gluck's Armide, and an air of Sonnambula. It were needless to add how brilliant was the success of her benefit, the many recalls, or the frantic applause—due, not only to her great talents, but also to the courage with which she has fought against the invasion of common place and second-rate music on the stage. Who, after her fine creation of Orpheus, or her acting and singing in Armide, could tolerate the evanescent trash with which we are overwhelmed!

The concerts are still going on. Last week Duprez gave a concert, in which an opera entitled Jeanne d'Arc, the music by himself, the words by M. Edouard Duprez, was given. It was in three acts, with choruses, orchestra, decorations, &c. Mlles. Maria Bennet, Battu, and Monrose, and M. Lefranc, sang the chief parts; the whole evening went off very successfully. The Association of the Musical Artists of France are preparing a solemnity of a new kind, to begin at the end of this month. It consists—not of a concert, but of a series of concerts, to be perpetuated from year to year. M. Beaulieu, of Nivert, is to be at the head of this. By his wish the concerts are to consist of the vocal music of the great masters not usually performed in public, because it is not thought attractive enough. The music will be drawn from all schools, styles, and kinds, and the execution will be as fine as is humanly possible.—Corr. of Lond. Mus. World.

BERLIN.—On Palm Sunday the Messiah was performed by Stern's society, with Frau Bürde-Ney in the soprano, and Krause in the bass solos. On Monday, Die Versöhnungsleiden, by Schnöpff's society. On Wednesday, Graun's Tod Jesu, by Schröder's society, and on Friday, at the Sing-Akademie, Bach's great Passion music.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—It was shrewdly said, by a great living musician in our hearing, "If you want to show your connoisseurship at a new opera, ask, Why do not they give 'Don Juan'?" The question might be answered conclusively in this wise. "Where is the Don Juan?" The right man has not alighted on our Opera-sphere since the days of Garcia—the next best to him having been Signor Tamberlini. The essay of Signor Mario amounts to a feeble and unsuccessful usurpation, in spite of his charming physical qualifications. But no canonical Opera-season can go round without the work being given,—no matter how unfit for the music be the singers. If we do not share the regulation raptures over every revival of this new opera, it may be for the same reasons as make us deprecate a "King Lear" shabbily cast, and prefer not to see "Antony and Cleopatra," if Miss Petowker is to perform "the serpent of Old Nile." There are fresh audiences every year. We know people who would prefer to hear the opera sung anyhow, to not hearing it at all. For both classes we must report on the two-hundred-times-told tale. Mr. Smith's novelties in the cast of the opera are as follows:—His Don, Signor Everardi, is less efficient than we had hoped that gentleman might prove, after seeing him in "La Favorita." There is no want of good-will in his performance; he is "up" in his part (as the phrase is), but his personation wants grace, and his voice depth. Mr. Smith's Zerlina is Madame Borghi-Mamo. She sings the music as it is written; but it is too high for her voice. There is many a high soprano able to sing the contralto repertory, so far as producing the notes goes; but the want of the quality is certainly to be felt. The music of Zerlina should be played with; under the circumstances case is impossible. Her performances are announced to have closed for the season; we suppose in consequence of the arrival of Madame Albani. Madame Titjens is Donna Anna, Mlle. Vaneri Donna Elvira, Signor Giuglini Don Ottavio, Signor Vialetti Leporello, and Signor Mercuriali, whose peculiar voice (as has been heretofore said) should be turned to better account, Masetto. It would only be so much lost time and needless vexation to point out in detail why, with this conjunction of singers, the music of "Don Juan" fails, somehow, to produce its wonted effect at Her Majesty's Theatre. For this evening "Rigoletto" is announced, to introduce Mlle. Brunetti, yet another French lady, and Signor Sebastiano Ronconi.

A spirited performance of "Il Barbiere" was given on Tuesday evening, at Her Majesty's Theatre. The admirers of Madame Borghi-Mamo (and she has many) have so commended, not merely her acting, southern accent and expression, but her execution, too, of Signor Rossini's music in "Otello," that to hear her in one of the maestro's operas became a matter of interest. But our account of her Rosina would be "It is the old story." Vocal proficiency is not to be snatched up in one part—laid down in another. The artist who cannot execute a scale on Tuesday, will not do so on Thursday; the organ incompletely developed will not grow to completeness in a couple of nights. Madame Borghi-Mamo has had a delicious voice, a mezzo-soprano of the "sweetest south" quality; but the voice, save by fits and starts, is no longer true. In the few opening bars of the Neapolitan "Santa Lucia," which was introduced in the lesson scene, we felt all the charm. The rest of the opera was, to our apprehension, a clever attempt at disguise—or rather, to make a want of finish pass for finish. Thus, for awhile, flourished Signor Fornasari; but the partial success of all such attempts—of all such simulations (not hypocritically meant, we concede, but inevitable as the consequences of careless training) is too dangerous to Art to be passed over. Madame Borghi-Mamo, here, as in Paris, dashes at every thing, gruppetti, scales, chromatic and diatonic; but here, as in Paris, we have failed to hear a true, cleanly-delivered passage from her lips. In vocal accomplishment, as compared with Madame Albani, she is what Madame Stoltz was as compared with Madame Viardot. Signor Everardi's Figaro is clever, busy, and well sustained. M. Belart's Count Almaviva extremely good; the music (to return upon our theme) honestly sung by him, without stint or unreality,—the acting an advance on former essays at acting.—Athenaeum, May 19.

MUSICAL SOCIETY.—The publication of Mr. Macfarren's new cantata "Christmas" (Cramer & Co.) coincident with its performance by that spirited body the Musical Society, on Wednesday last, enables us to speak with less hesitation on a new work than might have else been the case. It was a happy thought to have chosen "Christmas" as the subject of an English cantata,—but the choice, we are constrained to say, is better than the execution. The divisions are these:—a double chorus by way of introduction—a romance for soprano—a Carol, "A Christmas Tale," for contralto and chorus—a duet for two Ladies, and a finale describing a Christmas party. So far, well and good; but we cannot think that the verse is always suggestive, and in one point it is open to serious objection. Mr. Oxenford has failed to recollect that there are many good things to say (and to eat) which are not fit themes for music. We English have not become used to the familiarities of common life as connected with the art. A chorus that began, "How do you like this east wind, Mrs. Jones?" would rather puzzle a composer. We cannot reconcile ourselves to hearing of "goose," "turkey," "pudding," and "the lemon in the boar's jaw," in conjunction with flats and sharps. Why not "sage and onions," and "apple sauce"? There must be some discrimination in these things—there may be, as Moore, and Bayly, and Mr. Planché have shown, when writing for music, without the writer getting up on stilts. Mr. Oxenford has too much tact and scholarship not to avoid this defect, when its importance has been pointed out to him. It is one of first consequence to his partner; and, indeed, we can not but fancy it has been here felt so. On the present occasion, clever, and interesting as is Mr. Macfarren's music, it is forced in many places; as if structure had been thought of rather than the spirit of melody. The opening chorus, a winter scene, has more of the crudity, which we had hoped its author had laid aside, than is agreeable. The close, where the two choirs cross and reply to each other, is careful, if, in some of its progressions, too harsh to please the ear—but the leading ideas might have been turned to better account. In No. 2, the recitative is not well set. The melody of the Romance is elegant. The final cadenza, however, is an example of difficulty driven to its last point. It can hardly be executed neatly, save under exceptional conditions. No. 3, the Carol, is treated with great ingenuity, but the number is a long one; and at the risk of being anathematized henceforth and for evermore by those who, because a ditty is ancient, hold it to be therefore good—we must assert that the melancholy minor tune, so utterly at variance with the which form the burden of the song—however curious and venerable—has too much in it of the "frozen-out gardeners" to be welcome in such a place, were it twenty times as old English as it is. As if to make up for this, how is it that Mr. Macfarren has allowed such a modern German or modern French (?) garniture to the Christmas legend of Alfred in Athelney? The chorus that has asked for a tale should listen. Here, after having, without much ostensible reason, borne up one verse (not burden-wise) with a "Fal-lala," in the last stanza, they do all but anticipate the catastrophe by following so close on the heels of the narrator that narration is unnecessary. The Duetto No. 6, is very elegant. The Finale, No. 7, is robust and jovial, with some good orchestral effects. On every ground it is to be wished that a more favorable account could have been given as a whole of a work by two superior men; but seeing that English music is now struggling up towards a point higher than it has occupied—say since Parcell's time—on every ground it is necessary to speak plainly and clearly, as the duty owed by persons of honor to persons of honor.—Ath., May 12.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.—Every week will now for some weeks to come, be fuller and fuller of concerts, in the quality and variety of which there is obviously a rise. Dr. Wyld, the Amateur Society, the Vocal Association, and Mr. Hullah (not to speak of the great gathering of children at the Crystal Palace), have appealed, within the last seven days, to the public, all with claims above the average. Pity that such simultaneous appeals must of necessity imply conflict. A musical digestion of forty-ostrich power is insufficient for the demands of this London May. Only artists of extraordinary merit can escape from being borne down and overlooked. Last week we spoke of Herr von Lübeck as a good pianist; to-day we may offer welcome to another, M. Theodore Ritter, who introduced himself on Saturday last. This young artist seems to us to have a capital pair of hands, directed by an intelligent head. The English have justifiably become hard to please in Mendelssohn's second Trio, his rendering of which, however, greatly pleased us—so distinct was every florid passage; so well delivered, without exaggeration, were the more expressive phrases. In Weber's Rondo, in E flat, M. Ritter was light, sparkling, and very elegant. So far as we heard his own music, originality in point of creation is yet to come. He was assisted by M. Paque, and by M. and Madame Sainton-Dolby. The lady, by the way, has got a new ballad by Miss Gabriel, "The Skipper and his Boy," which she may possibly establish as companion to the "Three Fishers" of Mr. Hullah. Among the benefit Concerts of this week have been those of Miss Laura Baxter and Mlle. de Villar. Of Herr Hager's oratorio, produced, on Wednesday, at St. Martin's Hall, we must speak on some future occasion.—Id., May 19.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JUNE 5.—Quite suddenly, and unexpectedly, Max Maretzek has collapsed. With scarcely a word of preliminary notice, without any of the "last night" gag, he has left Winter Garden and, from being the manager of an Italian opera, condescends to lead the orchestra at Niblo's, where Nixon, the lessee, is about starting a series of what he calls "midsummer entertainments." Instead of directing the performance of Halévy's majestic opera, La Juive, Max will henceforth conduct a small orchestra, which plays the accompaniments to English songs sung by Mesdames VON BERKEL and ECKHARDT. What a fall was there, my countrymen!

The fact is, that last season both operas were losing money, and did not attempt to disguise it. But the rival managers each took a fiendish delight in supposing that his opponent was losing the most. How this may be, I cannot tell, but certain it is that the Academy folks "caved in" and beat a retreat the first. Maretzek was however too much exhausted by the contest to survive his victory very long. During the past week he ran La Juive, which, notwithstanding the magnificent singing and acting of STIGELLI, failed to draw good houses. Verdi's Masnadieri was twice advertised and withdrawn—the second time no notice of the withdrawal being given till the audience assembled before the closed theatre to be greeted with an announcement about the indisposition of Maretzek. It was however produced with some new singers at the matinée on Saturday, and, I am told, signally failed, owing to the utter inadequacy of the performers.

Mr. Ullman, who has been sick for weeks, is out again, and has, he states, already made arrangements for his fall season, to commence at the Academy of Music next September. He has engaged for prime donne, FABBRI, COLSON and ADELINA PATTI; for tenor, BRIGNOLI; for baritone AMODIO, and for basso, CARL FORMES. He expects to revive Le Prophète, Huguenots, Sicilian Vespers, and La Juive.

Little Patti at last accounts had given a successful concert at Pittsburg, assisted by Brignoli, who offended the critics by his lazy indifference, and by JUREKA, who delighted them with his dignified bearing and careful singing. There are amusing rumors afloat about Miss Patti's musical abilities. Some folks, who know her personally, say that she can scarcely read a note, and that to learn a new part, all the services of her entire family have to be called into requisition. Each passage is played over and over to her, till she is quite familiar with it, and thus by hour after hour of incessant labor on the part of her instructors—including MUZZIO—she gradually masters her rôle. This is a bit of gossip, like that which said that LA GRANGE used to learn an opera in two mornings, while taking her chocolate and muffins in bed. There is some more gossip about Brignoli, this time. They say he is remarkably well satisfied with this country, and declares himself to be that miracle, a "perfectly happy man." And why not, pray? He makes twelve hundred dollars a month, the greater part of which he lays up, till he has now hoarded between twenty and thirty thousand dollars. He allows himself five hundred dollars a month for his personal expenses, on this sum living (when in New York) at the Everett House, and keeping his horse and light carriage. His popularity is as great as ever; but it is altogether on account of his exquisite voice, for his manners are not calculated to win the regards of the public.

The concert season is now fairly over, and a weaker one has not recently occurred. The Philharmonic concerts offered nothing of special interest. MASON has given a few classical soirées, and the Harmonic Society has had a faint musical ebullition. There has been no genuine musical excitement, excepting the debut and success of Adelina Patti.

A New Musical Society.

With all the opportunities enjoyed in Boston for hearing the best music of all kinds, one great want has been felt and constantly expressed. One all-important problem remains to be solved. The want, the problem is a permanent organization, or orchestra — what is commonly called a Philharmonic Society — for the unfailing supply, at stated periods, every winter, of the best possible concerts of instrumental music, in which the Symphonies of the great masters shall, above all, become familiar to appreciative hearers, and in which the number of appreciators shall continually increase by hearing. It is not enough that we get chance supplies of what in a truly musical community is so indispensable; that every season brings its new experiment, corporate or individual, like those of Carl Zerrahn, which saves that season from being counted musically a blank. This constantly reorganizing the whole thing from the beginning, every year, without building upon any terra firma won the year before, and with capricious change of plan, adhering to no one policy until the tree is old enough to yield its proper fruit, grows more and more discouraging, alike to concert-givers and to concert-goers. It unsettles faith in any plan. It reduces the whole thing to mere dollar and cent calculations, until such enterprises get to be regarded among many people just as they regard any other mere pecuniary speculations, and they support them or neglect them according to the most momentary impulse of amusement. They cease to feel an interest and pride of Art in them. Such concerts fail to make the music-loving public feel itself responsible for their continuance and for their character. It is plain, too, that all concerts in which the first spring and principle of life is simply pecuniary profit, all concerts in which business is first and Art is only secondary, show and must show a constant gravitation downwards to a lower tone and standard. They inevitably cater, where they ought to lead, to educate and lift the audience above itself.

The lover of true Art in music will of course find many a chance gratification in the promiscuous programmes offered him in this way; but how much better would it not be if the best taste and love of music in a community should organize itself into some sure, efficient system of supplies of what it really needs and wants!

Such a proposal is of course vague and general. It needs some handle by which it may be taken hold of. The "musical public" is not a determinate, organic body, with its primary elections and its lists of voters, which can choose its representatives and agents. The leaders must be found out by their leading. There must be some one or several to go forward, taking the responsibility of the first steps and assuming management, which will sustain itself just so far as it is truly representative of the real musical want and feeling of the community. The natural leaders in such a movement seem to be those who are themselves artists and musicians, those who are to make the music, those who are supposed to be the best types of the real musical culture of the community in which they live. These men, if they have really the soul of artists, need such an organization for their own good — not their material, but their artistic good — need it to keep alive, encourage mutually, and elevate their own artistic tone and standard. They should form such a union as a mutual guaranty among them of artistic character and standing. And they need it at the same time as a medium for communicating their own artistic feeling, conscience and enthusiasm to a surrounding, ever-widening, sympathetic sphere of amateurs and earnest listeners and lovers. The Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig, the concerts of the Conservatoire in Paris, must be a great good for the musicians engaged in them, independently of all thought of material remuneration. Such concerts must afford to their own musical lives such sustenance, as the Alps or the White Mountains furnish to the landscape artists. They had better pay for them themselves than not to have them. It was a great thing for artists and for Art in London, too, when some of the principal musicians came together and organized their Philharmonic Society; for without that, Beethoven and Mozart would not perhaps be living influences to this day in England. And so, too, of the Philharmonic Society in New York. Fortunately, it was not started as a mere pecuniary enterprise, to give the musicians business. It was a league for Art, as the first end; for mutual material aid and comfort secondly, the incidental fruit quite sure to follow upon prudent management.

And now we have the good news that the same problem has been taken in hand by the principal instrumental musicians here in Boston. A BOSTON PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY has been actually organized. On Friday, May 25th, thirty-four well-known members of our recent orchestras met together, signed a constitution, and elected officers as follows:

THOMAS RYAN, President.
F. SUCK, Vice President.
C. EICHLER, Secretary.
WM. SCHULTZE, Treasurer.
CARL ZERRAHN, }
— DE RIBAS, } Associates.
— SCHLIMPER, }

We have not seen the Constitution, but we understand that membership is strictly limited to actual performers, who can only be admitted by a three-fourths vote, and who must in every instance pass muster as thoroughly competent according to a high standard, and must pledge themselves to the punctual and faithful performance of their respective duties, upon penalty of prompt discharge. The office of conductor is not limited to one person; but the government may use their judgment in appointing more than one, and in inviting individuals from outside of the Society, when it shall seem expedient. So far well. The objects of the Society are stated to be: "To advance the interests of the science of music in Boston, and to benefit pecuniarily its members." This is putting the two things in the right order, at all events. And now follows what seems to be the heart and kernel of the plan:

"Concerts will only be given when a sufficient sum shall have been secured to cover all expenses, and guarantee to each of those who may perform at a particular concert (and only those who do perform can receive compensation,) the sum of twelve dollars. By way of preparation for each concert, four rehearsals will be given (held?), of which two will be public."

This feature of the plan, as we find it reported (whether in the actual words of the constitution we know not), leads almost too naturally into another, unobjectionable enough in itself, but slightly suspicious in this connection:

"Such programmes for performance will be selected as will combine pleasure with a cultivation of the popular taste, independent of schools in music, and with a view to granting the public the entertainment for which they are pleased to pay their money, and to which they are willing to give their support."

What public? The public that will pay best. And therefore what entertainment, what music? Why, that which will pay best. And if it should happen to appear that Negro Minstrelsy would pay better than Beethoven and Mozart, and that a band of brass, without any fiddles, would pay better than the best symphonic orchestra, would the Philharmonic Society perhaps be willing to accept that level, and, following up a thriving business wherever it might lead, still leave the Philharmonic problem as unsolved as ever? We do not of course fear anything so bad as that, but we suggest the worst to indicate what seems a questionable tendency in the very egg about to be hatched.

Of course every friend of music must rejoice in everything that adds to the material prosperity of the musicians. They work hard for our pleasure, and as a general thing are meanly, miserably rewarded. They exercise the common right, the common duty, when they seek like other men to make that industry to which they devote their lives support them. Concert playing costs much time and labor, and is too apt to prove a poor pecuniary investment of such poor man's capital. All this we too well know, and there are few things which oftener touch our sympathies than the worldly fortune of musicians. No one can wonder or can blame them, if they insist on jealous stipulations against loss of money and of time, when they are called upon to minister to public pleasure and instruction. It behoves them not to lose sight of the economical side of the matter. But there is such a thing as an economy which is penny-wise and pound-foolish. There are cases where one gains by freely giving; and in all cases one must give to acquire character, on which all gains in the long run depend. Now we should have more faith in a Philharmonic Society which organized itself firstly and principally for the purpose of keeping up among its members a high artistic tone and character; of mutually guarantying one another against the artistically demoralizing influence of the daily pursuit of music as a mere business; of creating for themselves opportunities of uniting in the performance, the interpretation of really noble and inspired works, as an offset to daily and nightly drudgery, in theatres, in street bands, in lessons, in whatever tends to drag them down from the high character of artists to the condition of mere hack musicians; and then, secondly, and as a natural complement to this, for the purpose of interpreting such noble works to others and of thus building up a large society of listeners and lovers in communion with them. To any musician it is really worth the while, even in an economical point of view, to do this even without assurance of a farthing of immediate pecuniary profit. It is better that such things be done in faith, than for mere wages. It lends the enterprise a better spirit; the public feels the finer temper of it, trusts it more, is more attracted to it, as to a thing that has a real magnetism, a body with a soul in it. If a number of musicians form a business company just for the sake of earning certain wages, by catering for a few hours now and then to fancied public tastes and appetites, what does the public care about it, save as any one may feel disposed at any time to indulge in the amusement for the time being? Why should it interest the friends of music more than anybody's private business does? But if musical artists associate themselves in the name of Art, for Art's sake, then at once they have a claim on all who love and value Art; then sympathy and support naturally flow to them from all sides: their success becomes the common cause; the character of the union is kept up, continually improving; and the result is, (the more sure, because it is made only incidental) that generous material support is never wanting.

For this reason we should have been glad had our musicians, in laying out their plan of concerts, been content with simply guarding themselves against possibility of pecuniary loss. It would look more as if the motive of the thing were really artistic, and would inspire more confidence. Why the "twelve dollar" condition? Why stipulate for any wages, and so trifling an amount at that? If one can give the hours required for each concert with its four rehearsals for twelve dollars, can he not almost as well afford to give them for the pure artistic satisfaction of the thing? And this we take to be the very meaning of a "Philharmonic" as distinguished from a mere business society for music. This is what the friends of music want when they call for a Philharmonic Society. Give it the real Philharmonic character first, and then trust to the natural working of it for pecuniary returns. Show us a tree all beautiful with blossoms, and then we may expect fruit.

Musical Chit-Chat.

OPERA. The CORTESI company closed their season, according to programme, at the Boston Academy after one week's performances, with a Travatore matinee on Saturday, when Do di petto made his third hit. On Thursday evening Norma was rendered rather shabbily, with PARODI as Norma, who has neither truth of intonation nor of expression; MUSIANI, for the consul, whose large voice lent not much interest to the part; SUSINI, stately and sonorous as Oroveso; and for Adalgisa, a young lady, Miss MONTMORENCY, (her first appearance), with a pleasant mezzo-soprano voice, not without feeling, but timid in the use of it. On Friday Rossini's genial and delightful music of "The Barber" gave fine scope to the rich voice and finished execution of ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. TAMARO, too, as Almaviva, and BARILI, as the barber, won approval; but the Don Bartolo was thought inferior, and fat AMODIO sacrificed the music of Basilio to broad farce.

Next Tuesday evening, (it is hinted in newspaper paragraphs, though we as yet see no proper advertisement of the fact), a new troupe is to commence a series of operas at the Academy. It is said to be a combination of artists from Ullman's, Maretzek's and the Havana troupes, who will begin with Ernani, the cast including Mme. FABBRI (who we are sure will please), and MUSIANI, SUSINI and AMODIO. Some say that Maretzek is to be the head, and that the new pieces recently given at the Winter Garden, "The Jewess," I Masnadieri and Stradella, will be brought out. If they give La Juive, let us suggest that it be made somewhat shorter than it was in New York, — at all events that there may not be unnecessarily long intervals between the five acts.

What was the meaning of the simultaneous appearance in several of our Boston papers last week, of the following opinion expressed with slight variations? Why did not the new Sappho wear the laurels?

"The part of Saffo, in which Gazzaniga has been so successful is now thought to be without a representative in this country capable of imparting to the character the effect it requires; but those who indulge in such a supposition are in error, for Madame Cortesi has won laurels for the ability which she has displayed in the opera of 'Saffo' elsewhere. A strong desire exists among her Boston friends to compare her performance with that of Gazzaniga, and we hope she may be induced to accede to the public wish before she leaves us."

Whether she can sing Saffo or not, CORTESI has at least one unqualified admirer. "Ada Clare," of the New York Saturday Press, airs her enthusiasm thus:

"'See Cortesi and die,' is now the manner in which I render the old adage of 'See Naples and die.' Not but what it would be better to see Cortesi and live, since she vastly enhances the pleasure of living; but one should not die without having seen her, for I doubt, indeed, whether the upper spheres would be capable of making up her loss. These remarks read like extravagance, but it is bad to temper one's admiration, and the Cortesi is not a person to be coolly reasoned about. For me, she is the most superb exponent of the lyric art, whom I have ever met. She is one of those deep and grand natures which expands the capacities of the lyric stage to the expression of all that is large and lofty in human intellect. For a woman not to admire Adelaide Cortesi would be gross ingratitude; for she is one of those talents that vindicate the ability of our sex; she redeems in her own proud self the miserable weary little nonsenses which form the whole lives of most of us.

"It is only on the stage that woman has outstripped the utmost efforts of man, and grandly triumphed over him in the uttermost sense of the word. In that kingdom of this globe, the highest honors, the proudest triumphs, the chief part of the world's worship, and the largest pecuniary profits, belong to women.

"I think I know how to explain this fact. It is only on the stage that the woman is taken out of the world's straight-jacket, and left with free limbs and free soul. The actress, the singer, may put away convention, cant, and hypocritical moralities as very small worms whose crawl is too insignificant to be noticed. Her beauty, her talent, her instinct, her oratorical or vocal powers, her grace, her passions, are all to be used to their utmost and most godlike extent. She is to go forth and be great without illustrating any moral tract.

In literature, in science, in the other arts, the opposite principle prevails; the woman who attempts to work, must wrench out all that is truly passionate from her nature, before she can be considered the respectable and useful worker.

O! fools, fools, fools, that we are! We sacrifice the one sublime gift that nature gives us to cope with men—Instinct; beautiful, sacred, heaven-given instinct. * * *

"I have spoken of the superiority of the woman to the man on the stage. I think as proof that I need but mention the names of Cortesi, of Ristori, of Rachel, of Grisi, of Fabbri. These names are more eloquent than any words I could write."

Fine, all this, in the abstract, as applied to some imaginary and ideal prima donna; but if such a sun did actually rise before us all, how strange that only Ada saw it!

Musical Intelligence.

NEW ORLEANS. The opera still outlives its season. We glean from the Picayune of various dates.

May 10. Verdi's "Jerusalem" was given at the Opera House Thursday evening to a good house, in most commendable style. The mounting of the opera was as superb and imposing as the cast was strong and capable. Geismar, who has all the season been going on from triumph to triumph, making every newly assumed role an improvement, even on the last, made a great hit as Helene. Mathieu was fine as Gaston, and, in brief, the performance was one of the most decided successes of this highly successful season.

May 23. There was a good, but not over-crowded house, at the opera, Monday night, to enjoy another performance of the glittering show-piece, in which Colson is so charming, "The Loves of the Devil."

The season will close on the 3d of June. Meantime, Mons. Philippe, the first tenor of the Orleans theatre, who, with Mathieu, is to sustain the tenor roles in grand opera here next season, will give one or two performances of John of Leyden, in Meyerbeer's "Prophète."

May 24. There was a remarkably nice performance of the "Norma" Tuesday night, at the Opera. Geismar was, as ever, fine in the role of the Druidess and was most ably seconded by Pretti, as Adalgisa, while Mathieu gave to the part of the Roman Proconsul a most admirable interpretation. Vanlair as Orovoso was effective, and so was the chorus. There was a good house, and the opera went off amidst judicious, and at the same time constant and enthusiastic, applause.

As we near the close of the season we are more and more deeply impressed with the value of Geismar as a member of the company, and, moreover, with the conviction that the management cannot leave her out of the programme for the next season. She has great versatility as well as abundant talent—now appearing with credit as the stately Norma, and now as the simple peasantess, Rose Friquet, in the "Dragons de Villars," with equal success. By all means, let us have Geismar next winter.

This evening, for the benefit of Mr. Gennibrel, the popular basso, we are to have a great cast of the "Don Juan" of Mozart. Colson is to be the Zerlina; Melchisedec, the Don Juan; Ecarlat, the Ottavio; Pretti, the Donna Anna; Dalmont, the Elvira; Gennibrel, the Leporello; Vanlair, the Commendatore, and Chol, the Masetto.

May 27. So far as Mmes. Colson and Debleye, and Messrs. Melchisedec and Dutasta were concerned in it, the performance of the "Fille du Regiment," at the Orleans theatre, Friday night, for the benefit of an unfortunate artiste, was very well worth sitting out a warm evening to witness.

They entered into the spirit of their several roles, sang as well as they were permitted to do by circumstances, and carried off the opera, upon the whole, very successfully. Colson was particularly sparkling and effective in the role of the little vivandiere, and Melchisedec made about the best Sergeant Sulpice we remember to have seen, saving and excepting Edward Seguin. Dutasta and Debleye, as the stupid old duchess and her steward, made a good deal of fun. But as to all the rest, Tonio, the chorus, and the orchestra, "Come thou, expressive silence, muse their praise."

At the Opera, last evening, Mme. Colson gave us another performance of her fascinating part of Urid, in "Les Amours du Diable."

This evening Mmes. St. Ange and Marechal present an attractive programme for their joint benefit; a drama and musical interlude.

Monday evening M. Philippe, the popular first tenor of the company lately singing at the Orleans theatre, and who has been engaged by Mr. Bodousquie for the next season, will make his first appearance on these boards, in the role of Fernand, in the "Favorite," that other favorite artiste, Mlle. Geismar, being the Leonora.

Only one week remains to us, now, of our opera season. It has, on the whole, been a brilliant one. The new Opera House has commenced its career most auspiciously, and fully realized to the public the flattering promises made in its behalf by the enterprising manager. And now, as his first season draws to an end, he has good reason to be satisfied with the success of his experiment. Of the artistes brought over by him, last fall, two only have failed to earn and to maintain to the close the favor of the public, and they have, some time since, returned to Europe. But Geismar, Mathieu, Melchisedec and Gennibrel, all of whom are reengaged, we believe, stand firmly entrenched in the good opinion of our music loving public. Besides these, we learn that Mr. Boudousquie has positively engaged the excellent grand tenor, Philippe, and Cabel, the favorite tenor leger of the late Orleans theatre company. What other engagements he has made for the next season, we do not learn exactly; though there is a rumor of negotiations pending with a very talented prima donna, now in Paris.

Before the next season comes, the auditorium of our new and beautiful Opera House is to be elegantly decorated; the best company, operatic and dramatic, possible to be procured, will be engaged, and every effort will be made to make the next an improvement upon the last season, excellent as that has been. Already the greater part of the sittings have been engaged, for the Tuesday and Saturday nights and a very large number for the Monday and Thursday performances.

May 30. The Opera House was filled to overflowing, Monday night. The special attraction was the great performance of the favorite tenor, Philippe, on that stage. It was painfully evident from the commencement that he was not in good condition. His voice was palpably uncertain, and he seemed to be afraid to trust it. He got on very well, however, under the generous encouragement of an audience evidently greatly prepossessed in his favor, until the trying fourth act of the "Favorite." The beautiful aria, "Ange si pur," ("Spirto gentil,") he sang with much less than his usual force and effect, and in the great duet which follows, his voice gave way at the most trying point. Mlle. Geismar, with admirable self-possession and presence of mind, took up her part in the duet, and gave it with brilliant effect, amidst the warmest plaudits of the audience. On the repetition of the passage, Philippe rallied bravely, and gave the required note with the full force of his fine organ. He was called before the curtain, as both he and Geismar had been several times during the progress of the opera, and seemed to feel sensibly the indulgence of the audience.

To-night, two acts of "Si j'étais Roi," in which Cabel and Colson appear, and the entire "Trovatore" with Ecarlat, Melchisedec, Dalmont and Geismar; the evening's performance to be for the benefit of Mme. Dalmont and M. Cabel.

NEW YORK. The magnificent opera of "The Jewess," which created on its presentation in Paris as much genuine popular approval as any work ever produced there, is now being performed in capital style at the Winter Garden. We have never heard more intense applause bestowed on artists than that excited by Mad. Fabbri and Mr. Stigelli in various points, especially at the conclusion of the first act, and in his superb aria and scena. The manner in which this work is given—the liberal and elegant stage arrangements, the splendid costumes, the excellent orchestra, the capital singing, ought to make the fortune of a season; and if New York be not satisfied, it will wait a cycle without such delectation. But this is not enough, so we have yet another new opera—one by Verdi—one at least not known here—founded on Schiller's "Robbers," the principal part written for Jenny Lind when she appeared in London.

It requires vast labor and professional experience to urge upon the stage so many operas as have been rendered this season at the Winter Garden, and by all the usages of reward for superior efforts and deserts, the houses should be crowded; for the city is full of people, resident and travelling, who should have the taste and means to attend these entertainments.—Tribune, June 4.

CLEVELAND, O. On Friday evening, June 1st, there will be a Grand Concert under the management of the favorite manager Strakosch. The star of the evening will be the celebrated Miss ADELINA PATTI, the "bright particular star" of the New York Academy of Music. She will be assisted on the occasion by Madame Strakosch, Brignoli, Ferri, Junca, and Maurice Strakosch himself.

PHILADELPHIA. THE GERMANIA.—The last rehearsal of the Germania was held on Saturday, and was attended by an immense assembly, even ladies being obliged to stand in the avenues. The season ended brilliantly, and every thing encourages the orchestra to keep together and continue their instructive and interesting rehearsals in the autumn. Much good has been done by the Germania to the taste of our citizens in instrumental music, and the change is clearly perceptible from the time when the afternoon concerts scarcely attracted five hundred people, to the present day when two thousand are crushed into the Musical Fund Hall to enjoy the finely selected programmes.

We are enabled to state that Mr. Sentz will resume the leadership of the orchestra as soon as he returns from Europe, if circumstances should permit him to take his contemplated voyage.—Fitzgerald's City Item.

ROXBURY, MASS. The organ in the Unitarian Church at Jamaica Plain has recently been enlarged by adding another manual—the Choir Organ—and nineteen stops, at a cost of $2000. It is now one of the most complete church organs in New England, having 13 stops in Great, 8 in Choir, 13 in Swell, which extends throughout, and 5 in Pedals. Having been favored with a hearing of this instrument we found it fully up to the high standard which Messrs. Hook have established. In equality and purity of tone and power it rivals their best achievements in organ building. The society worshipping there are delighted with this new evidence of skill and faithfulness of Messrs. Hook, and the opening was commemorated by a sermon from the Pastor, and a well sung Te Deum by the Choir.—Evening Gazette.

HAVANA.—Letters speak of the continued success of the Italian Opera at the Tacon Theatre, where the Sisters NATALI, of Philadelphia, are the chief attractions. Although the fashionable season was past, they continued to have fine houses, and the enthusiasm of the public was immense. Norma, the Trovatore, and Lucrezia had been played a number of times, and they had brought out Il Giuramento, which had been performed three times with immense success. Agnes took the part of Elisa, Fanny that of Bianca, Signor Testa (the husband of Fanny) that of Viscardo, and Florenza that of Manfredo.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Quantities of Music are now sent by mail the expense being only about one cent apiece, while the care and rapidity of transportation are remarkable. Those at a great distance will find the mode of conveyance not only a convenience, but a saving of expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent by mail, at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that, double the above rates.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Fondest, dearest, good night. Quartet. Alt. 25

This is a four-part song of genuine merit, and is a charming gem for a parlor concert or serenade.

'Neath the old arbor tree. Song. R. S. Taylor. 25

A plaintive melody and well adapted to the words, which are of good sentiment.

The Lover of 72. Comic Song. C. W. Glover. 25

This is a capital and very humorous song, and every lover of mirth should secure a copy.

Before and after marriage. Comic song or duet. T. B. Brett. 25

Quite effective as a duet, and would please much at a minor concert.

With Guitar Accompaniment.

My Brother's Grave. Arranged by Curtiss. 25

Two beautiful melodies well arranged, with accompaniment for the Guitar. They will commend themselves. The latter acquired celebrity as one of Jenny Lind's finest songs.

Instrumental Music.

Mazurka des Traineux. Arranged for 8 hands, by T. Bissell. 1,25

Ascher's best mazurka, so deservedly popular; excellently arranged for four performers on two pianos, and adding another gem to the list of exhibition pieces, which are in much demand.

Prière d'une mère. (A mother's prayer.) L. P. Gerville. 35

A companion to the universally popular "Maiden's Prayer." A beautiful strain of a devotional character, imbedded in ornamental passages of the most pleasing kind. Medium difficulty.

Maple Leaf Waltz. J. L. Ensign. 30

A parlor waltz of more than ordinary merit, evincing talent and scholarship.

L'Agate. Valse brillante. O. J. Shaw. 35

A melodious and effective "morceau de Salon."

Books.

CONVENTION CHORUS BOOK. A collection of Anthems, Choruses, Glee and Concerted Pieces, for the use of Musical Conventions, Choral Societies, &c. 30

No more useful book for Musical Gatherings has been published, if indeed anything equal to it. The pieces it contains have hitherto been distributed through half a dozen or more large and expensive volumes, the purchase of which was impossible to persons of limited means. In this form they can be obtained at a trifling cost. Societies, Choirs and Musical Clubs will at once provide themselves with a full supply of this valuable collection. Its contents will be found invaluable for practice.

Madame Clara Novello.

The circumstances by which the infancy of Madame Clara Novello was surrounded, were singularly propitious for the development, if not for the germination of the true artistic spirit; for elevation of mind to the comprehension of lofty subjects, and thus for her qualification to the special position she holds as a singer of sacred music. We have dwelt at some length upon the associations of her childhood, because, however indirectly, these must have influenced her entire career, and thus constitute an essential, though perhaps an undesigned, portion of her intellectual education. It would have been of comparatively small value that she was gifted with a voice of such loveliness and power,—that her mind was prepared for the perception of the subtlest beauties in the art to which she was devoted,—had not her natural organ been brought, by training, so completely under control as to enable her fully to realize her own conceptions. In this respect her advantages were as great as in the other two; for her scholastic education was fully as fortunate as the general circumstances from which her mind received its first bias.

In 1824 her family was residing at Paris, where she received musical instruction from M. Fétis, at present director of the Brussels Conservatoire, author of the Biographie Universelle de Musiciens, together with many didactic works, and composer for the church and the theatre. M. Fétis was at that time professor in the Conservatoire of Paris. By his advice his young pupil became a candidate for admission into that institution, where, instruction being entirely gratuitous, there is a limit to the number of students; and as vacancies arise they are filled up by the most promising candidates who may compete for the advantage. It was somewhat adventurous to bring forward a child of six years old to contend with girls of double or threefold her age, at an election in which physical and mental powers, voice and intellect, were the qualifications for success. Choron was the head of the department to which the friends of little Clara desired her to be admitted; and to this eminent master she was accordingly taken for examination. The piece chosen for the display of her ability was a bravura from Arne's Artaxerxes, "The Soldier tired." Time was, but is now no more, when this song was regarded as the infallible test of vocal proficiency in England; the pretensions of any singer were acknowledged who could pass the ordeal of the volleys of triplets she had to fire through in "The Soldier tired," and whosoever ventured not to essay the voluble divisions of this proof of skill was classed derogatorily as a ballad singer, and esteemed accordingly. Twenty years having elapsed since Artaxerxes,—the only English opera which till then had held permanent ground through successive generations of singers and listeners,—has been witnessed on the stage, they whose memories extend not farther back have no chance of recollecting "The Soldier tired," except through the trumpet of Mr. Harper, whose remarkable execution, while it proves what he can do as a trumpeter, shows also how much (or how little) was expected of a prima donna in London, previous to the year 1840. Now "The Soldier tired" appears to have been admired in England alone; its merits, such as they are, and its elements of vocal display, such as we were wont to esteem them, escaped the appreciation of the Paris professor. This effort of the young aspirant failed to convince the commentator on Albrechtsberger of her precocious talent, and he required another specimen of her ability in a style with which he was more familiar. Clara, who was not to be discomfited by Choron's anti-Anglican predilections, now sang the "Agnus" from Mozart's Mass in F, in her performance of which she displayed such genuine musical feeling, and such singular promise, that she was unhesitatingly preferred over nineteen competitors. You may, if you will, suppose her success in this beautiful air to have been in some degree, due to her life-long familiarity with ecclesiastical music, the practice of which constituted her father's chief professional avocation, since its style must have become, from constant association, as a second nature to her. You may, if you will (and, though not fatalists, our will must coincide with yours, if you be thus willing) regard this infantine triumph as an augury of the distinction as an interpreter of the greatest works of the first masters of sacred music, which the little girl, who had not then cut her wisdom teeth, was destined to attain.

Clara Novello's studies in the Conservatoire were principally directed to sacred music, in which her rapid progress won the admiration of all who witnessed it. Here we trace a cause, as we have just supposed a prognostic, of her excellence in that department of her art in which she will be especially missed when she retires from public life. Such was her early proficiency that she was soon capable of sustaining a part in the performances of the students; but as it was out of all propriety that so small a person should be ranked with her unproportionable associates, accordingly, as the only means to fit her to take her stand beside them, she took it on a stool, and thus was raised to an elevation of stature approximating to her elevation of talent. For six years she continued the course of instruction afforded by the Conservatoire, whence she derived that solid foundation in the principles of the vocal art which may well be supposed to have secured her first success and enabled her not only to maintain, but consolidate it. In 1830, however, occurred the famous July revolution, which, while it changed the dynasty, greatly disturbed the arrangements of all institutions dependent on the monarchy, and, among others, the Conservatoire de Musique. This fact, combined with other circumstances, induced the removal of Clara Novello to London, and here, in her native city, began a new epoch in her education.—London Musical World.

The Mendelssohn Statue Festival.

CRYSTAL PALACE, SYDENHAM.—There is on record the career of no musical artist, creative or executive, which can be compared with that of Mendelssohn, as regards love, hope, joy, success, prosperity, intellectual cultivation, immediate recognition,—all that makes a heaven on earth. A more complete life than his, till within a very short time before the dark veil fell around him, is not to be imagined. When has a death been so mourned? It might be almost said that the love of survivors has shown itself in passionate excess, as regards his music,—in this country at least,—so unceasing has been the reference and return to it. The enthusiasts in England could be numbered by hundreds—what do we say?—by thousands, who will not admit that an uninteresting note or a weak bar is to be found in any music bearing his name.—Never were concert compositions more incessantly played and sung. Never has a great work (not an opera) been so instantaneously placed on its high pedestal as "Elijah" in England. The celebration of yesterday week, if regarded with these considerations may be characterized as unique. It was one for all those who knew and loved Mendelssohn (and who that knew him did not love him?) to take part in, and to recollect with no common feelings. "How he would have enjoyed it!" was ever present as a thought,—without regard to the incoherence of such fancy. For all that was festive, heartfelt, picturesque, who that ever lived had a more exquisite relish than he? He was reconciled to the miserable execution of his "Lauda Sion," in St. Martin's Church at Liège, by the evening sun streaming through the windows on the circle of richly-clad ecclesiastics who sat to hear the sermon,—by the curling fumes of the incense,—by the bell in time that marked the rhythm of the last chorus as the Sacrament was displayed.—A few days later, when he was made a freeman of Cologne, how delighted was he from his balcony to see the lanterns ("fire-tulips," he called them) of the serenaders winding out of a crooked street, leading into the Malsbuehl, and when the music was over, dancing away somewhat unsteadily,—for, sooth to say, the serenaders had supped jovially on Rhine wine! How would he have enjoyed the beautiful May-scene of yesterday week.—A more beautiful May-day and May-night could not have been bespoken! Along the road and rail from town, the trees, sprinkled with late but most delicious green,—the heaps of white fruit-blossom,—the bright sky,—the gracious air,—all helped to make symphony for a holiday, to the fresh and cheering influences of which none would have been more sensible than the poet mouldering in the narrow house, in whose honor the day was kept.

Such a day is so full of memories, yearnings, affections, running throughout all its beauty as a sweet though mournful undertone,—that to record its events coolly is not an easy task. But it must be tried;—unless for record rhapsody were to be obtruded; and to be content with the latter would amount to irreverence to one of the most just, while most liberal, judges of his own art with whom the world has been conversant. Let us, therefore, attempt to convey the impressions made by the performance of "Elijah."

These on the myriad audience were various, dependent on the place of the auditor, his power of taking into account matters whether accidental or essential, the kind of expectation raised in him, his willingness not to exact precisely the same emotions from every pleasure in which he partakes, and, because some familiar delights are wanting to close ears and sympathy to others. We were prepared for what every one must have found, that the music of Mendelssohn bears presentation on this vast scale less well than that of Handel. Not only are many of the delicacies of modern orchestration lost under such circumstances, but the manner in which instruments and voices are combined implies loss of power. Then, at the beginning of the Oratorio, the vast body to be manoeuvred, which it had been impossible to assemble for full rehearsal (one of the inevitable difficulties of such celebrations) was shy. Nevertheless, the effect was more rich and noble than could have been anticipated. Ears are ears—precise definition is hard to settle. Many complaints that the piano passages were inaudible wandered about the Crystal Palace. Our impression is precisely the reverse, that in the gentler portions of choral music the presence of multitudes spread over so wide a space was to be felt, and we fancy that had we been introduced blindfold into the place, the sound by its quality would have made us aware of the presence of numbers. Thus, in the first act, the responses in the final scene, where the Prophet prays for rain, were more effective than the chorus, "Thanks be to God" (which Signor Costa urges at too fiery a speed), since then the stringed instruments are next to lost. In the second act, heard from distant and various portions of the building, the choruses that succeeded the best were "Be not afraid," the celestial unaccompanied close to "Ho watching over Israel," and the "Holy, holy." Here the antiphony of the four female voices to the full choir, and in the latter the successive entrance of voices after voices were as distinct as we have ever heard. A suggestion may be thrown out to reconcile conflicting testimonies. The effort of attention is inevitably greater in a large than in a limited locality.

After it has been asserted by no one else before the world save Signor Costa could such a performance have been conducted to a close with such smoothness and precision, a word must be said concerning the singers. Miss Parcpa, whose first essay at "Elijah" this was, covered herself with honor. She sang the music well—her voice told; so did Madame Sainton-

Dolby's, more than on any former occasion,—Miss Palmer's better than we had expected, that of Mr. Sims Reeves as of old, Signor Belletti's the least well; and Elijah is the predominant part. The other singers (to complete the list for the sake of history) were Miss F. Rowland and Mr. Lewis Thomas.

The story of the after celebrations of the day must be cut short. The unveiling of the statue on the terrace was the one failure. Surely something better than the penny-trumpet call which announced it should have been devised. Of the statue itself we may speak on a future day. Then came, at the foot of the statue, some good German part-singing of the songs which Mendelssohn wrote with so much enjoyment for the German Societies at home to sing in the wood at Schwabheim, near Frankfurt, and elsewhere,—things to make full the hearts of those who remembered past days and festivities "when the fear of Death was not." Afterwards, his Marches were played by wind bands. Later in the evening the moon got up, and the Palace was illuminated, and the Torch Procession emerged from among the trees, winding round the great central fountain—the mixture of fire, water, colored vapor, with a lovely May-night for canopy and background—the dim thousands of spectators capriciously dispersed, and the charming landscape features of the Sydenham garden,—making a scene not to be forgotten. We cannot close the above notes of it without repeating "How he would have enjoyed it!"—London Athenæum, May 12.

The Study of Music.

(From Oliver's "Musical Transcript," Pittsfield, Mass.)

We are informed by an eminent member of the legal profession, that such reforms and improvements in law practice have obtained within the last ten years, that a case, which would formerly have occupied months of time and reams of paper, can now be got through with in as many weeks or even days and with the use of as many quires of paper.

We are all too happy, also, to acknowledge the fact that although less than twenty years ago, a practitioner in the healing art was not willing to visit a patient without leaving behind a prescription containing a dozen or more items, the preparation of which involved the use of as many bottles, pill-boxes and plasters; now, a little wholesome advice as to exercise, diet, etc., or at the most, a single powder or tincture, serves abundantly the purpose of the former doses, and with much more satisfactory results. As in these departments, so also in those of mechanics, agriculture, etc., improvements have been made, and all tending to strengthen, systematize and simplify.

The art and science of music have not been left behind in this advance, but appear rather in the front rank, thanks be to the faithful and earnest strivings of such men as J. N. Hummel, Theodor Uhlig, and others, who have succeeded in convincing all who are desirous of keeping up with the times, that a man may sooner become a thorough and skillful performer, as a pianist, for example, by three hours of practice each day, combined with the necessary writing and theoretical study, than in the old fashioned way of twelve to fifteen hours of mechanical drudgery, and mere finger work at the instrument.

Justice should also be done to the name of Francois Hunten, (whose originally valuable book, by the way, has been, for money-making purposes, so badly mutilated by publishers,) who said, more than twenty years ago, in the preface of his method for the piano, speaking of theoretical studies as compared with mere mechanical exercises, "these things make the musician, the latter the mere player." This, then, being the unquestionable fact, hard though it may be for some, especially unthinking people to believe, or, believing, to act upon, it becomes our duty to ascertain and communicate what we can of the opinion and practices of the best masters, with regard to such a method of education.

The treatment of this subject has been greatly simplified, whether in connection with the voice or any mechanical instrument, and may be considered under three departments, viz: The cultivation of the eye, which includes the reading of notes, and all the various terms and characters employed by composers in expressing their ideas and intentions. Secondly, the cultivation of the judgment, the understanding and taste, which God has given to every man, whether he wishes to sing or not; the study of the grammar of the musical language, the listening to the performances of good music, etc.; and, lastly, the department of mechanism or finger work, for the development and equalization of the powers, and the acquisition of those elementary means which form the substance of all musical compositions. For example, passages for five fingers, Diatonic, Chromatic, Harmonic scales and the like, without the knowledge or possession of which no one ever did or can play, and with which, every one possessing a musically cultivated eye, judgment, mind and taste, can play everything.

To secure the object first named, the cultivation of the eye, however young the pupil may be, he immediately commences to write notes, copying little pieces, prefixing the name to each note—after first learning their names, on, above and below the staff, with certainty. Then, the intervals are written, natural, large, small, redundant and diminished; upon the same principle that a child in learning to read first learns a-b ab, b-a ba, and the like. Next, the scales in all the keys, minor and major, are carefully and intelligently written, that perfect and equal familiarity be acquired with all. Then the pupil is taught to transcribe in writing, simple pieces at first, then more difficult ones, into different keys, then back into the original, to prove the correctness of the work. All this is done for the education of the eye, with respect to the position of notes and nothing else. Czerny, although he has deluged us with such a torrent of mechanical exercises for the piano, says: "One-half hour spent thus daily, will do more for the young pianist, than three hours spent at the instrument;" and Spohr says the same with regard to the violin.

Again, cultivating the eye with respect to the duration or value of notes, is a separate department, requiring different instruction. Rhythmical exercises are written—the pupil invents them himself, in all the varieties of time-measure, with two, three, four, five, six notes in a measure, in all possible designs and permutations. We know of pupils, with less than six months practice, during half an hour a day, in such exercises as these, who will comprehend and read correctly at a glance a formidable and complicated measure, that some skillful pianists will puzzle over for ten minutes, and then not be able to time the notes to their satisfaction. To go more fully into particulars, in regard to this fascinating and valuable department of musical study, the limits of this article will not allow. Thus much is necessary to qualify even the ordinary singer or instrumentalist. More necessary, however, if possible, is it to him who, possessing some musical genius, wishes to understand what he plays, and appreciate what he hears, and possibly, by and by, to express even his own thoughts in the language of this glorious art.

To read and understand what we read in this, as in any other language, one first learns how the letters are formed into syllables, syllables into words, words into sentences, &c., &c. That is, first learns what is possible to be made in melody with two notes—three, four, five, six, and so on, making application of all the rhythmical changes learned in the exercises in rhythm before mentioned, extending these primitive forms afterward to monophonic phrases, ascending and descending in simple and compound retrogressions, &c. (See A. B. Marx's Kompositionen Lelire.)

Then follows the study of harmony, or the finding what chords are possible with combining two, three, four notes, &c., three-fold and four-fold chords, common and extra, fundamental and derivative, in all their positions, inversions and permutations. (See Weber's Theorie der Ton-Kunst.) Afterwards the employment of these in making those wonderful resolutions, progressions and modulations, which, as illustrated in the works of Bach, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn, have made music what it is, the greatest, noblest, most glorious of all God's earthly gifts to men.

The second branch of our subject brings us to the cultivation of the judgment, understanding and taste, which is chiefly through the ear. It is of the utmost importance that this organ be thoroughly instructed, that it may be known what is right, and how to enjoy, approve and appreciate it, and what is wrong, how to avoid and condemn it.

As Thalberg says, "whether a person wishes to sing or not, he should, at least, as a part of a good musical education, thoroughly cultivate the voice, to develop equally, to strike accurately, to sustain uniformly, and to connect purely all its tones." It is God's own instrument, given to every creature who is not absolutely mute. All music is made up of tones, comparatively long or short, high or low, loud or soft, and there is not one individual in a million, who can hear at all, but can distinguish one tone from another in either of these comparative relations. The rest is a matter of practice, experience and cultivation. And these are all necessary to the student, whether of the Piano, Trumpet or Violin. If he learns to sing, so much the better; if not, at least, he has received that benefit and improvement to his judgment and understanding necessary to him as a musician. The ear should be cultivated also by affording it opportunity of listening to good music.

As in connection with the foregoing, here, also, the exercise of good common sense is indispensable. The right application of that informs one readily when listening to what is called singing, if the performer slides about from one note to another, strikes below it and howls up to the written note, or does anything but what is indicated by the composer, he knows that is not singing, his judgment disapproves, his taste condemns it. If in a performance upon the piano, the keys be dropped like hot iron, depriving the notes of half their value, or the foot be pressed down upon the open pedal, so that not one sound is distinguishable from another, by the light of common sense, his judgment disapproves, and his taste condemns such a performance. If in church music the organ be permitted to predominate over the voices, secular melodies are introduced, senseless combinations of the stops employed, his ear tells him that it is wrong—his judgment disapproves—his taste condemns it. If in orchestra or band, one instrument or class of instruments prevail over another, if some snap off the tones before half uttered, and others come lagging in one after another, common sense says wrong again; the judgment disapproves, the taste condemns.

Good music, well performed and well listened to, instructs the judgment, develops the understanding, and refines the taste. Lastly, let us consider the department of mechanism or finger work, as the means employed to bring all this into personal use, practical application, in a word, to make it all our own, of ourselves and within ourselves. It is remarked in this connection that every well formed hand has five fingers upon it, and it suggests itself at once to all intelligent minds, that to perform well upon any keyed instrument, equally facility in their action is requisite. The first desideratum then, is to enter diligently into the development of the strength, elasticity and nimbleness of the weaker fingers, that as soon as possible all shall be equal in these qualities. The practice of those exercises, scales, &c., before mentioned, in all their various forms of position, combination and permutation, compasses every difficulty presented in the most elaborate composition, whether for the Piano, Violin, Flute, Trumpet, or any other instrument.

With respect to the bowing of stringed instruments, and the embouchure of the latter, these are perfectly and correctly established under the direction of a good master, before anything mechanical is attempted.

All these things are what is meant by the great and good Hummel, and Czerny, and hosts of others, when they say that, "three or four hours of daily practice, in connection with proper theoretical study, will do more in five years to make a good musician, than twelve or fourteen hours of mechanical labor merely, during a lifetime."

If one sets out with the determination to become a concert player, a mere mechanist, that is another thing; there are enough of that class, but they are not musicians. Let them spend twelve or fourteen hours a day in mere mechanical exercise, they can do nothing else, they can neither appreciate the works of others, nor interpret them. They may call themselves composers, but they are not, they are mere arrangers, dressing up popular melodies with their torrents of trills, cascades of scales, and avalanches of arpeggios. As Bach says, such compositions are "old shoes, fitted to one common last," and worthy only to demonstrate the sleight of hand tricks peculiar to their authors.

Music is a language—an art—a mystery; and whatever powers one may naturally possess, whether physical, mental, or intellectual, he cannot read it, he cannot understand it, he cannot interpret it, he cannot enjoy it, without having first studied it. A pleasing melody, or some simple harmony, with strongly marked rhythm, as a polka, march, or the like, he may enjoy listening to as a whole, as he would enjoy the smoothly flowing measure of some poem in a strange language, though it is otherwise wholly unintelligible to him.

In our favored America, we claim to be smart, and we are, in commerce, agriculture, in mechanics, etc., and it often seems, as in the case of Lord Timothy Dexter, of glorious memory, that the less a man knows about anything, the better qualified he is to succeed in it. Upon the strength of this, Americans are disposed tacitly, if not otherwise, to claim that the less one knows about music, the more one is entitled to exercise, as an inalienable right, his untaught judgment in expressing and enforcing opinions about musicians, their compositions and performances, without regarding honest pride, feeling, sensibility, or common justice. We do not object to people's saying, "I like this or that,"—"I think so or so,"—it is different from declaring "that is a fine piece."—"he is an excellent teacher,"—"you have an excellent piano," etc., etc.,—knowing nothing of those things, they have no right to exercise the influence, by such language, which wealth, power, or social position may give them. If they are right in doing so, then, indeed, it is true that the less a person knows of a thing, the better right he has to talk about it, and express his opinion; and all knowledge, all education, all aspiration and pursuit after things higher and better, are vain,—earth only is a reality, and heaven a myth,—all wisdom is folly, and ignorance alone is bliss! But no! a thousand times no! Solomon was right in his denunciations of the self-sufficiency of the human heart. "Fools," are they, "who hate knowledge, and despise wisdom and instruction." Let then those who would venture to talk about music, study it, that they may know whereof they speak! Let those who profess to teach music, study it, that their pupils may not squander their time in mere finger work and drudgery! Let those who play, study music, that they may enjoy the wonderful poetry and understand the glorious beauty of its language! Let those who sing, study it, that they may sing with the heart and with the understanding, and that those who have some cultivation of judgment, sensibility of feeling, and refinement of taste, may be spared the torture to which restraint in the sanctuary, and courtesy in the drawing room, compel them too often to submit! Let organists study music, that we may be saved from the senseless, uncouth, and unhallowed abuse of that noble instrument, which is unavoidably the result of mere mechanical performance upon it! Let our orchestral leaders and band masters study music, that they may avoid making ill-assorted and unhappy marriages between strings, wood and brass; that they may avoid the promiscuous and wrong association of copper and brass in military parades. All this is well understood in Europe, and rests upon principles of taste, which are fixed and underlie the whole. Let music publishers, and arrangers, and self-styled composers, study music, that we may be protected against, and they saved from perpetrating, the mutilations and abortions to which now in the church and Sabbath school, concert room and theatre, and in the social circle, we are daily subjected. Let newspaper critics study music, that the stereotyped verbiage and senseless, meaningless laudation of unworthy performances may be abated, that they may know to distinguish between right and wrong, and withhold their praise and commendation from the quacks and mountebanks who forestall the public opinion through them, and leave the Labordes, Sontags and Vieuxtemps, who come to our country with modesty and real genius, relying for success upon true merit, to pay their own expenses, without encouragement from the public.

Finally, let all study music, that peace, harmony and good will may be preserved. It has been said that musicians are quarrelsome—it is not true! It is because they are not true musicians, and have no music in their hearts. Let their souls be imbued with the true spirit of music, and their hearts will be filled with love to all men. As light dispels darkness, as good counteracts evil, as falsehood is to be overcome by truth, as death is to be swallowed up in life, so truth shall and must prevail over error in music, and as the sons of God in the beginning sent up their shouts of praise to the great Creator of all things, so in the end shall all perversion, folly and wrong doing in music be overcome, and buried far, far beneath the swelling harmony of the harps and voices of the just made perfect before the throne of the Almighty!

The Invention of the Harmonica.

Translated from the German of ELISE POLKO, for the Saturday Evening Post, by FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

On a gloomy November afternoon, in the third story of a plain house in the city of London, a cheerful fire sparkled on the hearth of the prettiest corner room one can imagine. It seemed to laugh in the face of the surly winter, who throw handfuls of ice and snow flakes at the windows, raging and howling like an imprisoned bear. The twilight had already begun to wrap the immense city in a gray veil; only the dome of St. Paul's and the giant form of the Tower struggled with the coming darkness, and rose above the clouds that sought to envelop them. The lanterns were alight in the streets, and fought their usual battle with daylight. The corner room was already half in shadow, and the firelight danced up and down the walls, ran over the floor, played on the ceiling, and while doing these expeditions, it touched alternately the faces and forms of four persons who had assembled there. The most remarkable figure in the little group was that of a man who sat close to the fireplace in an arm-chair, with his head resting against its back. He was dressed in black, and wore no wig, although such was the fashion of the time, but simply his own thick gray hair, combed smoothly from his temples. And what fine temples, what a forehead! One could not imagine a human face with a handsomer brow; the dreams of a great soul were inscribed upon it, and two clear and intelligent eyes stood beneath as interpreters of those dreams. Who that regarded this head would care to notice whether the features were fine, if youth had passed from cheek and lip, or that the mouth, with its fascinating smile, was regularly formed? His form was not remarkable, but every movement was firm and noble. And his name? Benjamin Franklin! the friend of mankind, the honest American citizen, the renowned scholar. Scientific business had brought him from Philadelphia at the end of the year 1762, to London, where he intended to remain some months. His first visit had been to his respected relative, the excellent Mistress Davies, who had resided in the great capital of the world, in a very retired manner, with her two talented daughters, Mary and Cecilia, ever since the death of her husband. Franklin scarcely remembered the young girls, whom he had only once seen, when they were very young children, and was not a little astonished when two grown up, charming maids of 18 and 19 approached to greet him with all the cordiality of relations. The lively Cecilia clasped him round the neck; her elder sister Mary simply gave him her hand, trembling and blushing as she did so. They could scarcely believe that the great man, on whose renown their mother had fed them, so to speak, really stood before them. Scarcely a day had passed without some conversation between them about him. The glory that surrounded the name of him whom Heaven had placed nearer to them than to any others, was as sunshine to the little family. The extraordinary preëminence of this intellect, the true nobility of this soul, was nowhere more deeply and inwardly recognized, than in the third story of the simple London house. Every event in the life of Franklin was related to her daughters by Mistress Davies; all the doings of the great man seemed unimpeachable to the three women. His first love for the beautiful Miss Wells, his separation and after union with her, who had in the meanwhile become the wife of another, had a great attraction for the young girls. Mary could not understand how a maiden, who had been loved by such a man, could give her heart to another; while Cecilia remarked very correctly, that Franklin, while courting the charming Miss Wells, was not the renowned Franklin.

"Oh, had I only been Miss Wells!" sighed Mary; whereupon her sister answered, a little sharply:

"How can you wish to be old and ugly, and no longer able to sing?"

"Oh, to be loved by him, I would give everything, even my voice!"

"Children, cease your nonsensical chatter!" With these words Mistress Davies interrupted the conversation. "Our distinguished relative is now old and married, and when you see him, neither of you will dream of falling in love with him."

Among those rare and varied species of woman's love, which no scholar has yet thought of reducing to a system, there is one of more common growth, certainly, than the marvellous flower of world-defiant passion, but yet touching and attractive in its nature. It is the secret, enthusiastic tenderness, that, with its finger on its lip, follows in the track of distinguished men. At the feet of lofty palm-trees, and strong oaks, this modest flower unfolds its chaste leaves, desiring nothing more than such a position. It is nourished by the sunshine that falls on the head of the tree; her fine roots becoming gradually entwined with his; she feels and suffers with him, although he is not aware of it; and when he dies—she must die with him. But no one, standing in awe, beside the overthrown oak, mourns for the violet, crushed by its fall. It would not be difficult to point out the existence of such lovely blooms, in the lives of all great men. Mary Davies was one of the loveliest among them. The news that Franklin was really coming to England, and would remain some months in London, naturally aroused a perfect storm of delight in the Davies' house.

"We must sing to him, often sing to him," cried Cecilia, "so that he may see that there is also something to admire in us!" And the charming maiden was right; her singing, and that of Mary, was worthy of admiration; attention had been drawn to the sisters, even in the great city of London, by the rare union of uncommon musical talent and enchanting beauty, with childlike unconsciousness and modesty. The names of the sisters Davies sufficed to fill any concert room.

At length came the time, when he, the long desired renowned guest, was really with them, and when he sat with them almost every evening, in the little corner room we described at the commencement of our story.

Mistress Davies, a stately, kind-hearted dame, tripped restlessly hither and thither, drew back a chair here, smoothed a table-cloth there, pushed forward a vase, moved from window to fireplace, and said twenty times, half aloud, "It is almost dark!" She was one of those busy natures that cannot understand the sweet enchantment of the dreamy twilight hour, and she never permitted this dangerous indulgence to her daughters. Since the arrival of their distinguished relative, her patience had been severely tried, for Franklin had a particular fancy for the twilight hour. The girls talked in an under tone at the window. Cecilia sat on a stool at her sister's feet, her pretty arms resting on the other's knees. The rosy face was turned upwards, her thick black curls fell back from her round cheeks, over her well-turned shoulders. She chattered, questioned, and laughed, as a girl of eighteen will chatter, talk, and laugh; but Mary listened absently to the pretty nonsense; her eyes were fixed on Franklin's noble face. Mary was a true daughter of old England; a wondrously lovely creature, with waving golden hair, and a dazzlingly brilliant complexion, all red and white. In her slow movements, in her slender form, in the slight bend of her head towards the left side, lay an indescribable charm; in the slow uplifting of her black eyelashes, in the finely contracted corners of her delicate mouth, an observing eye would have detected the sign of a too-sensitive heart.

"You must sing something for me to-day, my dear girls," said Franklin; "and let it be in the twilight; music has never so sweet, so powerful an effect as then."

The sisters rose; Mary opened the piano that stood at a little distance from the window, and Cecilia pushed the stool towards her. The slender fingers of the eldest sister ran swiftly over the black, rattling keys, that never sounded so harp-like, however, as when Mary played. She accompanied her sister's singing. Cecilia's voice was one of astonishing richness and flexibility; a fine soprano. She sang an aria by Handel, with great finish. If voices could be compared to colors, then Cecilia's voice was a sparkling, heavenly blue. The room was too small for the sounds that streamed from this young breast. When she had ended, Franklin turned cheerfully to Mistress Davies, and said,—

"Now, is it still dark here, Fanny? I bathe in light!"

Afterwards, Cecilia said tenderly to her sister, "Come, Mary, sing us one of your old ballads; no grand aria to-night, but one of the little Scottish songs, that no one in the world can sing so well as you!"

And Mary, turning her head once more towards Franklin, shook back her curls, struck a few melancholy chords, and sang in a wonderful, deeply sorrowful tone, an old English song of farewell—

"Then fare-thee-well, my own dear love!"

In his arm-chair, Franklin bent over his folded hands; the young girl's voice penetrated his inmost heart. He felt himself carried back to the days of his childhood; the voice of his mother fell on his ear; pictures of childhood floated by like shadows of clouds. As the tones grew softer, sorrow overcame him; a vain, endless longing, the longing for his lost youth. At this moment he would have given up everything, name and fame, for the bloom of a youth of twenty. Then he might have pointed to the tears that streamed down his cheeks, and of which the elderly man was almost ashamed. There was something overpoweringly touching in Mary's voice. It trembled out and vibrated like moorbeams on a silent lake, and its peculiar, veiled quality had an indescribable charm. Franklin struggled with his emotion; for his powerful nature was also a delicately organized one. As Mary ended her simple and mournful song, he rose to approach her; striking his forehead suddenly against the mantel-piece, the skin was broken, and a few drops of blood ran down his left temple. This unforeseen accident greatly excited the little family. Cecilia called for a light, Mistress Davies hurried to assist Franklin, who, under the effects of emotion, and the sudden pain, had almost fainted; but poor Mary stood helpless in the middle of the room. When the servant girl entered with a branch candlestick, and she heard her mother say, "Come and help me, Hannah, and then run for Doctor S—!" she cast a look of regret towards Franklin, and silently left the room. She ran down stairs, opened the street door, and stood in the snow-covered street. The icy north wind, that blew over her burning cheeks and played with her hair, thrilled her one moment with a cold shudder; then she hurried forward, pursued by the thought—"He may die and my voice will have been the cause of it!" And then she hated her own voice. Like a shadow she glided past the houses; and now only two streets lay between her and the dwelling of their old friend and physician. There was a sudden noise in a little side street; she did not observe it. A crowd of young men issued forth; the flame of a lantern fell on her lovely pale face; frightened, she drew back into the shadow, but in vain; they surrounded and addressed all sorts of insulting remarks to her. Collecting all her strength, she said with a firm voice, while her heart beat audibly: "For God's sake, let me go! I was fetching the doctor for a dying person. Doctor S— lives not twenty paces from here." Her death-pale face, her anxious eyes, the tone of her voice, bore so plainly the impress of truth that her tormentors involuntarily drew back. Like a roe pursued by the hunters, she reached the doctor's house, rushed into the old gentleman's study, and with the cry, "Franklin is dying," she fell fainting before him.

Benjamin Franklin had long recovered from what he laughingly called "his little nervous attack;" while the dark angel of death still lingered by Mary's bed. That evening walk, and the strong excitement of the occasion, had brought a severe illness upon the delicate young girl, from which she very slowly recovered. When, at last, to the great joy of her mother and sister, she was well enough to sit up, and supported on the arms of her revered friend, she ventured to walk a few steps once more; when she saw his kind and serious care, she blessed in her heart the unfortunate evening that brought her a joy she had not known before, the joy of being cared for by him. Poor Mary! she had as yet no idea what that evening had taken away. A few weeks later she discovered, with unspeakable sorrow, with a grief that almost overpowered her, that she had lost her voice. Doctor S— was the only one who was not surprised at the consequence of that imprudent evening walk. "This, which you call a misfortune, is scarcely worth talking about," said he; "Mary's life was in question!" He could not understand what made the women weep so despairingly, for Mary's mother and sister grieved scarcely less than herself. Ah! he who possesses not the heavenly gift of song can never fully understand what a source of pure joy, of sweet comfort it is, or how the heart finds in it all which else it must ever long for in vain! He who can sing sings every joy more deeply into his soul, and finds a lullaby for even the bitterest woe. A thousand sweet secrets float to the surface of song; in its tones the heart trembles, weeps, rejoices, discourses of warmest love and longing, and no one dare complain or punish it then.

When, after every possible endeavor to recall the lost treasure, Mary Davies saw that it was indeed gone forever: she did not certainly sink into a hopeless melancholy, but she faded, slowly and silently, like a flower deprived of sunshine. Her artistic piano playing no longer gave her any joy. "It only makes me feel what I have lost, more deeply!" said she, and would only play to accompany her sister. At first she wept whenever Cecilia sang; but she grew more tranquil at last, or at least appeared so. She wished to convince her revered friend of a resignation that, in spite of every effort, she did not feel. But Franklin was not deceived. He put off his return to Philadelphia from month to month, and came as usual, almost every evening, to the Davies' house. Only he seemed growing thoughtful and absent-minded, and scarcely joined in the conversation that Mistress Davies and Cecilia addressed to him. He would not hear music; and so the little piano remained closed while he was there. But when Mary spoke to him, with her soft, broken voice, he would kindly reply; even when she only moved he would glance towards her, no matter how deeply sunken in thought he might appear. He followed her with his eyes; no sigh, no secret tear, no shadow of pain floating over her brow, escaped him. But he said nothing about Mary's loss.

So week after week slipped by; summer prepared for departure: the first leaves began to fall. One evening Benjamin Franklin came later than usual to the little corner room. Mother and daughters sat round the small table; Cecilia was reading, Mistress Davies working, Mary dreaming. She looked with surprise on their visitor; an unspeakable happiness brightened his eyes, and overflowed her heart, as she met his glance, with a warm feeling of joy. He stepped up to her, and took her hand. "Dear, dear Mary," said he softly, "you lost for my sake your sweet voice, whose tones I shall never forget; to-day I bring you an indemnification for it; you shall sing again, although not with your lips; stay here patiently, while I step into the next room, and listen attentively to the tones that will reach you." Expectantly, and almost trembling, the women crowded together; the door of the adjoining room remained half open. A short pause—then flowed rippled tones of the sweetest nature over the ears and hearts of the listeners—tones of so sweet, so soft, so touching a quality, that neither flute, nor harp, nor any instrument with which the women were acquainted, could be compared to it. They were sounds belonging to another sphere, tones of a transfigured human voice, an angelic song, that it was almost impossible to hear without tears. The listeners felt pleasure and sorrow at the same time; their hearts were almost melted within them. And as the wondrous music swelled more loudly they all recognized the bitter-sweet melody of the old English song, the last that Mary sang—

"Then fare-thee-well, my own dear love!"

And then they thought they really heard Mary's voice; that rich, soul-full, heart-moving voice, now dead forever. The women sobbed aloud, and Mary, no longer able to contain herself, flew, with a long cry of painful rapture, into the adjoining room. Franklin sat before a strange instrument, placed on a cylinder that rested on a pedestal. To this cylinder, half globes of glass, of regularly graduated dimensions, were attached, in such a manner that the edge of each half-globe rested above the next one. Franklin placed his finger-tips on the rims of the glasses, and, setting the cylinder in motion by a movement of his foot, the magical tones were produced. "It was thus you sung, Mary!" cried he, to the surprised and excited maiden. "And now, come and let me teach you to sing again; and when you sing out this, my soul will sing with you. I have found your voice for you again!"

It was the lovely Mary Davies, who afterwards astonished the world with this wonderful new invention of the renowned Franklin. The Harmonica, he called it. By means of an untiring perseverance, she attained unheard of dexterity on this extraordinary instrument. When she had bidden farewell to her worshipped friend—a personal farewell, only, for her soul was in his hands—when Franklin returned to America, she travelled; first to France, and then through Germany, and was heard in most of the large cities as a harmonica-player. No one has played it like her, since; her whole soul poured through her slender fingers, when she touched the glasses. She was so beautiful in such moments, so carried away by enthusiasm, so sparkling with secret delight, that those who looked and listened, were seized with a sympathetic rapture. Many could not bear the tones; ladies fainted, or burst into tears; but crowds attended the short concerts of the pretty Englishwoman, and regarded them as festivals. When Mary's mother died, and her sister Cecilia began to make a noise in Italy as a distinguished songstress, she returned to London, and then discovered this second voice had injured her health far more than it was possible for the first to injure it. Alone, separated from those who were dearest to her, Mary saw the days come and go, without hope, but also without complaint. She was even cheerful; for she could still sing on her instrument; and—his soul sang with her! And this voice, which she had received from him, remained still young and wondrously fine, even when Mary's curls had turned white, and the hard hand of time had disfigured her blooming face. But whither did she seek to waft those exquisite tones which she allured from her beloved harmonica every evening? Who could tell?

The physicians were astonished that this fragile life still held out; they could not understand what sustained it, they had foretold Mary's death for years. Surely there was some power on earth impossible to withstand, that retained this soul firmly in its shattered covering.

It was the 27th of April, 1790, when Mary desired them to lead her once more to the harmonica; with a happy smile she touched the glasses; the melody of the song sounded beneath her still beautiful hands. Suddenly she arose, listened, leaned back, and ceased to breathe. The thread of her feeble existence was broken.

"Then fare-thee-well, my own dear love!"

At the same moment, but far from that silent chamber of death, across the wide ocean, the angel of death bore aloft a great, strong soul; the soul of Benjamin Franklin.

Rossini and his Imitators.

(From Hogarth's Musical Biography and Criticism.)

Mose in Egitto was brought out at Naples in 1818. In this piece Rossini has attained an elevation of style which is not to be found in any of his other productions. The choruses are grand and majestic. The sublime prayer of the Hebrews, when preparing to cross the Red Sea, was an after-thought. Notwithstanding the transports with which the opera, in general, was received, the attempt of the machinist to represent this scene never failed to excite the risibility of the audience. This continued during the first season.

"The following season," says M. Stendhal, "this opera was resumed with the same enthusiastic admiration of the first act, and the same bursts of laughter at the passage of the Red Sea. The following day, one of my friends called about noon on Rossini, who, as usual, was lounging in bed with a dozen of his friends about him; when, to the great amusement of everybody, in rushed the poet Tottola, (the author of the drama,) who, without noticing any one, exclaimed, 'Maestro! I have saved the third act!' 'Well, what have you done, my good friend?' replied Rossini, mimicking the half-burlesque, half-pedantic manner of the poor son of the muses: 'Depend upon it they will laugh at it as usual.' 'But I have made a prayer for the Hebrews, before the passage of the Red Sea,' said the poet, pulling a bundle of papers out of his pocket, and giving them to Rossini, who immediately began to decipher the scrawl. While he is reading, the poet salutes the company all round, whispering every moment in the composer's ear, 'Maestro, I did it in an hour.' 'What! in an hour!' exclaimed Rossini; 'Well, if it has taken you an hour to write this prayer, I engage to write the music in a quarter of the time: here, give me a pen and ink.' At these words, Rossini jumped out of bed, seated himself at the table en chemise, and in eight or ten minutes composed this sublime movement, without any piano, and without minding the chatting of his friends. 'There,' said Rossini, 'there is your music; away about your business.' The poet was off like lightning; and Rossini jumped into bed, and joined in the general laugh at his parting look of amazement.

"The following evening I did not fail to repair in good time to San Carlo. The first act was received with the same transports as before; but when they came to the famous passage of the Red Sea, the audience showed the usual disposition to risibility. This, however, was repressed the moment Moses began 'the new and sublime air, Dal tuo stellato soglio.' This is the prayer which all the people repeat after Moses in chorus. Surprised at this novelty, the pit was all attention. This beautiful chorus is in the minor key; Aaron takes it up, and the people continue it. Last of all, Elia addresses the same vows to heaven, and the people answer. At this moment they all throw themselves on their knees, and repeat the same prayer with enthusiasm; the prodigy is wrought; the sea opens, to present a passage to the people. The last part of the movement is in the major key. It would be difficult to give an idea of the thunder of applause which resounded from every part of the theatre. The spectators leaned over the boxes to applaud, exclaiming, 'Bello! bello! O che bello!' Never did I behold such an excitement, which was rendered still more striking by its contrast with the previous merry mood of the audience."

The present Italian composers are mere imitators of Rossini, and are much more successful in copying his defects than his beauties. They are, like him, full of mannerism; with this difference, that his manner was his own, while theirs is his. They occasionally produce pretty melodies, a faculty possessed, to some extent, by every Italian composer, however low his grade; but in general their airs are strings of common-place passages, borrowed chiefly from Rossini, and employed without regard to the sentiment and expression required by the scene. Their concerted pieces are clumsy and inartificial; and their loud and boisterous accompaniments show a total ignorance of orchestral compositions. This general description applies to them all.

A French Critique on "Fidelio."

(From the London Musical World.)

In a city, where no less a man than Hector Berlioz lives and writes, some curious master in the shape of musical criticism frequently peeps out from the columns of the public press. Beethoven's one opera has recently been produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique—being the last of M. Carvalho's sacrifices at the shrine of legitimate art. Unluckily, however, with M. Carvalho has departed the prestige of the establishment, which bids fair to sink once more into the position of mediocrity from which that gentleman, with indomitable spirit and eminent ability, delivered it. Had Fidelio been brought out at the Théâtre-Lyrique while he was manager, success—nay triumph—would have been a matter of certainty; but he having seceded, that sudden rage for the classical repertory which seized the Parisians some time since, and with which they themselves were even more astonished than their neighbors, has abated. Now everything not French is intolerable, and even Mozart, Beethoven, and Weber—even Gluck (not to add M. Gounod) will be voted bores. A few passages from a notice of Fidelio—in the columns of a journal, the name of which we shall not mention, and from the pen of a critic whose name is Delatouche, will illustrate our argument.

Six years ago the Fidelio of Beethoven was performed without much success, at the Théâtre-Italien. Notwithstanding the talent displayed by Mlle. Cruvelli in the principal part, the work of the German master had no success. I fear it is likely to be the same with Fidelio at the Théâtre-Lyrique.

For "six years ago," read nine years ago. It was in 1851—when Mr. Lumley was impresario, and Ferdinand Hiller musical director, at the Théâtre-Italien—that Fidelio was performed, with Cruvelli as Leonora. The success it achieved, it is true, amounted to no more than what our turbulent neighbors call a succès d'estime; but it must be remembered that a succès d'estime is a success after all, and (which is better), a success that lasts, and (which is worse) a success very rarely obtained in Paris—the way of the Parisians being either fevered enthusiasm or freezing apathy. But to retoucher Delatouche. The critic of the—likes not the story of Fidelio. Hear him describe it:

"Let us speak first of the poem—it is absurd, anti-historical, and tiresome (ennuyeux). We are near the end of the fifteenth century. Ludovic Sforza has caused his nephew, Jean Galeas, to be imprisoned in a fortress, and commissions the gaoler to poison his charge. The gaoler consents, and brings with him into the poor Duke's dungeon, a very young man—Fidelio—enamored of his daughter.* That young man is Isabelle de Naples, wife of Galeas. She makes herself known to her husband at the moment when Ludovic approaches to kill his nephew.† To prevent this murder she seizes a bar of iron, with which she threatens Ludovic. The latter retreats terrified, and escapes. But the daughter of the gaoler comes to release from their prison Fidelio and Jean, who go and throw themselves at the feet of the King of France, Charles VIII., just arrived at Milan."

The foregoing, be it understood, is not Fidelio as the Teutons know it, but "d'après" MM. Michel Carré and Barbier—a barbarous and Gallic Fidelio. No wonder Delatouche should be dissatisfied. Ecoutons ce gaillard:

"Do you not see the improbability at once? How could Galeas have thrown himself at the feet of Charles VIII., when history tells us that he died, poisoned, before the arrival of the King?"

Good; but the authors of operatic books (ask M. Scribe) are not invariably the most historical of poets. They worship Clio somewhat gingerly. We have no wish, however, to defend them in this instance, but leave them, willingly, to the trenchant stylus of Delatouche. Ecoutons encore ce gaillard:

"I have also a little observation to make. Since Madame Viardot (why not Fidelio?) "held Ludovic" (why not M. Gounod?) "why did she not taunt him incontinent?" This would have deprived us of the last finale; but where would have been the harm?"

There would have been no harm anywhere to the audience of the Théâtre-Lyrique (with M. Réty as manager, be it clearly understood; the Théâtre-Lyrique with M. Carvalho was quite another thing), who can afford to do with as small a dose of Beethoven as might well be administered, and by whom the loss of a finale—even that incomparable finale—would be looked upon in the light of a bonus. Delatouche, nevertheless, is too modest in calling his observation "a little observation"; on the contrary, it is a big "observation," and mightily to the purpose. But now that we have examined Delatouche in re Barbier-Carré, their book, let us examine Delatouche in re Beethoven, his music:

"The music embroidered by the immortal Beethoven on this pale canvas—"

["Music embroidered on a pale canvas!"]—Here is a muddling of idioms!]

"The music embroidered by the immortal Beethoven on this pale canvas is as pale as the canvas itself (!) The melody of the master is a soft melody, not noisy, which expands itself in nappes (sheetwise?); all tranquilly and without fracas; the nappes become a blue and limpid lake in which one mirrors oneself at one's ease, and as there is no worse water than stagnant water, so there is no music more detestable at the theatre than music which sleeps—and induces sleep."

There reader! you have an original criticism of Fidelio at last. Delatouche should be endowed with a beard of gold and vermillion whiskers, also with thigh-rings and a high-heeled boot (like Mario's). If there was an E less in his patronyme, he might be anagrammatized as HOT CAUDLE; but happily there are two. N'importe.

"Sonate, que me voulez-vous?" asked a certain philosopher (also a Frenchman) of a certain sonata that,

* The "poor Duke's" daughter!

‡ Who imprisoned Fidelio?

§ If it is soft?

¶ "Il n'est pire eau que l'eau qui dort."

nothing it not audible, intended him no harm in making itself heard (according to its entelechy), under the fingers of a "hammer-virtuose" as Wagner would say. Delatouche, too, has his notions of a sonata, and thus unburdens himself:

"One likes to hear a sonata of Beethoven's between an air of Rossini's or of Verdi's, and a chanson of Nadaud's. This broad and tender music relaxes, so to speak, the soul, and reposes it after the comic and brilliant. It is like an opium-pill, discreetly administered to a sick person after a day of agitation. Give to the sick person ten pills of extraits thébaïques (ver-nacular-opium), and you run the risk of killing your unhappy patient. Thus does the Fidelio of Beethoven. In short—except the chorus of sick persons (chœurs des malades), the introduction to the third act—a sort of march in the style of that of Wexler in the Enlèvement au Sérail (Mozart's "Se-raglio!"), together with the two prayers sung by Madame Viardot and Guardl—and the rest is not worth the honor of being cited, nor even of being heard."

Then follows a critique of the performers. "Madame Viardot," it appears, "completely failed in the final sextuor—which, to say truth, is wanting both in color and charm." We take the first half of the sentence to be as exact as the last, but no more so. The "tag" of the article we shall present to our readers in unadulterated Delatouche:

"Quelqu'un me disait en sortant de la première représentation: Voilà une musique qu'adorent les Allemands, et rien n'est plus naturel: ils s'amuseaient beaucoup quand ils s'amusent. Si l'y avait samedi des Allemands au Théâtre-Lyrique, ils ont dû follement s'amuser."

‡ In what part of Fidelio is this to be found?

THE "KIST OF WHISTLES."—It appears that there has been for eight years past a melodeon in St. Andrew's Church, Toronto, employed for the purpose of leading the choral devotions of the congregation. This instrumental addition to the simplicity of Scotch Psalmody was greatly enjoyed by the younger and more musical part of the congregation; but gave proportionate offence to the more conservative elders. The Presbytery, however, sustained the melodeon; alleging in its favor a reason which seems rather poor, though often used to blunt the edge of domestic misfortunes among the crockery—that it had been done a long while. But at a late Synod of the Kirk, lately held at Kingston, the matter was formally submitted to its decision, on appeal from the Court below on a memorial of Mr. John Robertson, who stated that conscientious objections to the use of the melodeon had induced him to give up his attendance at St. Andrew's Church. The Synod heard several learned divines for and against the music, and at length passed a sentence such as the Courts do when a nuisance is to be abated—that the melodeon should be removed from the church without any unnecessary delay. The vote for this judgment was 36 to 7. The Free Church Synod, we think, some years ago came to a similar decision. The idea somewhat antiquated, as some may think, which governs this decision, is, no doubt, that every act of worship must be performed by a reasonable creature, and the objectors cannot understand how music from an instrument can be so described. On the other hand, it is said that the music is, though not devotion itself, an aid to the devotion of reasonable creatures; not only making the outward manifestations of praise more perfect, but even stimulating and governing the movements of the feelings and affections.—Montreal Herald.

DO-DI-PETTO IN NEW YORK.—Wednesday, "Il Trovatore" and the ut de poitrine, the C di petto, the C in alt, or whatever you choose to call it. More logically the performance would be entered in memory's books, judging by the noise made, as ut de poitrine and "Il Trovatore."

I object to the ut de poitrine. I set my face resolutely against the C di petto. Give me not the anatomy or the physiology of the gamut. Yet I do not cry out against the C itself; considered absolutely, it is a well meaning note enough, and not unpleasant to the ear. But why should it appear on all the dead walls of the city?—Why be printed in execrable English on the playbill?—Why be advertised as the feature of the evening? I must say it, the ut de poitrine performance of Wednesday was the most exquisitely comical thing lately done in public. The announcement of the impending feat smacked of the tan and saw-dust. I should not have started to see a ring-master enter upon the Academy stage, got up in the astonishing full dress peculiar to that gay creature, and with a flourish of his whip open his mouth to the following speech:—

"Ladies and Gents: On behalf of the management I have to thank you for your kind attendance here this evening, and for your hearty applause. I am desirous to announce that this unrivalled troupe will perform every evening, and Wednesday and Saturday afternoons till further notice, when a series of entertainments will be presented worthy of your approval, and we pledge ourselves that nothing shall occur to offend the most fastidious. I have now the pleasure of introducing to you Signor Musiani, the eminent lyric acrobat, who will conclude this evening's programme by flinging his celebrated ut de poitrine, a feat never before attempted in America, and performed by him only—

SIGNOR MUSIANI!"

On second thoughts, his address would not equal the foregoing in elegance, but the idea would be expressed.

Now all this is entertaining enough if one has no feeling for the art or the artist. But Musiani ought not to be so treated. The public ought not to be so treated. They are not, all and singular, idiotic. Although a liberal measure of approbation was given to the tenor's early songs in the "Trovatore," it was clear that the audience was waiting for the ut; and when the end of the third act approached, for there we had been kindly informed to expect the phenomenon, you might have detected the feverish excitement always preceding some novel exploit or occurrence, whether it be the tight rope passage of the Niagara, or the hanging of a man.

When the deed was really done, the entire house sighed in token of relief, and burst into joyous shouting. No one heard the concluding bars of the act; they were delivered amidst the noisiest clamor. Musiani appeared before the curtain, and received his tribute: still the shouting went on. We will have the ut de poitrine again, cried the people. So up went the curtain, out came the tenor, this time without the Leonora, once more resounded the C di petto, once more ascended the cries, and again before the curtain came the tenor.

Well, an ut de poitrine is a good thing to have. But it is not all of life, and it materially interferes with the symmetry of a performance, especially when engineered by the management as on Wednesday.—N. Y. Albion.

Musical Correspondence.

VIENNA, MAY 5.—On Friday, April 27, Herr JULIUS EPPSTEIN, pianist in this city, gave a concert. Like many of the prominent musicians at the present day, this gentleman is of Jewish origin: he comes from Agram, the principal city of Croatia, which is one of the largest Austrian provinces and is peopled by Slaves. He has been in Vienna nearly ten years, and is now twenty-six years of age. He had attained very considerable facility in playing during his boyhood, but was not intended for a musician; hearing Liszt inspired him so, that he resolved upon this course. He had at first but few friends, and was thus forced to study and to make his way under considerable difficulties; which is, in Vienna, no easy matter for a musician, if he have not a fair portion of impudence or perfect self-reliance—or friends.

His piano teacher was Anton Hahn, the first instructor here, and his composition teacher was Johann Rafnatscha, a gentleman very favorably known in Vienna, in this sphere, and as a composer of great merit.

Herr Eppstein gave some years ago a private concert in order to show himself to the world, and got in consequence many and excellent lessons in the first houses of the city. He also played now and then in smaller concerts in Vienna and the neighborhood, and accompanied singers and musicians playing on other instruments than his own, a very difficult and thankless task. In the year '57—'58 he accompanied in Rubinstein's concerts, from good-will towards the latter artist, with whom he is befriended; then he played with Piatti, the eminent violoncellist from London (in one concert was given a trio of Schubert, Ludwig, Strauss, Piatti and Epstein performing), and won himself much praise thereby. Later he played with Laub, the renowned violinist from Berlin, and in the last concert of Laub, they played a sonata of Beethoven with great success.

In the year '58—'59, Herr Eppstein was requested by Herr Josef Helmesberger to play in his quartet concerts. These are the best chamber concerts given in the city, are always supplied with the best musicians, and are frequented by a very severe audience. Hence it is the test of a musician to let him play in them, and a pianist is especially exposed to trying companions; for Rubinstein, Clara Schumann, Drey schok and any other eminent pianist who has been in the city at that time, have played in them. Professor Rickert of the Vienna conservatorium, and Herr Dachs also of Vienna, had been the two regular quartet-concert players up to that time. Eppstein played a sonata of Beethoven's, in G major, with Helmesberger, violin, and met with very great applause, as he indeed deserved. He played later in the winter again with Helmesberger a sonata of Mozart's, and had still greater success. Besides that he played with Herr Cossmann, violoncellist from Weimar, (who performed that winter in the quartets) and in many other concerts. To end the winter he played at the invitation of "The Society of the Friends of Music," (Gesellschaft der Musik-freunde), in their last orchestral concert, given in the Imperial Redouten-saal, Beethoven's concerto in G major, for piano-forte with orchestral accompaniment. The hall is very large and not well built for hearing, so that it is very difficult for a pianist to penetrate without hammering on his instrument; but Eppstein celebrated his most complete triumph on this occasion: he played very beautifully indeed and delighted his audience.

The year 1859—60 brought him once more before a public, already favorably inclined towards him, but which demands continual progress. He was most sorely tried by severe illness during the whole fall, and was enabled to rally sufficiently in order to play in January, in one of the quartet concerts, a sonata of Beethoven with Helmesberger again. In February he played a trio of Schubert, with Helmesberger and Röyer, the violoncellist of the quartets, and showed more especially in this than in his first appearance during the winter, a decided gain on the former year in firmness and tone. People had said perhaps with justice, that he had not quite physical strength enough in his play; in this trio he showed sufficient. And now we come to his last concert, April 27. His programme was:

Quintet for piano, violin, viola, violoncello and contrabass, opus 114, A major, performed by the concert giver, Herren Helmesberger.....Schubert
Blumen-rache, ballad sung by Herr Förchtgott.....O. Löwe Scherzo, performed by concert giver.....Mendelssohn
 Märchen, performed by concert giver.....Eppstein
 "Du bist wie eine Blume," song given by Fräulein Weinberger.....Schumann
 "Rheinisches Volklied," song sung by Fräulein Weinberger.....Mendelssohn
 "Auf dem Berge," song sung by Fräulein Weinberger.....Lindblad
 "Nachtstück" (Nightpiece), for horn, played by Prof. Richard Lewy.....Käsmayer.
 Sonata for piano and violin, played by concert giver and Herr Helmesberger.....Beethoven

This quintet had not been played for a long time in public, and was a very interesting item on the programme. It is a cheerful and light-hearted composition, not so great as some of Schubert's things, but it makes no claim to greatness, and is quite delightful enough with its happy, healthy mood. The first movement is the least important of all; the others are beautiful, and especially the third which is the song, "The Trout" (Die Forelle) of Schubert's, with variations for the different instruments. Any one knowing this song, will see at once how well it is adapted to being varied; to be sure, Schubert has brought nothing new here and has not improved his opportunity, as Beethoven would have done; but the variations are charming and were most delightfully played. Herr Eppstein was quite at home here, for he particularly excels in light and graceful passages. The ballad of Carl Löwe is wonderful, and was very beautifully sung and accompanied by Herren Förchtgott and Eppstein. Does any one ever sing any of these ballads in America? If not, it is a great pity, for they are very original and fine; utterly unlike anything else in music known to me. Herr Förchtgott is a young man, who, without great means of voice, has reached a high point as song and ballad singer; but he is especially practised and excelling in Löwe's ballads. He has much understanding and fire, and a fine musical sense in regard to the delicacies and shadings. He is quite a favorite here.

The Scherzo of Mendelssohn, as well as the Märchen of his own, were charmingly given; the latter piece together with a Scherzo from Eppstein too, have met with considerable sales in Vienna and in Germany.

The three songs sung by Fräulein Weinberger pleased me very well; many of the audience complained of a lack of voice. It is quite true that her voice is weak and thin, but she sings with great taste and feeling, and was, two years ago at her first appearance, a favorite. The songs in themselves are charming, more especially the two former; the latter is well enough too. Schumann writes not unfrequently very short, but always beautiful songs.

The "Nightpiece" by Käsmayer was composed by him for the occasion. He is a first violin player in the Kärnthnerthor orchestra, and has composed several string quartets, some piano pieces and other smaller things which are much liked here. I shall refer to him later. This composition was partially excellent, and partially rather forced, it seemed to me; at least not clear enough. One must however have indulgence with all occasional compositions, for it is utterly impossible to command at will ideas and the necessary frame of mind for composing; and this was really so prepared for want of something suitable. Professor RICHARD LEWY is well enough known here, and had in former years a reputation throughout the most of Europe; but he is in the Kärnthnerthor orchestra, was a professor in the conservatorium, and had withdrawn himself almost entirely from the world. This piece he played very well indeed, and brought in a very nice cadence of his own, which displayed his command over his instrument and the delicacy of his playing.

The Sonata by Beethoven was truly a masterpiece of playing; only the two performers, used as they are to each other's play, hurried the last movement very much. The whole concert was most successful, and was well attended, although the season was far advanced, and the musical public weary of the sight of concert programmes.

I copy from the Wiener Zeitung, the criticism of one of the most important critics here.

"A very favorite artist and without doubt the most considerable of the Vienna pianists. Herr Eppstein has, within a few days, given a concert in the Conservatorium Hall. The programme was for our taste a little too innocent; the boldest piece was Beethoven's sonata for piano and violin, opus 12. Herr Eppstein's style of playing is known; a soft touch, truthfulness and purity of execution, a delicate (or fine—French fin—) musical understanding, and finished elegance."

If one adds to this, that he has real warmth, great conscientiousness in rendering, great industry in preparing, dislike of all tricks and show in delivery, perfect clearness in play, a remarkably light hand, and strength increasing and sufficient for all good music, one sees that the result must be excellent. He will not play the stuff of which we hear so much now-a-days, although he can do so perfectly well and can produce most effect with it; he prefers to give us the great musicians' works, and anything that is worthy, of the younger musicians. But a very great virtue to me is his entire objectiveness in playing. Your old correspondent, Thayer, said to me while listening to the quintet: "He plays it just as Schubert meant it should be played; he feels himself into it entirely." And this is true in his rendering the music of Beethoven, of Mozart, of Mendelssohn, of Schumann, of Bach, of Chopin.

Is not objectiveness what we seek, and rarely find? For most players, whether of the piano, or of any other instrument, are anxious to show themselves and their fingers by means of flashy clap-trap. Shall not we be thankful to an artist who is content in doing his duty towards the great priests of the art? Herr Eppstein is essentially a pianist to live in one city, not to travel from one capital to another; and the former is in Vienna at least much more difficult, for a pianist must be very good, who can be compared with all the great players, and still retain his place firmly with a highly educated and severe public. If he were not so pleasantly situated in Vienna, he might easily win much reputation and money by a journey to the principal European and American cities. Let us hope that we may see him one day in Boston!

Musical Chit-Chat.

Of operas and concerts there is nothing to record. But we have been enjoying what was even better—every one of us, we trust—a week of perfect June, most musical to all the senses; and to the heart too, divinely grateful and inspiring, or the heart is sick indeed. There is no music that can "minister to a mind diseased" if such June days, fresh, lifesome days of summer not yet past its height, cannot. Verily it is a delicious interlude, more exquisitely musical than Mendelssohn's most fairy-like Midsummer Night's dreams. We thank God for an interval of rest between the round of fashionable music and the hot season of brass bands and hand organs. Now the birds have it all their own way; and a right pleasant way it is, worth noticing. One has only to go out three miles from Boston in any direction, where there are trees,—in fact only to walk upon our once more grassy and green shaded Common,—to hear the little songsters. Let the sweet season linger while it may, and let not the hot, rude military music come too soon to dispel the influence!

But there are many, no doubt, who will like to alternate the music of Nature with the music of Art; and some will prefer Italian singing birds to those of our own elms and hemlocks. The promise of Italian opera for this last week failed; but now we have it definitely announced for next week. Mme. CORTESI, with her troupe, returns to re-open the Academy of Music next Wednesday evening, June 20. Her company includes, as before, herself; Miss PHILLIPS; the do-di-petto tenor, MUSIANI; TAMARO, SUSINI, AMODIO, &c. But best of all, the manager (Sig. SERVADIO, who is said to be the husband of CORTESI, and who seems to have a genius for Card making hardly second to that of Ullman) announces also "the best lyric and dramatic Artists ever introduced in America," Madame INEZ FABBRI, who is to sing on Wednesday in Verdi's Nabuco (Nebuchadnezzar), with Susini, and on Friday in Verdi's Ernani, with Musiani and Susini. Whether "the best" or not, Mme. FABBRI is certainly admirable, one of the best, in voice, in singing and in lyrical impersonation. Is it too much to hope that she may also appear here in her great part of the Jewess in Halevy's opera, and with Stigelli, as we heard them in New York? On Thursday, CORTESI will sing in Poliuto, with Musiani, Amodio and Nanni. The conductorship is shared between Sig. MUZIO and Herr MULDER (husband of FABBRI). Wade sells the tickets, and is ever ready to oblige.

The BOSTON MUSIC HALL ASSOCIATION held its annual meeting Wednesday afternoon. The old board of officers was reelected. The Treasurer's report showed the receipts during the past year to amount to $10,407.66; expenses $7,918.28; balance, $2,489.38.

The directors of the famous Gewandhaus Concerts in Leipzig have invited FERDINAND HILLER, of Cologne, to the post of conductor, vacated by Rietz; but Hiller, probably the best man in all Germany, unfortunately declines. It is thought that REINICKE, a young and promising musician of the Leipzig school, will have the place. . . . A rumor has reached England, but not fully confirmed, of the death of the brilliant Russian pianist and composer, RUBINSTEIN.

We have a letter from another young American at Leipzig, recently a pupil at the musical Conservatory there. The writer protests against certain reports unfavorable to the moral character of that institution, alluded to by the "Diarist" in our journal of April 14, in these words:

Feb. 25. I hear from Leipzig that several American students, among them a young lady, have withdrawn from the Conservatory, choosing the loss of the tuition (which they have paid for a year in advance) rather than to remain connected with the institution. I can of course record no ex parte statement of the questions at issue, cannot decide as to the wisdom and propriety of the step which they have taken; but, granting the facts as represented to me, without hearing what the directors have to reply, it is their wisest course. Certainly grave charges are made, and such that no American student should come there to the school, especially a young lady, without ample inquiry made and a satisfactory answer received.

Upon this our present correspondent remarks that, although he himself is one of those who have left the Conservatory, he has never in any way called in question the moral character of the institution, and his motives in withdrawing were entirely different from those hinted in the above extract. He intimates moreover, that the "Diarist" derived his information from a young man, one of the disaffected, who is very desirous of entering into a personal quarrel in the musical journals. The "Diarist" has been misinformed, too, he says, about the motives which actuated the young lady referred to, and several others, in withdrawing from the Conservatory. We trust these persons will set our friend's mind right, and that in due time we shall have the explanation from him; and that henceforth we shall hear no more suspicions as to the musical and moral fair fame of the Conservatoire at Leipzig. We fear the institution has been made to suffer by the personal quarrels of some of its pupils; and we trust that is all.

A member of the government of the recently formed BOSTON PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY informs us that, in our article last week, we mistook the spirit and intention of the twelve dollar rule in their constitution. It is simply intended as a check upon the government, who otherwise might have the power to draw the society into rash and improvident concert enterprises. It is therefore provided that the government shall announce no concerts, until the subscription thereto shall guaranty the musicians against loss of money, and of time, which to many of them is daily bread. We are promised a sight of the constitution itself, and after we have seen it we may have more to remark. Meanwhile we wish it to be understood, that we do not at all blame the members of the orchestra for wishing to make themselves pecuniarily whole for such time and labor as they may expend in giving us good concerts. That is their own affair. But our affair, as speaking for the lovers of classical instrumental music, is, to find out the best means of securing to ourselves good and permanent supplies of what we feel to be so indispensable. Then the question is, what kind of a society will best promote the end? Can we expect what we want from a company exclusively composed of actual performers, of professional musicians, of those and only those who earn their bread by playing on some instrument demanded in an orchestra, and who, by the hard lot of their profession, are compelled to look at every musical enterprise in which they may engage with a principal reference to wages? Or will it not be more likely to come from an organization composed of leading artists and amateurs generally, who, looking chiefly at the artistic side of the matter, shall get up concerts and employ performers? A society may take the name "Philharmonic" and yet not be Philharmonic, in the accepted meaning of the word. It may be a mere trading company, trading in the business of giving concerts; and then the laws of trade will govern it; it goes into the market, and of course soon learns to carry there what will best pay, whether it meet the Philharmonic end or not. All we ask for is a Philharmonic society, one true to that aim and spirit; and we doubt not many, if not all, of the musicians would be thankful for the privilege of coöperating in such a league for the upholding of their own artistic character and standard with that of the musical community.

A concert was to be given last evening, in Worcester, Mass., by Miss ADELINE LESERMAN, announced, like many others, as "the American prima donna," and said to possess a voice of unusual brilliancy and power. She is assisted by several artists from the Academy of Music, New York, viz., Mme. Zimmermann, mezzo soprano, Sig. Morino, baritone, and Herr Wm. Doehler, violinist, and Carl Anschutz as conductor. . . . A Miss TILLINGHAST is giving a series of "Classical Organ Concerts," in Chicago—an example which we would gladly see followed by the best organists in all our cities. Two have already been given, in St. Paul's church, with excellent success, apparently, and with these programmes:

May 31.

1. Overture to Prometheus. . . . . Beethoven.
2. Andante—From Sinf. No. 9. . . . . Mozart.
3. Stradella's Prayer—(Pieta Signore). . . . . Stradella.
Mr. De Passio.
4. God save the Queen—with Var. for the Organ. . . . Rink.
5. Hear, sweet spirit. . . . . Beethoven.
Mrs. Mattison.
6. Sonata—For the Organ. . . . . Mendelssohn.

June 7.

1. Overture to Samson. . . . . Handel.
2. Ave Maria. . . . . Owen.
Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Mattison and Mr. Bird.
3. Concerto for the Organ. 1. Allegro Maestoso. 2.
Adagio. 3. Rondo Allegretto. . . . . Rink.
4. Hear Sweet Spirit, (by request). . . . . Beethoven.
Mrs. Mattison.
5. Symphony No. 10. 1. Allegro Vivace. 2. Andante di molto. Finaie, Allegro. . . . . Mozart.
6. Gloria in Excelsis. . . . . Mercadante.
Mrs. Thomas, Mrs. Mattison and Mr. De Passio.
7. Andante con moto, from Symphony No. 5. . . . Beethoven.
8. Fugue, with obligato Pedal. . . . . Schellenberg.

Our friends of the ORPHEUS GLEE CLUB are now earnestly practising some of their best part-songs, for the festival of German Singing Clubs, which is to meet at Buffalo in the last week of July, and to picnic at Niagara.

The DRAYTONS had a benefit concert at the Boston Theatre, this week, while en route for Canada. . . . A farewell concert is to be given on the 21st to Mr. G. W. WARREN, at Albany, on the eve of his removal to Brooklyn, N. Y. Mrs. J. H. LONG will assist. . . . A complimentary concert was given week before last at Bumstead Hall, to Mrs. LIZZIE HEYWOOD, the singer who gave so much pleasure in her rendering of the principal soprano part in Mr. Kielblock's "Miles Standish."

Music Abroad.

London.

(From the Musical World, May 26.)

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—In the music assigned to Maffeo Orsini only one phase of Madame Alboni's talent has a chance of being completely revealed; but as this is probably the phase most readily appreciated by the mass, there can be no reason to wonder at the popularity it has enabled her to win. The instant her well known figure, draped in that singular tunic (if tunic it may be called) which her excessive "embonpoint" compels her to wear—was detected, mingling with the crowd (in the first scene of the opera), a burst of applause from all parts of the house proclaimed the satisfaction of the audience at seeing their favorite once more. The legend recounted by Orsini to his friends brought forth in all their beauty those pure contralto tones which have so often charmed the public, and, sung, as usual, to perfection, elicited the warmest demonstrations of approval. The "triumph," however, was of course reserved for "Il segreto per esser felice," which Madame Alboni never gave with more spirit and vocal facility, the incomparable "trillo" (shake—to employ our own less elegant vernacular) preceding in each couplet the resumption of the genial melody to which Donizetti has allied the words exciting the accustomed marks of admiration. It is almost superfluous to add that the brindisi was enthusiastically redemanded, and repeated with undiminished effect.

We need not recapitulate the many fine points that make the Lucrezia of Mademoiselle Titiens one of that lady's most striking and admirable performances; nor dwell upon the characteristics of Signor Mongini's Gennaro, which wants only a little softening here and there to be as irreprouchable as it is earnest and impulsive. The merits of these and of Signor Vialletti's very careful impersonation of the Duke have been more than once discussed. On the present occasion the interest naturally centred in Maffeo Orsini, and at the conclusion of the opera, when Mademoiselle Titiens and Signor Mongini had been summoned before the curtain, there was a general call for Alboni, who, after some delay, made her appearance, and was honored by such a greeting as is never accorded but to artistes standing highest in public esteem.

The house was crowded in every part, scarcely a vacant place being perceptible in gallery, boxes, pit, or stalls.

On Monday, an extra night, the Trovatore was given for the third time; on this occasion Madame Alboni taking the part of Azucena, allotted in the two previous representations to Madame Borghi-Mamo.

On Tuesday Semiramide was performed for the first time at Her Majesty's Theatre for several years. The cast was as follows: Semiramide, Mlle. Titiens; Arsace, Madame Alboni; Idreno, Signor Belart; Assur, Signor Everardi; and Oroo, Signor Vialletti. The character of Arsace,—upon which Rossini has lavished all the florid graces of his melodic invention, and which in one sense stands apart from every other personage in the lyric drama—affords the practised vocalist ample opportunity for display. It was in Arsace that Madame Alboni (at the opening of the Royal Italian Opera, 1847) first elicited the admiration of the English public, and since that memorable occasion it has always been regarded as one of her greatest, if not, indeed, her very greatest performance. If the voice has not quite the same depth and richness as of old, it has gained in other respects, being now so equal in volume and quality throughout the register, that it may be compared to a crystal without a flaw. For mellowness and even suavity of tone it is wholly unrivalled, the notes succeeding each other with such natural fluency, that it is impossible to detect a weak place or single out a "break." An instrument thus perfected enables the singer to articulate every phrase and passage set down with such unvarying ease, that any idea of difficulty never presents itself to the hearer, and the ars celare artem is realized to the letter. More faultless examples of vocal efficiency than the two airs, "Eccomi alfine in Babylonia," and "In si barbara sciagura"—as sung by Madame Alboni, could hardly be cited; or purer specimens of vocal declamation than the recitative belonging to the first, or than the duet with Semiramide (Act II.), including the delicious slow-movement, "Giorno d'orrore."

Mlle. Titiens, as Semiramide, is unequal—at times dramatic and superb, at times constrained, and therefore less entirely satisfactory.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The programme of the fourth concert on Monday last was unusually rich in material, and attracted a very large audience to the Hanover Square Rooms:—

Overture—Scherso—Song with Chorus, "You spotted snakes," (Miss Augusta Thomson and Mlle. Jenny Meyer)—Notturmo, March, and Final Chorus ("A Midsummer Night's Dream")..... Mendelssohn
Alr, "Du village voisin," Madame Rieder ("Le Serment")..... Auber
Concerto, Violin, No. 8, Herr Kämpel (Scena Cantante)..... Spohr
Recit. and Alr "Nur einen Wunsch, nur ein Verlangen" ("Iphigénie in Tauris")—Mlle. J. Meyer. Gluck
Overture, "Anacreon"..... Cherubini
Sinfonia in F, No. 8..... Beethoven

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The series of Subscription Concerts was continued on Friday the 18th, with Haydn's Creation. The work, by far the lightest in the repertoire of the Society, was, generally speaking, well performed. The band executed the Overture ("Chaos") in admirable style. The accompaniments were likewise worthy of commendation. The chorus showed their familiarity with the work, and were steady and correct as usual.

The soprano solo was undertaken, for the first time, by Miss Parepa, who did herself infinite credit. Indeed, the part suits her better than any sacred rôle she has attempted. "On mighty pens" was particularly effective, the ascending passages being delivered with accuracy and brilliancy of tone. Mr. Sims Reeves was never more favorably heard than "In native worth." The purity of his singing is exceeded by none of his contemporaries; while he renders this (and many other airs) with a manliness which is all his own. Signor Belletti has not yet quite recovered from his recent indisposition. He took infinite pains, however, with his music, and, in "Rolling in foaming billows," created a marked sensation. The room was crowded in every part.

MR. HENRY LESLIE'S CHORUS.—The concert on Wednesday last, the fifth of the season, was quite up to the standard which Mr. Leslie seems to have set up, and above which he will not go on any account. Glees, madrigals, and part-songs sung in a style nearly approaching perfection will always command an audience; but the interpolation of indifferent fantasias on operatic airs is simply distasteful to the musical public, whose opinion neither Mr. Leslie nor any one else can afford to despise. Last season we had sonatas, pianoforte and violin, and pianoforte and violoncello and other works of equal importance. This matter should be looked to. The motet of Hauptmann, "Source of all power and light," Wilbye's madrigal, "Sweet honey-sucking bees," "Hear my prayer" (Mendelssohn), trio canone, "Placido Zeffiretto" (Cherubini), were the noticeable features. A vocal duet, and a four-part song, by Mr. Henry Leslie, were sung with much effect. Both compositions are agreeable and well written.

MADAME PUZZI'S CONCERT.—A large and fashionable assembly attended the annual concert of Madame Puzzi, which came off at the Hanover Square Rooms on Monday morning. The programme was more than usually varied. The artists included Mesdames Borghi-Mamo, Lemmens-Sherington, Parepa, Rudersdorff, Everardi, Lemaire, and Rieder; Signors Mariano, Neri, Solieri, Ciabatta, Dragone, M. Desprét, and Mr. Patey, vocalists; and M. Leopold de Meyer (piano) and Signor Pezze (violoncello), instrumentalists. The special feature of the concert (to quote the Morning Post) "was the first appearance this season of the great 'lion pianist,' Leopold de Meyer, who executed a new fantasia on original themes, of his own composition, with extraordinary effect. We never heard him play with more brilliancy, power, delicacy, and finish." Being unanimously encored, he returned to the instrument and repeated the last half of the fantasia.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—Out of eight pieces in a programme devoted to various masters, no less than five were heard for the first time at the concert of Monday last.

The instrumental novelties comprised two quartets,—Mozart's in D minor, and Beethoven's in F minor; both played to perfection by Messrs. Sainton, Goffrie, Doyle, and Piatu: Mendelssohn's trio in C minor (No. 2), in which the first and last named gentlemen were joined by Herr Lubeck, who also gave Beethoven's sonata in C sharp minor, best known as the Moonlight Sonata.

On Monday next—an Italian night—Miss Arabella Goddard, Miss Laura Baxter, Mlle. Parepa, Herr Becker, &c., will appear. The selection (except one air repeated by desire) will be entirely new.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—On Saturday Il Barbiere was repeated. On Tuesday Il Don Giovanni was given, with Madame Grisi as Donna Anna; and on Thursday Il Trovatore.

La Gazza Ladra will be produced to-night, with Madame Penco as Ninetta (her first appearance in this part in London), and M. Faure as Fernando (first time of performance), with Madame Nantier-Didiée as Pippo, and Signor Ronconi as the Podesta.

MUSICAL GOSSIP.—Lovers of sacred music, choral societies, and others having like tastes and tendencies in the Art, will receive the promise of the re-issue of Latrobe's Selections, just put forward by Mr. Lonsdale, with great interest. Though the works of Mozart and Haydn, from which Latrobe drew some of his specimens, are now better known than in the days when the work was in publication, our acquaintance with the good sacred Italian music of last century has retrograded more than should have been allowed in catholic times like ours. While turning over the fourth volume, forwarded to us, the value of such men as Caldara, Jomelli, Hasse, has been recalled, and we have felt that we have lost something in narrowing ourselves within exclusive devotion to the writers of the German school,—however naturally that was a consequence of a great period, full of fascination and novelty. This fourth volume, again, includes the "De Profundis," by Gluck, which is almost, if not altogether, the solitary piece of sacred music by which that great master is remembered. As interest in this master's works is on the return, would it not be worth while for Mr. H. Leslie's or some other choir to take it in charge?

A comic opera, by Herr Pentenrieder,—of which the English title is "A House to Sell,"—has been lately, say the foreign journals, played at Leipzig, with marked success. Years ago, we heard at Munich of Herr Pentenrieder, as a composer of the highest promise. What is the disease in the life of such young men that seems to arrest their powers in production? One, two, three—twenty we could name, who "have lived and made no sign."—A more disappointing case is that of Herr Dessauer,—one of the freshest and most distinct men of genius belonging to his country, that has flourished there since Schubert's light was eclipsed. He, too, has been inactive, if not supine, for years: but we see with pleasure that a new opera by him "Domina," has just been produced with success, at Vienna. By this time, since Herr Dessauer's visit to England, made in the golden days of Miss Adelaide Kemble (whose "Earl's Daughter" will never be forgotten by those who love the Laureate's ballad, consummately sung)—he ought to have showered lieder, romances, chamber vocal music of every quality and form on the world.

The subject being gentle and characteristic chamber-music, we are led thereby to note with sadness and regret the death of GORDIGIANI, which, we are told, has just taken place at Florence: to our thinking, the latest—surely, we trust, not the last—Italian creative genius in music. His is an eminent instance of a quiet man, in a quiet walk of Art, winning his way to a great reputation, without "chariots and horses, and fifty men to run before him." There is no great science in his songs; there are no snatching effects in them; nothing to hold the common ear, to play on barrel-organs, nor out of which polkas can be got; but there are in them a certain selectness, an elegance, a truth to the text, which will keep many of them afloat, so long as singers of any country care to sing Italian chamber music. Gordigiani wished to try opera, but had no (or small) opportunity for doing so, and thus failed to break the barriers stormed down by Signor Verdi, with his Jerichoblasts of trumpets. As a man, he was gentle, unpretending,—interested in every one's music besides his own. Among recollections it may be permitted to recollect an interview at which he sang his Canzoni to M. Meyerbeer, and M. Meyerbeer his Melodies in return; and when the two men, true musicians, met in that mutual interest which implies universal sympathy.

The version of "Fidelio," given at the Théâtre Lyrique of Paris, with Madame Viardot for heroine, does not seem to have been fortunate. The opera is one which can conceal the worst singer, and betray the best one; with music obviously alien to the register of Madame Viardot's voice; and we are sorry that she has yielded to its dramatic temptations.

A correspondent at Rome mentions a "Hamlet," about to come out in the Eternal City, opera-wise, the music by Signor Moroni. The Danish prince will be presented by Signor Coletti. Shakspeare's hero, from a distance, seems too delicate and metaphysical to be possible in music, even for German opera. The one chance, in our time, for "Hamlet" on the musical stage, was during the reign of Mlle. Jenny Lind—marked out by nature, country, voice, and genius, to be Ophelia.—London Athenæum, May 19.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Silver Moon. Song and Chorus. R. S. Taylor. 25
Very pleasing. Suitable for the parlor.

Not a drum was heard. John Barnett. 35
A song in the descriptive style, for a baritone voice.

The earth it loves. Quartet for male voices. Abt. 25

My fatherland. " " " 25

The Soldier's Adieu. " " " 25

Love's Greeting. " " " 25

As Gentlemen's Glee Clubs after the fashion of Germany are becoming more plentiful all over the country, the want of available good music is severely felt. The above part-songs of Abt, who has cultivated this branch of musical composition with great success, will be found pleasing to all.

Little Urchie. Ballad. F. Pannell. 25
A pretty, simple song, for young singers.

Hey, the bonnie breast-knot. Scotch. 35
Well known to lovers of Highland music as one of its nicest gems.

Merrily we'll laugh and sing. Quartet. J. W. Turner. 25
For the Social Circle or Amateur Clubs. It is easy to sing, and will please all lovers of plain, musical fare.

Instrumental Music.

Arizona Quickstep. G. W. Stratton. 25
Strongly marked and not lacking in vivacity or striking melodies. Just the thing for a brass band to get arranged and play for marching.

The Soldier's Adieu. A. Lindahl. 25
A sentimental Nocturne of medium difficulty, a great favorite in England, where many editions have been sold.

Spray Waltz. Lottie M. Wheeler. 25

Masquerade Polka. J. Hilton Jones. 25

Greenwood Polka. L. O. Emerson. 25

Merry Chimes Polka. H. S. Saroni. 25

Royal Waltz. S. H. Long. 25

Fresh dance music, not difficult. Good Recreation pieces for scholars.

Wigwam Grand March. Comer. 25

This piece is dedicated to the Hon. A. Lincoln and has his portrait on the title-page. It is a fine, spirited march.

Books.

THALBERG'S L'ART DU CHANT. (The Art of Singing applied to the Piano.) Handsomely bound in Cloth. 3,00

The piano cannot render that which is most perfect in the beautiful art of singing, namely, the faculty of prolonging sounds, but the player may overcome this imperfection with address and skill. How this may be done, the great Player has shown in twelve Transcriptions of melodies from the masterworks of great composers. The melody is engraved in large notes, so as to stand out and be recognized easily. They are all figured, and are as invaluable to the accomplished pianist as to the student, who would get at the root of the marvellous effects which Thalberg produced in his playing.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

To a Beautiful Voice.

Lovely voice, in rich vibration
Through the listening silence spreading,
Ecstasy's intoxication
O'er my raptured senses shedding, —
Voice, like perfume penetrating,
And yet keener, subtler, sweeter, —
Voice, like light illuminating,
And yet clearer and completer, —
Which doth charm me most divinely
Scarce I know — when, softly stealing
O'er mine ear, thy tones float finely;
Or, when through the broad sky pealing,
Rich they run in golden gushes;
One is like the tremble tender
Of a star, 'mid sunset-blushes;
And the other, like the splendor
Such a star might shed, asunder
In a radiant heart-burst riven, —
An aerial fount of wonder,
Scattering light o'er earth and heaven.

When about thee other voices
Their harmonious charms are throwing,
How my listening heart rejoices
In thy full or faintest flowing!
Ever soul-full, ever single,
Like the spirit of the chorus,
Thou dost float apart, to mingle
Only with the azure o'er us.
Whence those tones, O rose of voices!
Though so cloudless, yet as tender
As a morning that rejoices
In the Spring's returning splendor!

As a streamlet lovelier showeth,
When through lovely banks it passes,
So thy liquid sweetness oweth
Half its charm to what it glasses;
Life's true wealth in ample measure,
Love, and Charity, and Meekness,
All a gentle spirit's treasure,
Simple Wisdom, clad in weakness, —
Which a virgin warmth of passion,
Throbbing, swelling deeply under,
Trembles through in fervid fashion;
Thrilling me with pleasant wonder,
E'en as though, some evening stilly,
'Mid the greenwood's balmy hushes,
I should find a lonely lily,
Blushing with the rose's blushes.

Wild with eager life and gladness,
Airy, winged, restraint disdaining,
And, if touched at all with sadness,
But of over-joy complaining;
Clearer, fresher than the ringing
Of untainted crystal fountains,
Filtered fine through flint, and flinging
Light and laughter down the mountains;
Can I hear that voice, awaking
Joy in all things that surround it, —
Prophecying rapture, making
Eloquent the air around it;
So enchanting, so endearing,
Half disarming grief of grieving, —
Can I hear, nor lose, while hearing,
In all ill, my faint believing?

FANNY MALONE RAYMOND.

Popular Music of the Olden Time.*

(From the Quarterly Review.)

To persons who judge social phenomena by standards taken within the limits of their own actual experience, the taste for music that is so conspicuous in modern England seems a remarkable novelty, not altogether compatible with the national character. Scarcely thirty years have elapsed since the normal John Bull was supposed to entertain a manly abhorrence against the sing-song that delighted more frivolous foreigners, and the present generation has not yet forgotten the animadversions of the Chesterfields and Stevenses, who encouraged, in fashionable and literary circles, the want of sympathy with sweet sounds, already to be found in the multitude. But now music is the rage everywhere,—if, indeed, the word "rage" can be applied to a steady predilection, which extends over all classes of the British public, and gives no signs of evanescence. Two opera-houses, and sometimes three, compete with each other for the patronage of those persons who love the dramatic form of the art; nor does the employment of the Italian language diminish the enjoyment of a large mass who would consider themselves very respectable scholars if they possessed a grammatical knowledge of their own tongue. The epicure, who seeks those delicacies less appreciated by the profanum vulgus, finds a series of soirées and matinées sufficient to occupy his mind with instrumental music of the most frecherché kind for at least three months in every year. The lover of sacred music is content to pass three summer hours in a large uncomfortable room, as one of a dense crowd that listens to an Oratorio by Handel or by Mendelssohn. The humblest connoisseur who frequents music-halls, where smoking and drinking season the pleasure afforded by song, would not be content unless some specimen of a higher class of composition varied the ordinary Irish air and Nigger melody. Nor are people content to be hearers only; they want to play themselves and to sing themselves, after another fashion than that of their fathers, who loved what was called a "good song" with a lusty chorus, after the now obsolete supper. The fashionable young gentlemen, who lounge and simper about drawing-rooms in the London season, are commonly proficient in more than one musical instrument, and often make a respectable figure in part-singing. The masses that constantly flock to receive instruction in the classes of Mr. John Hullah, prove how deeply a desire to become accomplished in music has penetrated the less opulent portion of the community. Music is at present the art that, par excellence, is loved and respected by all conditions of Englishmen; and though, of course, the love is in some cases affected, such affectation is only analogous to the proverbial homage paid by vice to virtue in the shape of hypocrisy.

All this looks very odd to people who fancy that the English character is to be tested by the evidence of the last seventy years; but the antiquary, who carries his glance further back, is perfectly aware that the phenomenon, far from being a modern innovation, is the revival of a musical taste that existed in this country for centuries without interruption, and that the anti-musical tendencies which were so highly developed in the last century simply denoted an exceptional state of the British mind. As well might the Frenchman, born during the prevalence of the Revolutionary Calendar, regard the substitution of "1805" for "XIV.," and the transformation of the 10th Nivose into the 31st of December, as the introduction of an unheard-of novelty, as the Briton express astonishment at the passion for music manifested in his native island about the middle of the nineteenth century.

The very valuable and copious addition which Mr. W. Chappell has made to the history of popular music—and, we may add, of popular lyrical poetry—in England, expands into a bulky chronicle of facts the simple proposition that this is naturally the most musical of lands. We cannot go back far enough to ascertain when the English love of music began; we must come down to a very modern period before we find it in a lukewarm state.

As for the Welsh, they have notoriously gone harping on from time immemorial, and they have their harp-contests still. So different were the notions of the ancient Cambrian legislators from those of Lord Chesterfield, who allowed his son to pay for fiddlers, provided he did not fiddle himself, that, by the Leges Wallice, the possession of a harp and ability to play on it belonged to the essential attributes of a gentleman. He who was not a gentleman could not own a harp, as he would thus have been unduly exalted; he who was a gentleman could not be deprived of the instrument on account of debt, as he would thus have been unduly degraded.

Among the Anglo-Saxons, the connexion between the harp and the pedigree was equally close. The poet Cædmon, being of lowly origin, was unable to play the noble instrument. On one occasion, when in high company, he was expected to take his turn and accompany his song with tuneful strings; he left the feast, and going out, went home. So says the Venerable Bede: "Surgebat e mediâ cenâ, et egressus ad suam domum repedabat." But this cold narrative of the fact did not satisfy King Alfred, who, in his Saxon paraphrase of "Bede," states the poet's feelings as well as his retreat. "Arras he for sceome" (he rose for shame), said the royal translator, himself a perfect musician for his age.

But we have no need of more anecdotes to show the proficiency of the Anglo-Saxons, as Mr. Chappell's well-attested account of Aldhelm, Abbot of Malmesbury, who died in 709, will amply prove:

"The first specimen of musical notation given by the learned Abbot Gerbert, in his De Cantu et Musica Sacra, a prima ecclesiæ ætate (i. 202), is to a poem by St. Aldhelm, in Latin hexameters, in praise of virginity. This was written for the use of Anglo-Saxon nuns. The manuscript from which it is taken is, or was, in the monastery of St. Blaise, in the Black Forest, and Gerbert dates it as of the ninth or tenth century. It contains various poems of St. Aldhelm, all of which are with music, and the Paschale Carmen of Sedulius, one of the early Irish Christians, which is without music. Many very early English and Irish manuscripts were, without doubt, taken to Germany by the English and Irish priests, who assisted in converting the Germans to Christianity. St. Boniface, "the apostle of Germany," and first Archbishop of Mentz (Mayence), who was killed in the discharge of his duties in the year 755, was an Anglo-Saxon whose name had been changed from Winfred to Boniface by Pope Gregory II. "Boniface seems always to have had a strong prejudice in favor of the purity of the doctrines of the church of his native country, as they had been handed down by St. Augustine: in points of controversy he sought the opinions of the Anglo-Saxon bishops, even in opposition to those inculcated by the Pope; and he sent for multitudes of Anglo-Saxons, of both sexes, to assist him in his labors." (Biog. Brit. Lit., i. 315). He placed English nuns over his monastic foundations, and selected his bishops and his abbots from among his countrymen. His successor in the Archbishopric was also an Englishman. To revert to St. Aldhelm—Faricius (a foreign monk of Malmesbury), who wrote his life about the year 1100, tells us that he exercised himself daily in playing upon the various musical instruments then in use, whether with strings, pipes, or any other variety by which melody can be produced. The words are, "Musica autem artis omnia instrumenta quæ fidibus vel fistulis aut aliis varietatibus melodice fieri possunt, et memoria tenuit et in cotidiana usui habuit." (Faricius, Col. 140, vo.) The anecdote of Aldhelm's stationing himself on the bridge in the character of a gleeman or minstrel, to arrest the attention of his countrymen who were in the habit of hurrying home from church when the singing was over, instead of waiting for the exhortation or sermon, and of his singing poetry of a popular character to them in order to induce them gradually to listen to more serious subjects, was derived by William of Malmesbury from an entry made by King Alfred in his manual or note-book. Aldhelm died in 755, and King Alfred in 901; yet William of Malmesbury, who flourished about 1140, tells us that one of the "trivial songs" to which Alfred alludes as written by Aldhelm for one of these occasions, was still sung by the common people. The literary education of youth, even of the upper classes, in Anglo-Saxon times, was limited to the being taught to commit the songs and literature of their country to memory. Every one of gentle blood was instructed in 'harp and song,' but it was only thought necessary for those who were to be priests or minstrels to be taught to read and write."

Nor were the Danes a whit behind the Saxons. About sixty years after Alfred's well known visit to the Danish camp, Anlaf, king of the Danes, retaliated the stratagem on King Athelstan, and, though he was discovered in spite of his disguise, this was not on account of any musical shortcomings, but through the very unprofessional circumstance that he buried the money which had been given him as a reward. The Norman, Taillefer, who marched in front of the army at the battle of Hastings, gained for himself a broad renown; but the fact is not to be overlooked, that on the evidence of Fordun, the English spent the night before the battle in singing and drinking.

Under the kings who immediately followed the Norman Conquest minstrelsy flourished much—so much, indeed, that the more rigid monks began to be jealous of the honors lavished upon the professors of the seemingly frivolous science. Henry II. and still more notoriously Richard I. were patrons of the kindred arts, poetry and music, and in the reign of John one party of minstrels did such good service, that their posterity retained an honorable name long after minstrelsy in general, fallen from its high estate, had degenerated into a calling for the lowest vagabonds. Ranulph Earl of Chester, being besieged in his castle of Rothlan, in the year 1212, sent for help to De Lacy, constable of Chester, who making use of the minstrels assembled at Chester fair, brought together a vast number of persons, who under the conduct of a gallant youth, named Dutton, so completely terrified the Welsh besiegers, that the siege was speedily raised. As far down as the reign of Elizabeth, this Timotheus-like use of music was held in such honorable remembrance, that when minstrelsy was treated by legislators as a vulgar nuisance, only fit to be put down, an exception was made in favor of the Dutton family.

Although the very doubtful tradition that Edward I. extirpated the Welsh bards, and drew down upon his head the imprecations of the wordy old gentleman immortalized by Gray, places him in no favorable relation to the harper's profession, one of the most satisfactory records on the subject of old English minstrelsy refers to an event that occurred during his reign. This is a roll (printed for the Roxburghe club), containing the names of those who attended the Cour plénière held by the king at Westminster, and at the New Temple in the Whitsuntide of 1306. The six chiefs of the minstrels who figured on this occasion were all, like the magnates of the Heralds' College, "kings," though by no means equal to each other in rank, for whereas four of them received an amount equal to about 50*l* of the present day, the sixth, "Le Roy Druet," was obliged to be content with a pittance of 2*l*. As the importance of minstrelsy increased, not only did these gifted persons abuse their high privileges, but impostors started up, hoping to share the bounty bestowed upon authorized talent. Both the realities and the "shams" were restrained by a royal decree of 1315, by which it was ordered that none should resort to the houses of prelates, earls, and barons, unless he were a minstrel, and that even of the suitable professors there should not come above three or four minstrels at the most in one day, "unless he be desired of the master of the house." The three or four, we may presume, had a right to play and to feast, whether invited or not, and this privilege seems to have descended, with modifications, to the organ-boys and artists on the hurdy-gurdy, who cause so much indignant letter-writing on the part of newspaper correspondents.

The glory of the minstrel presupposed a predilection for one kind of poetry and music among gentle and simple; consequently as poetry became learned and music became recondite, the ancient craftsman fell into rapid disrepute. Richard Sheale, one of the last of the race, who died in 1574, could not make people believe that he had been robbed of sixty pounds, on Dunsmore-heath. The "chant" in which he describes this calamity, and which may almost be called the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," shows how far less profitable was poetry than retail commerce.

The numbers of poor Sheale are not very melodious, but he bears an honorable name, as the reputed preserver of "Chevy Chase."

At the time when the minstrels, who had delighted crowned heads and courts, were degraded into "rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars," the proficiency of the English in music was a theme of universal commendation. Britanni, præter alia, formam, musicam et lautas mensas proprie sibi vindicant, says Erasmus, in his "Encomium Morie." Singing at sight was a common accomplishment among the courtiers of Henry VIII., who was himself a musical composer. He even patronized ballads and songs of the popular kind in the early part of his reign, though when they were used as weapons against the Reformation, he did all he could to suppress them. It is to an Act of 1533 against "such books, ballads, rhymes, and songs, as be pestiferous and noisome," that Mr. Chappell partly attributes the fact, that printed ballads of an early date are not now to be found.

When Queen Elizabeth ascended the throne, the musical taste of our ancestors reached its culminating point, nor was it in any way diminished during the whole of her long reign. At the beginning of the present century, when the connoisseurs of music had to make out for themselves a case against the disciples of the prosaic wits who guided the preceding generation, they were wont to heap up innumerable citations from Shakespeare, to show that there was a high authority on their side; but in point of fact Shakespeare uttered no more than the general sentiment of his age, and the grave corporation of London was advertising the musical abilities of boys educated in Bridewell and Christ's Hospital, by way of recommending them as servants and apprentices, while the Bard of Avon was expressing his abhorrence of all those who were not "mov'd with concord of sweet sounds." "Never trust a tailor that does not sing at his work, for his mind is of nothing but filching," says an old fellow in one of Beaumont and Fletcher's plays, and Tusser, in his "Points of Huswifery," published in 1570, says for the benefit of country matrons—

"Such servants are oftentimes painful (i. e., painstaking) and good.
That sing in their labor, as birds in the wood."

But the moral obligation of learning music is most clearly set forth by Byrd, in his collection of Psalms and Sonnets, dated 1588:—

- 1st. "It is a knowledge easily taught, and quickly learned, where there is a good master and an apt scholar."
- 2nd. "The exercise of singing is delightful to nature, and good to preserve the health of man."
- 3rd. "It doth strengthen all parts of the breast, and doth open the pipes."
- 4th. "It is a singular good remedy for a stutting and stammering in the speech."
- 5th. "It is the best means to procure a perfect pronunciation, and to make a good orator."
- 6th. "It is the only way to know where nature hath bestowed a good voice; . . . and in many that excellent gift is lost, because they want art to express nature."

7th. "There is not any music of instruments whatsoever comparable to that which is made of the voices of men; where the voices are good, and the same well sorted and ordered."

8th. "The better the voice is, the meeter it is to honor and serve God therewith; and the voice of man is chiefly to be employed to that end."

"Since singing is so good a thing,
I wish all men would learn to sing."

The extent to which the very air of London was impregnated with melody and harmony in the Elizabethan epoch is thus vivaciously described by Mr. Chappell:—

"Tinkers sang catches, milkmaids sang ballads, carters whistled; each trade, and even the beggars, had their special songs; the bass viol hung in the drawing-room for the amusement of waiting visitors; and the lute, cittern [a species of guitar strung with wire], and virginals, for the amusement of waiting customers, were the necessary furniture of the barber's shop."

The barber, however, must not be dropped at once. He was as important in London, during the reign of Elizabeth, as he was at Bagdad under the "Commander of the Faithful," and we therefore extract Mr. Chappell's account of his connexion with popular music:—

"One branch of the barber's occupation in former days was to draw teeth, to bind up wounds, and to let blood. The parti-colored pole, which was exhibited at the doorway, painted after the fashion of a bandage, was his sign, and the teeth he had drawn were suspended at the windows, tied upon lute-strings. The lute, the cittern, and the gittern hung from the walls, and the virginals stood in the corner of his shop. "If idle," says the author of "The Trimming of Thomas Nashe," "barbers pass their time in life-delighting musique" (1597). The barber in Lyly's "Midas" (1592) says to his apprentice, "Thou knowest I have taught thee the knocking of the hands, like the tuning of a cittern," and Truewit, in Ben Jonson's "Silent Woman," wishes the barber "may draw his own teeth, and add them to the lute-string." In the same play, Morose, who had married the barber's daughter, thinking her faithless, exclaims, "That cursed barber! I have married his cittern, that is common to all men." One of the commentators not understanding this, altered it to "I have married his cittern," &c. Dekker also speaks of "a barber's cittern for every serving man to play upon." One of the "Merrie-concoited jests of George Peel" is the stealing of a barber's lute, and in Lord Falkland's "Wedding Night," we read, "he has travelled and speaks languages, as a barber's boy plays o' th' gittern." Ben Jonson says, "I can compare him to nothing more happily than a barber's virginals; for every man may play upon him," and in "The Staple of News," "My barber Tom, one Christmas, got into a Masque at court, by his wit and the good means of his cittern, holding up thus for one of the music." To the latter passage Gifford adds another in a note. "For you know, says Tom Brown, that a cittern is as natural to a barber, as milk to a calf, or dancing bears to a bagpiper."

The music that occupied these various amateurs was naturally of a popular kind; for, in the scholastic compositions of the age, harmony alone was considered, and that of a recondite kind that did not appeal to the uncultivated—we may almost say—the unsophisticated ear.

Handel and Haydn Society.

FROM THE SECRETARY'S REPORT, MAY, 1860.

Though we have derived no pecuniary advantage from our public performances, it is believed that the Society has rarely, if ever, passed through a season with more credit to itself than the one just closed; for, though we have appeared before the public but three times, we feel that the commendations, so generously extended to us by the public press, are deserved. The first performance of Samson, on the evening of Nov. 27th, may be instanced as one of the best ever given by our Society. The chorus was more evenly balanced than usual, and prompt to a degree unsurpassed by any previous efforts of the Society. Madame Anna Bishop, one of England's most gifted vocalists, was engaged in its performance, and yet the receipts were not equal to the expenditures.

In answer to this, it is said by some whose opinions, it would seem, ought at least to be entitled to respect, that the public demand novelties, and that if the Handel and Haydn Society expects to be supported, it must produce something novel; something out of the beaten track; something that is good; something that will excite laughter and loud applause; and if it be on Sunday night, so much the better; for, in their opinion, that night of all the seven is the one which should be chosen for amusements of the description named.

We do not understand what is meant by novelties, as referring to performances of a Sacred Music Society—though in the opinion of some there is no such division as sacred and secular in music—but if it has reference to the performances of selections from the Operas, interspersed with comic or vulgar songs, we prefer to leave that to an Opera troupe, and allow them to reap the reward of such exhibitions.

But is Sacred Music, then, to be rudely thrown aside as a thing that was, but is not, and our Handel and Haydn Society to be offered the alternative of engaging in Operatic performances, or Negro minstrelsy, to perpetuate its existence? Are the great organ compositions of John Sebastian Bach, and Rink; the Te Deums and Anthems of Dr. Croft, of Tallis, of Purcell, of Boyce, of Crotch, of Blow, of Chard, of Beckwith—but the list is too long to enumerate—whose soul-stirring strains have reverberated through the vaulted domes of the cathedrals of Old England for centuries; are the Oratorios of Handel, of Haydn, and of Mendelssohn, all, all, to pass for nothing in these latter days of progress? and must we fall down and worship Italian Opera in order to be considered fashionably musical, and see no good in anything else?

We believe that the glorious promises of our Saviour, as embodied in the immortal Messiah of Handel, are worthy of our consideration and regard, at least; that the story of the prophet Elijah, as presented to us in the impressive melodies and closely woven harmonies of Mendelssohn, is one that will be listened to with reverence and with love, so long as a Christian people shall continue to acknowledge the Bible, from which the text of this Oratorio is taken, as the revealed word of God, or the ears of the multitude shall remain true to all that is lovely and inspiring in the heavenly art of music. Away with such shallow arguments for novelties; they are the inventions of the shallow-brained, and we will not heed them. Let us remain true to ourselves and to the great objects of our organization, and we have nothing to fear, though a cloud may for a time obscure our pathway.

Sacred Music—without going into any quibbles of argument to prove precisely where the line of demarcation between it and the secular begins, and where it ends—is, according to the general acceptance of the term, that which is written for, and used in, the Christian churches of the world; or those other great works, known by the name of Oratorios.

This Society was originally intended, and so named in the act of incorporation, as a Sacred Music Society, and the hope may be expressed that we may never depart from that intention and pledge to the public. But there is nothing that I am aware of, to deter us from an occasional meeting for practice of that which is termed secular, whenever it shall seem advisable to do so. Secular does not necessarily imply the frivolous and worthless. It may include much that is elevating in sentiment that would be found valuable to us in many particulars, and it may be well to consider the propriety and expediency of sometimes resorting to it.

Gentlemen of the Handel and Haydn Society;—this beautiful hall, so admirably adapted to the purposes for which it was intended, and so elegant in design and finish, has, with that liberality which has always characterized the name of CHICKERING, been placed at our disposal by the worthy successors of that old and true friend to our Society, who has long since passed on to that bourne from whence no traveller returns, but whose kindness of heart, and liberality so generously extended to every worthy cause, has been handed down to those bearing his name and filling the place made vacant by his decease.

This beautiful hall is given to us without money and without price, where we may sojourn for an indefinite period, free from all the annoyances necessarily attending the occupation of a public hall, where all classes and all associations who may, for the time, be in possession, have equal rights and privileges with ourselves.

By the arrangement our annual expenses will be materially lessened; and a still further reduction is desirable, if it can be effected without detriment to our efficiency.

Our Society is the oldest, and by far the most efficient of any similar organizations; and it should be our pride and ambition to so conduct its affairs, that it may maintain the enviable position it now occupies among the Sacred Music Societies of the country. But this can only be done by the most thorough discipline and the constant attendance of each and every member upon all meetings of the Society, whether for purposes of rehearsal or for business.

When this Society was first organized, and for a long period of years thereafter, it was the only channel through which the great works of the greatest composers that have ever lived could be conveyed to the ears of the public; and the consequence was that it met with very considerable success, pecuniarily, in its public performances, and enjoyed a degree of popularity unexampled in the history of any similar association, here or elsewhere.

Its concerts were thronged with the élite of the city, and there it was that the great sacred compositions referred to above, were heard for the first time by a large majority of those who frequented them.

To this fact may be attributed, in no small degree, the high state of musical culture and appreciation which has always characterized our community.

The public now, in its more advanced state of musical experience, demands a more perfect interpretation of those great sacred compositions than it formerly did, before music was so generally taught as it is at the present time; and if we would not be left behind in this age of progress, we must use every exertion to keep pace with the requirements of the times, and not be content to repose on our laurels, or be ambitious to appear before the public in any other capacity than as a Sacred Music Society whose sole energies are devoted to the most perfect rendition of such compositions as have been named above. Let us not be lured away from our proper course by any clamoring for novelties, but rather leave those things for others, and let us hope that whenever we do appear before the public, we shall have that support and encouragement we so much need, and which we should strive to deserve.

It may not be inappropriate in this connection, for the benefit of those interested, to state, that the expenses attending the performance of a full Oratorio, with orchestra, are very large, say, ordinarily, Five Hundred Dollars; and this without any assistance other than that which we have at hand. We furnish to the public the best available vocal talent, a complete orchestra, and the largest and most effective body of choristers in this country, with a highly accomplished and experienced conductor, and ask the people to fill our hall to hear this body of musicians in the "Messiah" or the "Elijah," at an admission fee of only one half a dollar, and we too often find that we have labored in vain, and not only given our time, but our money, for the gratification of having done a good thing well. I know this sounds like complaining, but it is nevertheless true; and yet, we need not despair. The Oratorio in England is, perhaps, the most popular species of amusement, if amusement it may be called, though to the thoughtful it is a sermon; and "the most impressive one I ever listened to," said an eminent writer and scholar, at the close of a performance of Handel's Messiah which he had sat through, drinking in the soul-stirring strains of that immortal composition.

Is it too much to hope for, that the Oratorio will become popular in this country,—that, in this city, where there is so just an appreciation of everything that is high in art, such musical feasts as the Handel and Haydn Society can alone furnish, will be liberally sustained? We think it is not; and we also believe, that at no distant period, no matter what else may be popular among us, the Handel and Haydn Society will be the acknowledged head of everything that is good in that department of art, if we but remain true to ourselves.

The Italian Opera is popular, and always will be so under proper management, but that need not affect us. Ours is a distinct and special province. We need not be so blinded by prejudice as to see good only in the light and graceful flow of Italian Opera, neither should we eschew everything that is not Handelian. Can we not admire a beautiful summer landscape, with its waving fields of corn, and listen to the low murmurs of the bubbling brook, as it glides along to the great ocean, and the next moment be awed into wonder and astonishment at viewing some majestic pile of mountain scenery frowning down upon us in all the native grandeur of its immense proportions?

We trust the days of such follies are rapidly passing away, and that a more rational view of matters and things musical will take the place of the narrow-minded views now expressed by some.

FROM THE LIBRARIAN'S REPORT.

I have a complete catalogue of the music now owned by the Society.

Of the works complete in score, vocal and instrumental parts, the following is a list, which I offer, thinking it may be of interest to those members of the Society unfamiliar with the contents of the Library:

Creation, (The).....	Haydn.
David, .....	Neukomm.
Eli, .....	Costa.
Elijah, .....	Mendelssohn.
Engedi, .....	Beethoven.
Hymn of Praise, .....	Mendelssohn.
Hymn of the Night, .....	Neukomm.
Israel in Egypt, .....	Handel.
Jephtha, .....	"
Judas Maccabæus, .....	"
Martyrs, (The).....	Donizetti.
Messe Solenne, .....	Beethoven.
Messiah, (The).....	Handel.
Moses in Egypt, .....	Rossini.
Mount Sinai, .....	Neukomm.
"Requiem" Mass, .....	Mozart.
Saint Paul, .....	Mendelssohn.
Samson, .....	Handel.
Seven Sleepers, .....	Löwe.
Solomon, .....	Handel.
Stabat Mater, .....	Rossini.
Transient and Eternal, (The)....	Romberg.

We have forty-two scores of different Oratorios or other works, many of which are duplicated, making the number of volumes of scores, eighty. In addition to the above, we have a large collection of Miscellaneous music, consisting of detached Choruses, Anthems, Hymns, &c.

I have the pleasure to announce that since the last annual meeting of the Society, two valuable additions have been made to our Library. These are the full vocal and instrumental parts of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," and Handel's "Jephtha," together with two scores of each oratorio.

These truly valuable works were presented to the Society by Mr. Theron J. Dale, whose generosity was acknowledged by a vote of thanks from the Government. The members of the Society proved their appreciation of Mr. Dale's gift by the interest they manifested in the rehearsals of St. Paul.

NOTES.

VIENNA, MAY 12.—Ah, here comes the "Journal of Music," of April 28th. Welcome, old friend! (So the leaves are cleanly cut, and the man with the "terrible memory," now reclines on the lounge with his back to the window, and opens to the first article. As he reads he smiles; then he begins to look cross; at length, like Mercutio's soldier, "he swears a prayer or two" and reads on; then he gets so disgusted he can hardly continue; at last, the matter becomes so ridiculous that he only laughs; at the end he begins to soliloquize.)

Well! here is the climax of absurdity! and Frau Elise Polko of the little city—but big fortress—of Minden in Westphalia, has put her cap top of it. The first edition of her musical chaff was enough for me eight years since, so I was not aware that she had carried her exhibitions of ignorance quite so far as this proves. A note must be made upon it; however, as I see there is an editorial warning, the note shall not be one of mere "historical flaws and anachronisms," such for instance as,—

1. That "during the uncommonly fine month of June, 1822," Beethoven did not live in Vienna, and therefore could hardly have walked daily on the Wasser glacis.

2. That the entire description of the man's personal appearance and bearing, save that his hair was thick and already pretty gray, is utterly false to the recollections of the many with whom I have talked, who knew him personally.

3. That, all this about the "wonderful dreamer" and "venerated apparition" is drawn from a sadly weak imagination.

4. That, at the time when according to Polko, Minna [Schroeder in the midst of thunder and "the roaring of the storm," in June, 1822, could talk with Beethoven in a "mild, firm voice," the brother, the nephew, Schindler, Peters, Breuning, all his friends, whose strong manly voices had been familiar to his ear for many years, were obliged to communicate with him, even in the quiet of his own chamber, in writing.

5. That just at this time the Viennese did not feel a special interest in the composer on account of the finishing of his new opera,—and so on. No, upon only one point will I make the

NOTE.

"Wilhelmina Schroeder made 'Fidelio' famous all over the world," says E. Polko. Beethoven had finished it a few months before June, 1822, and kept it back from the stage because he could find no adequate "Leonore!" says E. Polko. And Miss Raymond translates, and Dwight prints divers columns of stuff, founded on these two texts, by the said E. Polko. Very well. Fact one. Beethoven wrote the part of "Leonore" expressly for a certain songstress—viz., Anna Milder. Fact two. She sang it in Vienna three times in 1805. She sang again three times in 1806. Fact four. That an edition of the music without the overture and finales was printed in 1810, and a second complete soon followed. Fact five. That in 1814, the text was by Treitschke newly written, and the music revised by Beethoven, and it was again put upon the stage in Vienna with Milder. Facts six, seven, &c., that it was sung in Vienna in 1814.....	22 times.

1815.....	10 "
1816.....	10 "
1817.....	9 "

The opera in its old form had been carried to Wiesbaden before 1815, by the operatic company of Joseph Seconda, which had given it also certainly four times in Leipzig. In its new form it established itself in Berlin in 1815; in Leipzig the same year; about that time C. M. von Weber gave it for his own benefit in Prag; it appeared in Königsberg in 1820; in Munich in 1821. Here we see how little known "Fidelio" was; how it was kept back by the composer; how true it is that he threatened to burn the score if any one "asked him another question about it," and that "his anger was so imposing, his eyes blazed so resolutely"—pfui, Teufel! and how true that the world is indebted to Minna Schroeder, and the rest of this gospel of E. Polko. Still, asks Obadiah, was it not the Schroeder that made it popular? As to that, this:—Revived with Milder, May 23d, 1814, and given in the space of nineteen months, thirty-two times. [Revived with the Schroeder Nov. 3, 1822, and given, five times that year—three times the next—in fourteen months, that is eight times. And so endeth the note to this "sweet, pretty story" of Fran Elise Polko, of Munden, in Westphalia, to whom, with this charge of grape shot (a cannon against a tomtit) I bid a tender, affectionate, and eternal farewell.

In the preface to the "Freyschütz" now publishing in "Dwight's Journal" I read that the first scenes are not given in America. They are not given anywhere. Kind, the author of the book, urged Weber by every consideration, that he could bring forward, not to omit them, but was unable to overcome his stubbornness. The consequence is, that the catastrophe is blind to all beholders, and of all whom I have asked, and they are many, to explain by what agency the result is supposed to be produced, in other words the "story" of the last scene, I have never found one that could give an intelligible answer, unless he had read the play as published by Kind. How many, who have only seen the play on the stage, know that a bunch of consecrated roses have any connection with the salvation of the heroine and the destruction of the villain of the play?

In the article on Marx a gentleman has called my attention to an error, which, though it does not weaken the force of the argument in fact, had better be corrected. It is just one of those annoying lapses of which one is so easily the victim if he writes: trusting to memory, far away from his books of reference.

The mistake is in saying that the "Creation" of Haydn, and the "Prometheus" of Beethoven, were both given within a few weeks of each other for the first time. Any sketch of Haydn's life almost will tell us that it was first publicly performed in the theatre, March 19, 1799, that it was given December 22d and 23d of that year for the Musicians' Fund, &c.

The point of the argument however is, that the "Prometheus," with a somewhat analogous subject was produced, while Haydn's "Creation" was the fresh topic of admiration in all musical circles. And this was so.

Leopold Mozart to his wife.

Milan, December 22, 1770.

On the 19th occurred the first rehearsal on the stage.

The preceding one on the 17th was gone through in the assembly room of the Ridotta. Heaven be thanked, all went off well. Yesterday there was a rehearsal of the recitatives. To-day there will be a second rehearsal on the stage, and on Monday a full rehearsal.

As regards the 26th, the day fixed for the first performance, what consoles me is that I can see the actors (recitanti), and the orchestra as well, are pleased; and I have still, God be thanked, my ears left me. During the rehearsal I posted myself quite at the back, under the principal entrance, that I might hear the effect quite at a distance. Perhaps my ears were too partial. Meanwhile we see all our kind friends rejoiced and satisfied, and all congratulating my son. The ill-disposed are positively dumb. The best esteemed maestri of the city, Fiorini* and Sammartini†, are our true friends, as also are Lampugnani‡, Piazza Colombio.§ On this account envy, incredulity, and prejudice against the productions of our child will have no injurious effect. At least, I hope it will not have the sad fate of Jomelli's, whose second opera at Naples fell completely flat (a terra), so much so that it is to be withdrawn for another. Yet he is a renowned maestro, about whom the Italians make a terrible noise. On the other hand it was a folly on his part, perhaps, to compose two operas in the same year for the same theatre, especially when he saw the first had no great success. Since the 16th we have been every evening, after the Ave Maria, at the opera until eleven o'clock, Friday excepted.

Milan, December 29, 1770.

God be praised! The first performance of the opera took place on the 26th, with complete and universal success, and with circumstances which have never before occurred at Milan; to wit, an air sung by the prima donna was, contrary to all usage on the prima sera, repeated a second time, whereas at a first performance they never cry fuori; and in the second place all the airs, except a few delle vecchine parti, were greeted with extraordinary applause, succeeded by cries of Evviva il maestro! Evviva il maestro!

On the 27th the two airs of the prima donna were repeated, and it being Thursday, and consequently advancing towards Friday, it was necessary to finish quickly, otherwise the duo would have been repeated also, for they were already beginning to make a noise. But the majority of the public wanted to return home, in order to have something to eat again, and the opera, with its three ballets, had lasted six good hours. To-day we give the third recita.

As Hase is called il Sassone, and Galappi Busanello, our child is called il cavaliere flarmonico.

The Same to Father Martini, at Bologna.

Milan, January 3, 1771.

At the same time, Very Reverend Father, that I write to wish you a happy new year, I have to inform you that my son's opera has met with a very good reception, in spite of the cabals of our enemies and those who envied us. Before they had seen one note of the work, they spread it about that it was impossible such barbarous music, without method and without depth, could be executed by the orchestra; and to such effect had they bestirred themselves, that they had persuaded half Milan that instead of an opera they were about to hear merely a poor compilation. They had even taken to the principal cantatrice several airs and a duo, composed by the Abbé Gasparini of Turin, and wished to persuade her to introduce them into the opera, and to accept nothing from so young a man as my son, and one so incapable of writing a good aria. But the prima donna declared herself satisfied, and more than satisfied. Notwithstanding this, the calumniators of my son ceased not to cherish the most injurious prejudices against his work. The first rehearsal with instruments, however, so completely closed the mouths of these pitiless babblers, that not a word was heard more. All the professors declared to the orchestra that the music was clear, intelligible, and easily played, as the singers had previously pronounced. The first opera of the season at Milan has generally the ill luck not to attract many people; they always wait for the second before they come to the theatre. Up till now, however, and for the last six representations, the theatre has been always full; each night two pieces have been redemanded, and all the others vigorously applauded.

We hope, dearest Father, to receive favorable news concerning your health. I do not yet despair of receiving the Miserere which you promised, as well as the music for sixteen parts. M. Joseph Prinsechi will not fail to settle what is required for the copy, and I shall take care, as soon as I am returned home, that is to say, about Easter, to send you whatever may prove agreeable. My son kisses your hands, and I am with respect and esteem,

Your devoted servant, LEOPOLD MOZART.

Artemus Ward hears Patti.

The Sage of Baldwinville favors as with the following critical notice of Patti's concert last evening:—

"The music which I am most use to is the inspirin strains of the hand organ. I hire a artistic Italy unto grind fur me, paying him his vittles and close, and spose it was those strains which fast put a musical taste into me. Like all ferriners he has seen better dase, havin formerly his a kount. But he aint of much akount now, except to turn the organ and drink Beer, of which bevridge he can hold a churnfull easy.

Miss Patti is small fur her size, but as the man sed about his wife, O Lord! She is well bilt & her complexion is what mite be called a Broonetty. Her iz is dark bay, the lashis being long and silky. When she smiles the awjince feels like axing her to doo it sum moor, & to continner doing it 2 a indefinixtent. Her waste is 1 of the most bootiful waistis ever seen. When Mister Strackhorse lod her out I thawt sum pretty skool gal, who had jest graduated from pantalets and wire hoops, was a coming out to read her fast compersishum in public. She cam se bashful like, with her hed bowd down, & made sich a effort to arrange her lips so thayl look pretty, that I wanted to swaller her. She remindid me of Susan Skinner, who'd never kiss the boys at parin bees till the candles was blow'd out. Miss Patti sung amhin or rather in a furrin tung. I dont know what the sentiments was. Fur awt I know she may have bin denouncin my wax figgers & sagashus wild beests of Pray, & I dont much keer ef she did. When she opened her mowth a army of martingales, bobolinks, kanarys, mockin birds, etsettery, bust 4th & flew all over the Haul.

Go it, little I, sez I to myself, in a hilly exsited frame of mind, & ef the kount or royal duke which you'll be pretty apt to marry 1 of these dase don't do the fair thing by ye, ya kin always hav a home on A. Ward's farm, near Baldwinville, Injanny. When she sang Cummin threw the Rye, & spoke of that Swayne she deerly luvd herself individoally, I didn't wish I was that Swayne. No I guess not. O certainly not. [This is Ironical. I don't mean this. It's a way I have of goekin.] Now that Maria Pickelhominy has got married [which I hope she likes it] & left the perfehun, Adeline Patti is the championess of the opera ring. She karries the Belt.

Thar's no draw sht about it. Other primmy donny's may as well throw up the sponge first as last. My eyes don't deceive my earsight in this manner.

But Miss Patty orter sing in the English tung. As she kin do so as well as she can in Italyun, why under the Son don't she do it? What cents is thar in singing wurd's nobody don't understan when words we do understan is jest as handy? Why peple will versifferusly applawd furrin langwidge is a mystery. It reminds me of a man I once knew. He sed he knokt the bottom out of his pork Barril, & the pork fell out, but the Brine dident moove a itch. It staid in the Barril. He sed this was a Mystery, but it wasn't misterior than is this thing ime speekin of.

As fur Brignoly, Ferri and Junky, they air dowtless grate, but I think such able boddied men wood look better tillin the sile than dressin themselves up in black close & white kid gloves & showtin in a furrin tung. Mister Junky is a noble lookin old man & orter lead armics on to Battle instid of showtin in a furrin tung.

Adoo. In the langwidge of Lewis Napoleon when receiving kumpany at his pallis on the Bullyyards, "I saloot yu."

June.

Skies of deepest azure,
Dance in mountain streams,
Glittering in the brightness
Of the noontide beams,
Scent of apple blossoms
Filling all the air,
Cowslips in the meadow,
Violets everywhere.
Floods of golden sunshine,
Trailing robes of green,
Gayer than the garments
Of the proudest queen;
Seas of crimson clover,
Choirs of singing birds,
And the blessed charm of Happy children's words.
Soft melodious whisperings
In the tasseled trees,
Joy of tell-tale breezes,
Hum of honey bees;
Unrestrained resplendence,
Universal cheer,
Beauty all unbounded
Tell us June is here:
June, of bloom the fairest:
June, of song the rarest
Of the changeful year.

Musical Pitch.

(From the London Athenaeum, June 2.)

The Committee appointed a year ago by the Society of Arts will make the following report to a meeting of the Society of Arts on Tuesday next.

The General Meeting of musicians, amateurs, and others interested in Music, called together by the Society of Arts to consider the present state of Musical Pitch in England, found, after a little inquiry, that their attention would have to be directed to three principal points:—1. Whether a uniform musical pitch was desirable. 2. Whether a uniform musical pitch was possible. 3. Supposing a uniform pitch to be desirable and possible, what that pitch should be.

1. With the first of these considerations the General Meeting was not long occupied, all testimony going to prove the frequent inconvenience to which musical performers, vocal and instrumental, musical instrument makers, musical directors, and even instructed hearers, were alike put by variations in the pitch, whether of individual instruments or of entire orchestras. The Meeting came early to a unanimous resolution that a uniform pitch was desirable.

2. The second question, "Whether a uniform pitch was possible?" was not found to admit of so ready an answer as the first. That a uniform pitch is never for any length of time maintained is well known to all practical musicians. The effects of temperature on musical instruments are so great and so rapid, that a difference in pitch of at least a quarter of a tone has often been remarked between the beginning and the end of the same concert; and instruments not required at the beginning of a performance are frequently tuned to a higher pitch, in order to meet this anticipated elevation. In theatres, instruments to be used on the stage are systematically tuned sharper than those to be used in the orchestra, to compensate for the difference of temperature before and behind the scenes. Still, though the maintenance of a certain pitch may be difficult, or even impossible, the definition of it is not. A point of departure, if nothing more, would be in the highest degree convenient to musicians. No great practical inconvenience has ever been found to result from any change of pitch possible during a single performance. It is against the gradual elevation, consequent on the absence of any recognized standard, that musical practice requires a security. Physical science is, happily, enabled to afford this, and to bring to the aid of musical art more than one process by which such a standard may be adjusted. Musical pitch is not a matter of mere comparison. A sound is not merely acute or grave, in relation to another; its pitch is capable of exact measurement, and that measurement once recorded, it may be reproduced at any distance of time, without reference to any other sound whatever. In short, the number of vibrations per second due to a given sound can be ascertained with the same certainty as the number of square yards on a given estate, or the number of tons burthen of a given merchantman. Several methods of counting vibrations have been adopted by men of science at different periods, by one or other of which the pitch of certain notes (generally either C or A) in this or that musical establishment has been recorded; so that a body of evidence exists, in addition to, and independent of, that of tuning-forks, bells, and other instruments least susceptible of change, by which the variations of pitch, at different times and in many different places, may be ascertained with certainty. Under these circumstances the Meeting came to a resolution, that a uniform pitch was not only desirable but possible. It remained for them to consider "what that pitch should be."

3. On this question such very wide difference of opinion was expressed, and, indeed, such very conflicting evidence was adduced, that the Meeting, as a prelude to further operations, thought it advisable to devolve on a Committee the task of ascertaining the grounds of these opinions, and of investigating this evidence.

Several meetings of the Committee have been held, in the course of which much valuable information has been collected, and many valuable opinions have been weighed. The Committee are now in a condition to report.

Their inquiries and considerations have been brought to bear on the following points:—1. The pitch, or varieties of pitch, obtaining at foregoing periods of musical history. 2. The pitch, or varieties of pitch, obtaining in the most eminent and important English orchestras at this time. 3. Pitch, in its relations (1st) to voices, (2nd) to artificial instruments. 4. The difficulties likely to impede a change of the existing pitch, were any change thought desirable. 5. What pitch it is advisable to recommend for general adoption.

1. With regard to the pitch in the early days of modern music, the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, some uncertainty prevails; indeed, not only would it seem to have been liable to all those temporary and slight variations inevitable perhaps at any time, but the evidence of musical composition would suggest the simultaneous existence of more than one pitch, and that of these the "church pitch" was, contrary to more recent experience, the highest. Of the pitch, or rather of a pitch common in orchestras, in the first half of the last century, evidence is somewhat more reliable. Several tuning-forks, of the authenticity of which there is no reason to doubt, exist, and many musical instruments have been preserved which would go to prove that the opera pitch in England at the time of Handel (1720—59), was about a tone lower than that at present in vogue. No scientific record of this fact has come before the Committee, but the presumptive evidence in its favor is strong. On the state of the pitch during the first half of the present century, a body of evidence exists which is absolutely irrefragable. Whether during the second half of the last century the pitch rose gradually, or whether a sudden deviation took place on the introduction to this country of the first great works of the modern symphonic school (c. 1790), is uncertain, and perhaps unimportant. But it has been ascertained, that from the year 1813 to the year 1841 or 1842, a tuning-fork, of which numerous duplicates have been preserved, was authorized by the directors of the Philharmonic Society, the pitch of which is about a semitone higher than that of the tuning-fork said to be Handel's, and about a semitone lower than the pitch now obtaining in that same Philharmonic Society. This Philharmonic fork of 1813—42, gives 433 vibrations per second for the note A, equal to 518 2-5 for the note C.

2. Various observations (made principally during the last season at the Italian Opera, at the Philharmonic, and other orchestral Concerts) have established the fact that, at the present time the pitch has reached an average of 455 vibrations per second for A, equal to 546 for C. So that the C and A of 1859 are identical with the D flat and B flat of 1840. the pitch having risen in less than twenty years, a semitone. This extraordinary result has been brought about by a variety of causes. The advent of certain foreign vocalists, gifted with voices of exceptionally high register, may have been one; an opinion entertained by many instrumental performers, that increased "brilliancy" of timbre is attained by increased elevation of pitch, may have been another; but, perhaps the present high pitch is due less to these and like causes than to the simple fact that it is always possible to raise, and often impossible to lower, the pitch of an instrument, and, therefore, that if one important instrument (e. g. oboe or clarinet) in an orchestra is found to be higher than all the other instruments, accordance is rarely obtained by lowering it, but almost always by raising them. With an exciting cause like this always in operation, and no authoritative standard to which reference could from time to time be made, the wonder is that the pitch has not risen more, rather than that it has risen so much. Nor is it unreasonable to anticipate still further elevation, unless some such standard can be agreed upon by reference to which this upward tendency might be kept in check.

3. Before entering on the consideration of "pitch in its relation to voices and artificial instruments," the sub-committee thought it advisable to try and agree upon some principle by which they might be governed in their choice of a particular pitch, supposing any discrepancy in the interests of vocal and instrumental music to appear. Nothing is more certain than that while artificial instruments admit of, and receive, continual modification and improvement, the powers of the human voice have now been thoroughly ascertained. There is not the slightest evidence to justify the belief that the average soprano of our own time differs, or that the average tenor of the twentieth century will differ from the average soprano or tenor of the eighteenth century. While, therefore, among other qualities, the pitch of artificial instruments admits of alteration to almost any extent, for the simple reason that the instruments themselves admit of alteration to almost any extent, the pitch of the voice, like the voice itself, admits of no alteration, but at the will and by the hands of Him who made it. If voices and instruments are to remain—as to the delight of all human kind they have remained so long—alike, their pitch must be identical; and if any pitch is possible to instruments, and only one pitch possible to, or rather fit for, voices, the pitch of instruments must be that of voices. At one of their first meetings the Committee passed unanimously the following resolution:—"That, as the basis of any recommendation of a definite pitch, the capabilities and convenience of the human voice in singing the compositions of the great vocal writers should be the first consideration." Some impediments stand in the way of ascertaining directly the effects of the present high pitch on the quality and probable duration of the voice. A remonstrance in respect of it on the part of a singer might be too readily interpreted into a confession of weakness; and a premature decay of physical power might be imputed to an artist who remonstrated against the gratuitous exertion which an extravagantly high pitch obliges him to undergo. Such evidence, however, as the Committee has been able to collect directly is, without exception, to the effect that the present pitch taxes unfairly, if it does not seriously impair the powers of the most gifted and skilful artists; while the evidence of several directors of choral societies goes to prove that, not only is the quality of sound produced by large bodies of voice seriously depreciated by the present high pitch, but that false intonation is an increasingly frequent result of it. Certain it is that entire movements are now frequently transposed, because it is found impossible, by artists whose powers are acknowledged to be in their zenith, to execute them as they were written, at the present pitch; and choral practices are not unfrequently made in keys lower than those in which the music so practised will have to be performed. The depreciation in effect and inconvenience caused by transposition in these cases require no comment. The inquiries of the Committee as to the effect of the present high pitch on musical instruments have had reference to organs, pianofortes, the stringed instruments, which form the basis of the orchestra, and the wind instruments of wood and of brass. No strong opinion appears to prevail among organ-builders, or piano-forte-makers, in respect to the advantages of any particular pitch. They are, without exception, desirous that some uniform pitch should be established, but it has not been asserted that an organ or a pianoforte gains or loses by a higher or lower pitch.

With respect to stringed instruments, the Committee have ascertained that there is a decided feeling, especially among violinists, in favor of a high pitch, as contributing to increased "brilliance" in the timbre of their instruments. This feeling, expressed as it has been by artists of great experience and acknowledged skill and taste, is entitled to much respect and grave consideration. On the other hand, however, it is contended that elevation of the pitch of a violin or cognate instrument, is necessarily attained either by the use of thinner strings, or by tension so increased as to necessitate, sooner or later, the strengthening of the instrument, by processes which of necessity decrease its volume and, as it would seem, its power and richness in like proportion. The Committee have not found many advocates for high pitch among performers on, or makers of, wind instruments. To some of the former a lower pitch than the present would be acceptable. The higher notes of the trumpet and the horn have become, as the pitch has risen, more and more difficult of access; the rise, however, seems to have been easily met by the other wind instruments, whether of wood or brass. It has not been contended that any advantage in the power or quality of wind instruments results from high pitch; on the contrary, a strong opinion has been expressed by an eminent manufacturer that wind instruments would be greatly improved in these respects were their pitch lowered a semitone.

4. On the practical difficulties attending any change of pitch, the Committee find opinion unanimous. The violins, violas, violoncellos, and double-basses, now in use in orchestras, though many of them old instruments, have gradually been habituated, so to speak, to the present pitch, and would, it is said, suffer greatly from, and require alteration to meet, any considerable change. The wooden wind instruments (flutes, oboes, clarionets, and bassoons) are mostly new, and have in every case replaced others of which the ventages were adjusted with a view to a lower pitch. Similar inconvenience would occur in respect to the keyed brass instruments; but the other brass instruments would find a change easy.

5. What pitch is it advisable to recommend for general adoption? It has been customary, in treating of acoustical science, to assume, as the simplest possible point of departure, the existence of a note corresponding to one vibration per second; the various octaves of which will be represented by 2, 4, 8, 16, 32, 64, &c., vibrations, being a series of powers of the number two. This theoretical note is found to agree so nearly with the musician's idea of the note C (the simplest fundamental note in a practical point of view), that writers on acoustics, it is believed without exception, have agreed to consider them as identical, and have thus established what may be called a theoretical pitch, or definition of the note C. Thus, the C produced by a 32 ft. organ-pipe is assumed to be the result of 16 double vibrations (or 32 single ones) per second. The octave above, or the lowest C of a grand piano-forte, of 32 double vibrations; the lowest C of a violoncello, of 64; tenor C, of 128; middle C of the piano-forte, of 256; and the C on the treble staff, of 512 double vibrations per second.

The divisions of a musical string, necessary to produce a major scale, are as follows:—

C	D	E	F	G	A	B	C
1,	8-9,	4-5,	$\frac{3}{2}$ ,	2-3,	3-5,	8-15,	$\frac{1}{2}$ .

The number of vibrations due to each sound (being in inverse ratio to the divisions of the string) at the pitch alluded to, will therefore be as follows:

256,	288,	320,	341 $\frac{1}{2}$ ,	384,	426 $\frac{2}{3}$ ,	480,	512.

In the year 1842, at the suggestion of a member of the Committee, a tuning-fork regulated to the above pitch by means of an instrument called the sirène, was made and published. Duplicates of this tuning fork have been circulated to a very large extent; it has served, for years past, as the standard for many choral societies, and been adopted by pianoforte-tuners for instruments not intended for public performance; several large and important organs also have been adjusted to it. It is certain, however, that the simplicity of the figures which by the octaves to C, and the scale, are represented at this pitch, would be a very insufficient recommendation of the pitch itself to musicians, were its adoption found to be practically injurious to musical effect. That this has not been found to be the case two very remarkable facts will serve to show.

1st. The Commission recently appointed to report on the pitch in France, who appear to have been governed by considerations of a purely practical kind (their report ignoring mathematical convenience entirely), have decided on a pitch, certainly not identical with the pitch of 512 vibrations, but differing from it only to the extent of ten vibrations per second. The following are the numbers of vibrations of each note of the scale of C, according to the French normal diapason:—

261	298	326 $\frac{1}{2}$	348	391 $\frac{1}{2}$	435	489	522.

It is needless to say that the difference between this (French) pitch and that of C 512 is practically not greater than that frequently produced on the same instrument by a few minutes' change of temperature.

2nd. On testing the A tuning-forks, said, on irrefragable evidence, to represent the Philharmonic pitch of 1813—42, they are found to be the result of 433 vibrations per second=C at 518 2-5; still nearer than the French to the pitch of C 512. This result again is strongly in favor of the latter pitch; seeing that, like the French, the Philharmonic pitch was avowedly decided upon without reference to any mathematic or scientific test whatever. A few eminent practical musicians consulted together, and came to agreement among themselves that a certain pitch was a convenient mean, neither too high for voices nor too low for instruments, and for thirty years their decision was never impugned. The authority, therefore, of practice as of theory—of art as of science—belongs alike to the pitch of C 512; seeing that a pitch closely approximate has been adopted at different periods by many different persons having no concert or communication with one another, and having been led to its adoption by very unlike processes and objects. On grounds of abstract propriety, therefore, the sub-committee would willingly have recommended the pitch of C 512 for general adoption. They are, however, withheld from doing so by certain practical considerations, which it is impossible for them to ignore. Those, to which some allusion has been made already, it now becomes necessary to enter upon more fully.

MUSIC IN THIS NUMBER.—BENNETT'S Cantata: The May Queen, resumed and continued.

The Philharmonic Society Again.

Through the kindness of one of the officers of the new Society, we have seen its Constitution. It is but justice to say that in some essential features it was not truly represented in the report in another paper, from which we derived the impressions under which we wrote a fortnight since. In the first place, it states a single object in the formation of the Society, namely, "to advance the cause of music in Boston," and does not add: "and to benefit pecuniarily its members." In the next place, it does not contain a word about the character of the programmes of the concerts, or about "granting the public the entertainment for which they are pleased to pay their money." It was the immediate following of this statement upon the "twelve dollar" article, which reflected such a money-making light upon the whole plan, and led us to fear that the Society might come to cater to the public taste instead of leading it, with an eye more to what is marketable than to what is Philharmonic.

We are very glad to learn that we were misled by the abstract referred to, and only regret that we did not sooner see the real document, in which the spirit, plan and methods of the Society are embodied. We have already explained, that the rule requiring at least twelve dollars compensation to each performing member for each concert, was designed as a check upon the government, to prevent their running the Society into debt by giving concerts rashly.

We are sorry to learn that our remarks have caused unpleasant feelings among some of the musicians. The precise nature of the complaints we hardly know, since they have not taken open form; they only come to us as on dits, vaguely. But we wish it to be distinctly understood, in the first place, that we have not objected to the musicians' forming and managing a Society in their own way, and for their own purposes. We have not denied their perfect right to do so.

Secondly, we took it for granted, in all our comments, that no one would or could suppose that we did not sympathize with our musicians in every attempt to give us good music, whether they succeed or not in striking out the best plan of organization. We should pay a poor compliment to their intelligence and their disinterested love of Art, if we refrained from honest criticism of their plan through fear they would not take it kindly. The question of a Philharmonic Society, or a permanent organization for the supply of classical orchestral music, is one which concerns us all, musicians, amateurs, and music-lovers alike. We are all interested to secure the best plan, to have as little time and means and faith as possible wasted upon ineffective efforts. We assumed that the musicians shared this general desire; and that the question whether a Society should be organized by others employing them, or by others with them, or by themselves alone, was a matter of comparative indifference to them, so that the true ends of a Philharmonic were only secured. Indeed we had always understood that the musicians generally preferred that others, music-lovers generally, or some committee of that class, should undertake the organization, management and risk of concerts, instead of themselves.

But as it is, the musicians themselves have taken the initiative. They have organized a Society composed and managed exclusively by professional musicians, actual performers in the orchestra. We doubt whether this is the thing most wanted; we doubt whether such a society will be the most likely to succeed in securing constant public support for the best kind of music. We think a society of another kind is still needed. But it need not be one to at all interfere with this, nor have we any objection at all to this in itself considered. If we cannot have the Society which seems to us the most desirable, then we shall try to be thankful for what we do have; and whatever sympathy and support it is in our power to give, we shall most cheerfully give to this new effort of our musicians. We trust they will be liberally encouraged; and we urge it as a duty upon all who hunger and thirst after great symphonies and overtures to subscribe to their concerts, give them full houses, and place them in a position that shall enable them to do their best, both in the selection of programmes and in the interpretation of the masters from whose works they select. We are sure that a good support to concerts on the part of the true music-lovers, will prove the sort of sunshine that will ripen any plan into usefulness. And for the performers themselves, how can it possibly be doubted that we, that all true friends of music, earnestly wish that they may reap rich recompense for their artistic labors?

At the same time we must, in all honesty and kind feeling, say, that we do not think the real Philharmonic problem is yet solved; and we shall take another occasion to point out the way in which we think it might be done—and that without injury to, perhaps to the advantage of the orchestral society already formed by the musicians.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The rain, which fell in torrents all day Wednesday, and all night, was unpropitious for the opening at the Academy by the CORTESI troupe. But a goodly number were assembled, and it was a positive triumph for Madame FABBRI, the new prima donna. The opera was Nabuco, or "Nebuchadnezzar," of whose history we remembered little, save that he "went to grass," which being interpreted into the Verdi dialect of music appeared to mean "went to brass;" for a brassier and a noisier opera we have not heard, since the days when the brave and burly Beneventano went to grass in it here some ten or twelve years ago. Still, noisy as it is, we must confess that we found many portions of this opera of Verdi's quite grand and imposing. The opening chorus (prayer) is decidedly so; and so is the solo which follows it, of the Hebrew high priest, in which, as in the whole part, Sig. SUSINI exerted his superb voice to the very best advantage, and with no end of applause. The Quintet with chorus, at the end of the first act, is one of the finest of all Verdi's ensemble pieces. There is more freshness and vigor in Nabuco than in his later works, although it contains plenty of his peculiar common-places, unison choruses, &c., in the same style with Ernani, and sometimes almost identical in phrase and motive. The great fault is that the fortissimo is kept up almost continually; you are allowed no rest, no alternation; your musical sense is hammered upon until you are well nigh stunned. And yet for purely brass music it is some of the best; and accordingly it has served the purposes of the street bands largely.

FABBRI, as she first appeared as Abigail, in armor, sword in hand, with indignant lip curled and eyes flashing, was a form clad in terrible beauty. Her face is full of soul and quick expression, and there is a fine glow, a charm of inspiration in her movements. She is one of the very best dramatic actors and dramatic singers that has ever appeared on our stage. Her voice is magnificent in power, with a thrilling vitality in every note, even to the brilliant highest ones, which, loud and penetrating as they are, and full of concentrated passion, are yet always musical and satisfactory to the ear; she flings of a flashing highest note sometimes with the same birdlike audacity and spontaneity as Jenny Lind. As to mere vocalization, she is not perhaps one of the most finished singers; but she has a great deal of execution; and expression, inspiration, something like genius make up for the rest. She makes a living, true and thoroughly lyric whole of her part from first to last. Trilling too long now and then was the only violation of good taste that we noticed. In the expressions of various emotion, in the soliloquy of Abigail when she discovers herself to be a slave, in her haughty triumph afterwards, in her despairing revenge melting to forgiveness finally, she showed lyric qualities of a most rare order. It must be that she will make a great mark here, and will draw crowds as she goes on.

Sig. BARILI as Nabuco sang and acted with expression, and Mme. GAROFOLI made a pleasing impression in the part of Fenena. After what we had heard of hasty and imperfect rehearsal, we were agreeably disappointed in the effective working together of orchestra and chorus. Herr MULDER (the husband of Fabbri) has certainly proved himself a very capable conductor.

ROSA BONHEUR'S HORSE FAIR.—We trust no lover of Art or of horses, of live life and nature, will fail to go and see this truly great painting, which is on exhibition for a short time at the rooms of Messrs. Williams & Everett. The engraving, which we see about, fine as it is, does not begin to give an adequate conception of the power, the truth, the beauty, the thorough individuality and genius of this picture. It is one of the rare opportunities of a life time.

Musical Correspondence.

ST. LOUIS, JUNE 18. — In contrast to the musical dearth which has reigned here during the entire winter, we now bid fair to become surfeited. I mean we folks who don't care much for music, who attend to be fashionable, but who have to make an investment of a dollar and carry a family of daughters each and every time. And this class of people compose about four-fifths of our regular concert goers.

The first excitement was the repetition of the Trinity church concert, which although not so great a pecuniary success as the first one, was all that its most sanguine friends expected. The same performers mainly, who assisted at the first performance: Mr. E. C. CATHERWOOD, much to the surprise of his friends and supporters, who had from some peculiar reasons come to consider him rather indolent, if not positively lazy, learned a new song for the occasion, and gave us "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," by Knight, in a very satisfactory manner, transposing it only an octave lower, giving us B flat for the "deep," which is pretty well down. Mr. JOSEPH ANDERSON — son of our well-known banker — played a fantasia on the violin, from De Beriot, exquisitely, quite astonishing the audience as well as his friends. A Duet for flute and piano, by CARR and BALMER, was the gem of the evening. Mr. Balmer really outdid himself. He is one of the most remarkable readers at sight I ever knew, racing over Beethoven's Sonatas, Chopin's Studies, or Mason's difficulties, all the same, literally "stopping at nothing."

A new Organ was exhibited a short time since, built by Erben, of New York, for St. George's church. Mr. GOODSON, one of our most accomplished organists, displayed its best points in a programme so strictly classical that I am sure you would be pleased to even see it; but we confess to a partiality to the organ put up by Hook, of Boston, in Dr. Post's church, a little before. It is sweeter and fuller; the reeds are purer; and it is better voiced throughout.

A concert was given on Tuesday evening by the various artists of the city, as a complimentary benefit to Mr. S. M. BROWN, who leaves this week for several years' residence in Europe, for more study in his art. Mr. Brown studied for several years in New York, under Curtis, Gottschalk and Mason. Poor health, however, compelled him to abandon his favorite project of visiting Europe, and he came here. Recovering to a great extent his former vigor, wasted by incessant practice, he now starts, intending to remain until his bank breaks. He was assisted by Mrs. CUTLER, our finest resident vocalist, Messrs. CARR and TOMLINSON on the flute; several of his pupils: Mr. BALMER, Mr. HEWITT, Mr. CATHERWOOD, Mr. SCONCIA, &c. Miss IRVIN, a pupil of Mr. Brown, played Jaell's Norma very finely. She in by all odds the finest amateur lady player in this city, although only about sixteen. In scales, trills and light appoggiatura passages she excels, having an exquisite touch and fair appreciation. When years and practice shall give her more confidence and firmness, we predict for her a fine position.

Dresel's arrangement of Von Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz" was rendered magnificently by Miss Mary SPARR, Miss IRVIN, Messrs. HEWITT and BROWN. Miss Louise Sparr displayed a delicate manipulation and fine execution in a difficult duet for two pianos, from Traviata, with Mr. Brown. Mr. Brown played (to please the people we judge from his selections) the "Last Hope," of Gottschalk; the "Rustic Dance," a perfect gem; and Walse de Bra-cour, by Mason. Mr. Balmer accompanied the songs and flute with his usual fine taste.

ADELINA PATTI has been making a great stir by two concerts given last week. Both were crowded full of delighted listeners. But we confess to great disappointment in the divine Patti. Her voice is decidedly thin and unsympathetic, and though quite clear in her high notes, very husky at times when singing within the reach of ordinary performers. From the innumerable excellences given to her by her sagacious brother in the tallest kind of judicious advertising in New York, I expected to hear the combined virtues and accomplishments of Sontag, La Grange, Jenny Lind, yea, even Alboni; but to our disappointment, we must say that she has neither the faultless finish of the first, the execution of the second, the purity and immense compass of the third, nor half the power of a dozen others. Still she is a great singer, great indeed, but not exactly what we anticipated. Whether Strakosch slighted several of our papers here, or whether they speak from a firm conviction of the truth, I know not, but they are sharp upon her this morning. A Quartet from Martha, by JUNCA, BRIGNOLI, Madame STRAKOSCH and PATTI, was superb; really the finest rendering of that or any other quartet I ever heard. Patti's voice is particularly fine in this position, and we can readily believe that in opera she would be "immense," as from its peculiar quality it can be heard clearly above all others. I modestly inquired of "Maurice" if she were going to Europe to study. You should have seen the astonishment depicted on his intelligent countenance. She go to study! to study! why, my dear (dear is an adjective used only to writers for the press) fellow, she is going there to teach them. Well! we thought so the moment we heard her. When increasing years and practice shall give her organ more fullness, and make her execution more perfect; when she comes to conclude that singing a piece faster than any one else ever sang it, is not necessarily singing it better, we predict for her a position second to no living singer.

But the length of the article precludes further remarks. We presume that you disagree with us in our opinions; but my opinion is that of most of our critics. PRESTO.

They are agitating the project in London of an Organ with a sixty-four feet sub-bass, for St. Paul's Cathedral:—as if a thirty-two feet pipe were not deep enough for the basest human understanding! ... In the programme of one of the "Monday Popular Concerts," in London, appear the names of the following Italian composers of an older school than is now generally cultivated: Boccherini, Paisiello, Jomelli, Clementi, Salvatore Rosa, Paer, Cherubini, Piccini, Salieri, Blangini, and, lastly, Rossini, who appears in the form of a quartet for stringed instruments, and who under any form is fast becoming an ancient in these Verdi days.

CHICKERING'S PIANOS.—Since the commencement of the manufacture of these instruments by the late Jonas Chickering, in 1828, over twenty-three thousand have been made, and they are now known and celebrated all over the world. The great prize medal of the World's Fair, London, and thirty-eight other prize medals taken at other exhibitions where they were competitors, attest the excellence of these Boston instruments.

Music Abroad.

Germany.

LEIPZIG.—The operas given in the month of April were: Wagner's Lohengrin, twice; Mozart's Schauspiel-director; Dies Haus ist zu verkaufen, by Pentenrieder; Meyerbeer's Dinorah, five times; Huguenots; Die Verlobung bei der Laterne, by Offenbach; and Don Juan. Madame Bürde-Ney completed her engagement on the 1st of May in the part of "Fidelio."

At the musical evening entertainment at the Conservatoire, April 27, the following pieces were performed: Sonata, for piano and violin, by Beethoven, op. 12, in E flat; Quintet, for piano, violins, &c., by Schumann, op. 44, E flat; fifth piano-forte concerto by Moscheles, op. 87, C major, first movement.

At the Thomas Church, April 28, the boys sang: Mendelssohn's Motet; "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace;" "Glory and praise to thee belong," by Haydn; and on the 29th, a Mass by Hummel, and a Hymn by Mozart.

BASLE.—The twenty-ninth Swiss musical festival was held here from the 6th to the 9th of May. Handel's "Jephtha" was performed in the Minster; also a festival overture by A. Walter; a concert aria by Mozart; a church aria by Stradella; the violin concerto by Beethoven; the first act of Gluck's Alceste, and the ninth symphony of Beethoven.

PRAGUE.—In the concerts of the Conservatoire this year there have been performed: Symphonies: No. 6, by Beethoven, "Ocean" by Rubinstein, and Spohr's in C minor; Overtures: Spohr's, to second part of the "Last Judgement," one by Ambros ("The wonder-working Magus") and three by pupils, one of which by Carl Scheber gives promise. F. David and Bülow have appeared in the concerts.

London.

[From the Athenæum, June 2.]

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Two novelties in the Covent Garden cast of "La Gazza Ladra"—Madame Penco as Ninetta, and M. Faure as Fernando—are worth dwelling on. The lady illustrates the school of Italian vocal decadence. Her voice too often vibrates; her execution is too often unreal; and hence, if she be compared with any singer trained on the grand old method, twice as long on the stage as herself, the impression often produced by her must be one of a singer with impaired powers. It is discouraging to observe how the majority of Southern artists coming forward are unfit to take the places of a Pasta, a Pizaroni, a Rubini, a Lablache. Light soprano are always attainable, and will be, possibly, so long as M. Duprez keeps a class open. But Norma, Semiramide, Medea, where are they? Incompetence stripes the best Italian music of half its luxuriant beauty, on the pretext of the same being "vocalico." Madame Penco, however, sang more satisfactorily in "La Gazza Ladra" than she has sung in most of her former operas. Insufficient in "Di piacer," acting weakly in the interview betwixt the Podesta and her father, the Deserter—she rallied in the latter trial scene, and gave its concerted music with firmness and agility. Her shortcomings have nothing to do with distinction of presence, with natural powers of voice. In both attributes Madame Penco surpasses Madame Persiani. It is command of art that establishes the difference among artists, a truth to be maintained in face of the known Italian adage, defining that the ninety-nine requisites of a singer are voice, and nothing but voice. Madame Penco's new companion in the cast—M. Faure—is to be appraised by a different standard. He has full use of his voice, according to the conditions and practices of French vocal cultivation; but his voice, we fancy, may become fuller in the course of practising music of the broader Italian school. He is a capital dramatic artist. Nothing has been seen better than his bearing and byplay in the scene at the table, already referred to, where the Deserter, his daughter and her evil genius, are grouped; nothing better than in the trial scene. Signor Tamburini sang the music of the part with richer organ and rounder vocalization; but the dramatic reality of M. Faure almost establishes a balance to Signor Tamburini's qualities as singer. No man in our experience has been less hampered by a strange stage, and by unfamiliar music, than this new comer. Madame Nantier-Didié was excellent; the best Pippa in our recollection, the orchestra superb, delivering the overture to perfection. But what music, as compared with the operas of Bellini or of Signor Verdi! It must have been a pleasure to conduct, or to play, or to sing in "La Gazza"; it was a pleasure to hear it, small (if not slow) though the story be, though no spectator of the troubles of Ninetta may possibly be (as Byron put it) "innocent of stealing a silver spoon," and may be thus unable to accredit the truth of the acting by experience.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.—Among benefit concerts, Herr Molique's is not to be passed without a word of regret, on grounds totally opposed to any such as might be created by impression of disappointment or incompetency on the part of the concert-giver, referring rather to his modesty in being so chary of himself as a composer on this occasion. Not that his programme was wanting in novelty. To the majority of his audience one of the composers whose music he introduced was a total stranger—M. Leon de St. Lubin. To ourselves this writer has been long known as a composer of some chamber music superior in quality. His Pianoforte Trio in G minor may be specified as a vigorous and original work. Herr Molique was assisted by his very clever daughter, Mlle. Anna. A certain hardness of hand is the only thing which stands between her and first honors as a pianist. Few women surpass her in execution. The singers who took part in the concert were Madame Hayes, M. Depret, and Mr. Santley. Benefit Concerts have likewise been given by Miss Emma Busby, Herr Oberthür, Herr Ladd, Mr. Allan Irving, and that intelligent contralto, Miss Palmer. The amateur who could fancy that the above liberal catalogue did in the slightest degree represent the concert music of the week (twixt Epsom and Ascot) in London, would "reckon without his host—" with no common inadvertence.

As falling in with a suggestion long since offered, the Italian Concerts at the St. James's Hall are entertainments of more than ordinary interest to us. That on Monday included instrumental specimens by Scarlatti, Boccherini, Clementi, Cherubini, and vocal music by Salvatore Rosa (of course the canzonet "Vado ben spesso"), Jomelli, Paisiello, Piccini, Salieri, Paer, and Blangini. The singers were Mr. Tennant and Mr. Santley, Mlle. Parepa and Madame Laura Baxter. The ladies were entered in a duet by Paer; the first-named one, by her firm and fluent execution of the old variations on "La Biondina," took us back to the days of Catalini, for whom the show-piece (type of so many that have since come) was arranged by the Parmesan composer. Though Signor Rossini extinguished Paer (as many an audacious borrower has done from the days of Handel downwards), the earlier maestro had great merit, and much of his music is worth disinterring.

On Wednesday Mr. Gye's first Opera Concert took place in the Floral Hall, Covent Garden. On this entertainment, which, like similar ones given at the Crystal Palace, was made up of familiar operatic music, there is no need to descant in detail. The sonority of the new glass room is excellent; to ventilate it may prove the difficulty. Mr. C. Halle's first Pianoforte Rehearsal had a skillfully varied programme; among other matters, including a noble Sonata by Clementi, in D major, the third of the set dedicated to Miss Blake. Parts of the opening adagio and allegro are almost symphonic in their grandeur and brilliancy. The adagio introducing the final allegro is expressive, delicate, and new to a wish, and the allegro aforesaid sparkles with vivacity; the canonical episode and the close are especially to be recommended for their force, science, and originality. A nobler Sonata, save by Beethoven, is not in existence. Yesterday, in the morning, was held the second Opera Concert, at Sydenham, this year dependent on Her Majesty's Theatre, in the evening, the first of a new series of Quartet Concerts, headed by Mr. Blagrove; and by the Sacred Harmonic Society, "Elijah," with Mr. Santley as the principal basso, and for soprano Mlle. Parepa.

Paris.

There seems to be no end of the quarrel betwixt M. Emile Chev , who teaches sight-singing, by the use of figures and numerals, and less new-fangled professors, who cannot conceive instruction in Art is simplified by pupils having to learn two alphabets instead of one. The strife has been raging fiercely in Paris. M. Chev  has his aiders and abettors; though among those signing a memorial, dated the 10th of April, in which the plea is advanced for giving the scheme a trial, we find only three musical names of any value, those of MM. David and Gevaerts and Herr Neukomm. (How the last, seeing that Herr Neukomm died some years ago?) Among the signatures to the "counterblast," otherwise protest, in distrust of a method which doubles the difficulties of learning under pretext of simplifying them, are those of MM. Auber, Carafa, Clapisson, Gounod, Hal vy, Meyerbeer, Niedermeyer, Thomas, Berlioz, Dietrich, D' rtigue, and Signor Verdi. This is an emphatic list, as emphatic as common sense. Many tests are proposed on both sides. The simple one is, what will the people brought up on make of a score or a stave printed in the accepted fashion? Is all music to be unprinted?—and have we not here a repetition of the visions of those who, in the "Fonetic Nuz," fondly dreamed that they were going to make reading easy?

On the 8th of next month, a Festival is to be held at Zwickau, in commemoration of Schumann, the day being the fiftieth anniversary of his birth.

M. Pougin continues his pleasant services to French musical literature, by commencing in the Gazette Musicale a series of articles on Mondoville, the composer, among other operas, of "Titon et Aurore," a work which had considerable Parisian fame in its day, and not fame without desert.

The Grecian daughter.

T. H. Hopkins. 25

Pretty and easy parlor-songs, all original.

O 'tis pleasant in our home.

Julius Becht. 25

My own dear mountain home.

Adolph Hasse. 25

Adapted to favorite German melodies. Both very suitable for young singers.

Come, oh come with me. (Vieni meco.)

Guglielmo. 25

A charming song, in the style of the generally admired Serenade, "La notte   bella," of the same composer, but suitable for a baritone voice.

Instrumental Music.

Japanese Embassy March.

W. H. Fry. 50

A musical tribute to the Lions of the day by one of our most noted composers. It will not fail to attract attention, as it is striking in rhythm and harmony, and not very difficult.

Ladies' Delight. Concert Polka.

Carl Haase. 50

One of the best and most effective compositions of the author, whose reputation as a player of first excellence is well established in this vicinity. The polka is difficult.

Ever of thee. Arranged for a Brass Band.

B. A. Burditt. 1.00

This favorite melody makes a beautiful serenading piece in Burditt's arrangement, even more so than the well-known "Departed days." No band should be without it.

Les Perles. Melodies for the Young.

Pieces which may be given to the first beginners. They will instruct and interest the pupil, and make teaching easy.

Books.

LIBRETTOS OF "Marriage of Figaro," "Robert le Diable," "Sicilian Vespers" and "L'Elisir d'Amore." Each

25

Four new numbers of the Series of "Ditson & Co.'s Handbooks of Standard Operas," each with Italian and English Text and the music of the principal airs. This elegant set of Librettos is rapidly approaching completion, about twenty being already issued, and the remainder nearly ready. In general correctness, convenience of size and fair appearance they are not surpassed, and must speedily become the only edition sought for by Opera-goers.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Popular Music of the Olden Time.*

(From the Quarterly Review.)

While the music of the learned shrank from all contact with that of the people, the literary poets carefully avoided all similitude to the ballad-writers, whom they regarded with an uneasiness similar to that experienced by Wilhelm Meister, when, having embraced the profession of an actor, he watched the evolutions of a party of low acrobats in the street, and could not help the unpleasant thought that they were a sort of fellow-craftsmen after all. The most celebrated poets of the people in the days of Queen Elizabeth were Elderton and Deloney; and the representatives of the old minstrels were blind harpers and fiddlers, who sang words composed by others, and made themselves useful by playing dances.

The literary poets were not content merely to shun the ballad-writer's art and to avoid his metre,—they pursued him with acrimonious censure, reviled his habit of life, ridiculed the expedients by which he sought to make his line fit the melody. The termination "a," that has now long sunk into disuse, but of which there is still a monument on the stage in the shape of Autolycus's song,—

"Jog on, jog on the footpath way,
And merrily hent the stile-a,"

—was regarded with especial abomination.

"If I let passe the un-countable rabble of ryming ballet-mongers, and compilers of senseless sonets (who be most busy to stuff every stall full of grosse devices and unlearned pamphlets), I trust I shall with the best sort be held excused. For though many such can frame an ale-house song of five or six score verses, hobbling upon some tune of a Northern Jigge, or Robyn Hode, or La Lubber, &c., and porhappes observe just number of sillables, eight in one line, six in an other, and therewithall an 'a' to make a jercke in the end: yet if these might be accounted poets (as it is sayde some of them make meanes to be promoted to the lawrell), surely we shall shortly have whole swarms of poets; and every one that can frame a booke in ryme, though, for want of matter, it be but in commendations of copper-noses or bottle ale, wyll catch at the garlande due to poets, whose poeticall (poetical I should say) heades I would wyshe, at their worshipfull commencement, might, in steede of lawrell, be gorgeously garnished with fayre greene harley, in token of their good affection to our Englishe malt."

So spake William Webbe, in "A Discourse of English Poetrie," dated 1586; but the songsters who used the objectionable appendage could write with ease and liveliness, as may be proved by these stanzas from a popular song of the seventeenth century, written by Martin Parker, and sung to the tune that is now associated with the far-famed "Sally in our Alley":—

"Although I am a country lass,
A lofty mind I bear-a,
I think myself as good as those
That gay apparel wear-a:
My coat is made of comely gray,
Yet is my skin as soft-a
As those that with the choicest wines
Do bathe their bodies oft-a.

What though I keep my father's sheep,
A thing that must be done-a,
A garland of the fairest flow'rs
Shall shield me from the sun-a:
And when I see them feeding by,
Where grass and flowers spring-a,
Close by a crystal fountain-side,
I sit me down and sing-a."

Though the musical taste of the people in Queen Elizabeth's time was distinct from that of the erudite composers and their patrons, it was equally remote from the mere love of boisterous noise which characterizes the so-called "harmonic meetings" of the humbler classes of our own days. Tinkers, tailors, smiths, colliers, not only were known to sing in parts, but their talent in this respect is the subject of frequent allusion in the works of our old dramatists. Nay, Deloney, who wrote a history of the "gentle craft," mentions an unlucky wight who tried to pass for a shoemaker, but was detected as an impostor because he could neither "sing, sound the trumpet, play upon the flute, nor reckon up his tools in rhyme."

The nonsensical words which often terminate the verses of our comic songs, and which are sung in unison with so much delight by a jovial company of the lower class as the solo vocalist arrives at the successive stages of his narrative, are the disreputable relics of a primitive harmony. The burden in early English songs was not a mere supplement, but was sung throughout as a bass or undersong, and the singer of this part was said to "bear the burden," the word itself being a corruption of the Norman word "bourdon," denoting a "drone-bass." In "Sumer is icumen in," which is considered by Mr. Chappell to be the earliest secular composition in parts known to exist in any country, and is assigned by him to the middle of the 13th century, we have one of the plainest examples of the burden properly so called. The words of the song, as originally written and modernized, are as follows:—

"Sumer is icumen in,
Loud sing, Cuccoo!
Groweth red, and bloweth med,
And springeth the wide nu.
Sing, Cuccoo!
Awe bleateth after lomb,
Lhouth after calve cu,
Bullinc starteth, bukke verteth,
Murie sing, Cuccoo!
Cuccoo! Cuccoo!
Wel singes thu, Cuccoo!
Ne swik thu never now."

"Summer is come in,
Loud sing, Cuccoo!
Groweth seed, and bloweth mead,
And spring' th the wood now.
Sing, Cuccoo!
Ewe bleateth after lamb,
Loweth after calf cow,
Bullock starteth, bucke verteth,
Merry sing, Cuccoo!
Cuccoo! Cuccoo!
Well sing' at thou, Cuccoo!
Nor cease thou never now."

During the whole progress of this song, the words "Sing, Cuccoo, nu! sing Cuccoo!" were sung by two voices as a bass or burden. Sometimes a proverbial expression—as "Tis merry in hall, when beards wag all"—served as text to the burden; sometimes unmeaning syllables, assembled together for no other apparent purpose than that of tickling the ear, as "Hey, nonny, nonny no!" or "Hey, down, down, derry down!" Of this more illustrious nonsense the "Tol de rol" and "Fol de riddle" of modern times are the inglorious progeny, while the burden itself now begins at the end of the verse, instead of being sung as an accompaniment. Harmony, indeed, once belonged to the distinctive characteristics of our island. "The Britons," says Giraldus Cambrensis, who wrote towards the end of the 12th century, "do not sing their tunes in unison, like the inhabitants of other countries, but in different parts," and he embraces in his commendation the northern English. When Thomas à Becket went to Paris to negotiate the marriage of the English prince with the daughter of King Louis, he entered the French towns preceded by two hundred and fifty boys on foot, in groups of six, ten, or more together, singing English songs, according to the custom of their country. So says the saint's biographer, Fitz Stephen. But we obtain a still more striking proof of the early proficiency of our countrymen in part-singing from an Animadversion on the Church music, written in Latin by Aelredus, Abbot of Rivaulx in Yorkshire, who died in 1166, and translated by Prynne into the following nervous English:—

"Let me speake now of those who, under the shew of religion, doe obpolliate the businesse of pleasure; who usurpe those things for the service of their vanity, which the ancient Fathers did profitably exercise in their types of future things. Whence then, I pray, all types and figures now ceasing, whence hath the Church so many Organs and Muscical Instruments? To what purpose, I demand, is that terrible blowing of Belloes, expressing rather the crackes of thunder, than the sweetness of a voyce? To what purpose serves that contraction and inflection of the voyce? This man sings abase, this a small meane, another a treble, a fourth divides and cuts asunder, as it were, certaine middle notes. One while the voyce is strained, anon it is remitted, now againe it is dashed, and then againe it is enlarged with a lower sound. Sometimes, which is a shame to spoake, it is enforced into an horse's neighings; sometimes, the masculine vigor being laid aside, it is sharpened into the shrillness of a woman's voyce; now and then it is writhed, and retorted with a certaine artificiall circumvolution. Sometimes thou mayst see a man with an open mouth, not to sing, but as it were, to breathe out his last gaspe, by shutting in his breath, and by a certaine ridiculous interception of his voyce, as it were to threaten silence, and now againe to imitate the agonies of a dying man, or the extasies of such as suffer. In the mean time, the whole body is stirred up and downe with certaine histrionical gestures: the lips are wreathed, the eyes turne round, the shoulders play, and the bending of the fingers doth answer every note. And this ridiculous dissolution is called religion; and where these things are most frequently done, it is proclaimed abroad that God is there more honorably served. In the meane time, the common people standing by, trembling and astonished, admire the sound of the Organs, the noyses of the Cymbals and muscical instruments, the harmony of the Pipes and Cornets; but yet looke upon the lascivious gesticulations of the singers, the meretricious alternations, interchanges, and infractions of the voyces, not without derision and laughter; so that a man may thinke that they came not to an oratory or to a house of prayer, but to a theatre; not to pray, but to gaze about them; neither is that dreadful majesty feared before whom they stand, etc. Thus, this Church singing, which the holy Fathers have ordained that the weako might be stirred up to piety, is perverted to the use of unlawfull pleasure."

Notwithstanding the importance of cittern, gittern, lute, and virginals during the Elizabethan days, the human voice was considered the chief organ of secular music. With the accession of James I. began that widely extended taste for the purely instrumental part of the art which is conspicuous in so many matinees and soirees of the present day. So anxious indeed were people to play, that they had recourse to the music they were once accustomed to sing, and madrigals were sent forth with the new recommendation that they were apt for viols as well as for voices. For the names of the instruments employed at this period, the inquisitive reader may turn over the pages of his Bible, for when the Old Testament was translated into the vernacular, equivalents for the Hebrew instruments were found in the implements rendered tuneful by British lungs and fingers. There is, moreover, a passage in Drayton's "Polyolbion," printed in 1613, which to the inquirer into the antiquities of English music may be almost as serviceable as Homer's catalogue of ships to the student of ancient geography:—

"The trembling lute some touch, some strain the viol best,
In sets that there were seen, the music wondrous choise.
Some, likewise, there affect the gambas with the voice,
To show that England could variety afford.
Some that delight to touch the sterner wiry chord,

*Frequents the green fern.

The cithren, the pandore, and the theorbo strike;
The gittern and the kit the wand'ring fiddlers like.
So were there some again, in this their learned strife.
Loud instruments that lov'd, the cornet and the life.
The hoboy, sackbut deep, recorder, and the flute,
F'ron the shrillest shawm unto the cornamute.
Some blow the bagpipe up, that plays the country Round,
The tabor and the pipe some take delight to sound."

The patronage once enjoyed by the minstrels was now bestowed on skilful instrumentalists, and Richard Braithwait, a writer of the times of James I., who has drawn up "Some Rules for the Government of the House of an Earl," enjoins the model nobleman to keep five musicians, who are not only to play themselves, but to teach the Earl's children to play upon the bassviol, the virginals, the lute, the bandora, and the cittern. Nor does this patronage of musicians begin with the formation of the instrumental branch of the art. In the time of Henry VIII. and of Elizabeth, there were wealthy merchants who retained as many musicians as the nobles who flourished under James I.

When the act of Elizabeth had proscribed "minstrels wandering abroad" as "rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars," the itinerant musicians were enjoined to wear cloaks and badges, with arms of some patron, individual or corporate, to denote in whose service they were engaged. Thus equipped, they were exempt from the operation of the act, and they seem to have abused this privilege much after the fashion of their more romantic predecessors, thrusting themselves into all companies, without waiting the ceremony of an invitation. However, there was plenty of legitimate work to be done by them, and at every species of festivity (not excluding funerals) their services were required. In the case of weddings there was a regular routine to be gone through. First, the bride was to be awakened in the morning by a "hunt's up;" next, music accompanied her to church; then music accompanied her from church; then there was music throughout the wedding dinner; and as for the singing and dancing in the evening, that was, of course, ad libitum.

The "hunt's up" was doubtless, in the first instance, a musical invitation to join the pleasures of the chase, but the meaning of the phrase was soon extended to include every kind of song that, in Hibernian fashion, might be described as a morning serenade, and when Juliet complains that the lark drives away Romeo "with hunts up to the day," she no doubt uses the expression in its most general sense. We have a very pretty specimen of the amatory "hunts up" in the following song taken by Mr. Chappell from a MS. in the possession of Mr. Collier, and possibly as old as the time of Henry VIII.:

"The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
Awake, my lady free,
The sun hath risen from out his prison,
Beneath the glistening sea.

The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
Awake, my lady bright,
The morning lark is high to mark
The coming of day-light.

The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
Awake, my lady fair,
The kine and sheep, but now asleep,
Browse in the morning air.

The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
Awake, my lady gay,
The stars are fled to the ocean bed,
And it is now broad day.

The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
Awake, my lady sheen,
The hills look out, and the woods about
Are drest in lovely green.

The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
Awake, my lady dear,
A morn in Spring is the sweetest thing
Cometh in all the year.

The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
Awake, my lady sweet,
I come to thy bow'r, at this lov'd hour,
My own true love to greet."

Great, however, as was the demand for musical talent in old London, when each ward had its musicians, besides those of Finsbury, Southwark, and Blackfriars, and the waits of London and Westminster, who were far more imposing personages than the miserable wretches who startle Paterfamilias out of his first sleep in the nineteenth century, this demand was exceeded by the supply, and England in the seventeenth century was the great exporting country of tuneful artists. The famous John Dowland, after travelling through divers lands, became lutenist to the Christian King of Denmark, and, when he returned home, the King begged that Thomas Cutting, another English lutenist, might be allowed to succeed him. Peter Phillips settled in the Netherlands, as organist to the Archduke of Austria, with the Italianized Pietro Philippi; while John Cooper, visiting Italy, became Giovanni Cuperario. The practice of converting English into foreign names is sometimes followed by singing and dancing artists of the present day, but they differ from their professional forefathers in this respect, that they become pseudo-Italians in order to impose upon their fellow-countrymen, not for the sake of conforming to the land of their adoption.

We have incidentally alluded to the "Waits." "They seem," says Mr. Chappell, "to have been originally a band of musical watchmen, who proved their watchfulness by piping at stated hours of the night." Their duties in the Court of Edward IV. are thus officially described:—

"A WATTE, that nightely from Mychelmas to Shreve Thorsdaye pipethe watche within this courte fower tymes; in the Somer nightes three tymes, and makethe bon gayte at every chambere doore and offyce, as well for feare of pyckers and pillers. He eatethe in the Halle with Mynstrelles, and takethe livery at nighte a loafe, a galone of ale, and for Somer nightes two candles [of] pitch, and a bushel of coles; and for Winter nightes halfe a loafe of bread, a galone of ale, four candles pitch, a bushel coles: Daylye whilst he is presente in Court for his wages, in Cheque-roale [Exchequer-roll], allowed liiid. or else liiid. by the discresshon of the Stenarde and Tressorore, and that after his cominge and deservinge: Also cloathing with the Houshold Yeomen or Mynstrelles lyke to the wages that he takethe. An he be sycke, he takethe two loaves, two messes of great meate, one galone ale. Also he parreth with the houshold of general gyfts, and hathe his beddinge carried by the Comptrolleres assignment; and, under this yeoman, to be a Groome-Waitere. Yf he can excuse the yeoman in his absence, then he takethe reward, clotheinge, meat, and all other things lyke to other Grooms of Houshold. Also this Yeoman-Waighte, at the making of Knightes of the Bath, for his attendance upon them by nighte-time, in watchinge in the Chappelle, hathe to his fee all the watchinge clothing that the Knight shall wear upon him."

When applied to the musicians of towns and corporations, the word "wayte" became less definite; but some of the significance of the ancient office was retained, and exists to the present day in the custom of rousing people in the mornings immediately preceding Christmas.

Madame Clara Novello.

Madame Novello's public career began at a remarkably early age. In 1832, when but fourteen years old, at the time of life at which in the ordinary course of nature the voice is unformed, —at a period when most singers are looking forward to the commencement of their studies, this notable artist appeared before the world, with powers naturally matured and highly cultivated. She sang at the Ancient Concerts—a series of performances these twelve years discontinued, which at that time, and for very long before, held the very first place in general consideration of all the concerts given in England; she sang at the Philharmonic Concerts, being the youngest vocalist that ever appeared in the performances of this society; and she sang at the great provincial musical festivals. The enumeration of these very important engagements is as good as a certificate of her success in their fulfilment. Singing is not, like other branches of musical proficiency, dependent only on the mental qualifications and the diligent study of an artist; it requires also a certain condition of physical development, which is rarely attained at so youthful an epoch as that at which Clara Novello was already acknowledged a deserved favorite in the most important musical institutions in the country. Well may we wonder, then, at this brilliant commencement of her career, no less than admire the singular capability which qualified her to command it.

At the famous musical festival held in Westminster Abbey in 1834—from which may be dated the progress if not the origin of the Sacred Harmonic Society, and thus the germ of the colossal performances in the Crystal Palace, which are the marvel of the world,—on this occasion of signal consequence in the history of the art, Clara Novello was one of the principal singers. It is of no little importance in the consideration of the most subordinate persons engaged in that famous festival, to remember that they were concerned in an event which may be believed to have induced an entire revolution in the state of music in England; with satisfaction greater in proportion to the greater responsibility she held, must one of the chief executants in that celebrated performance—the initial step of the great advance of music in this country—regard her participation of an artistic labor to which, and to the impression it created, so very much is to be ascribed. We naturally link the memory on this occasion with the idea of the more recent great musical occurrences in which Madame Novello has been engaged, and we observe with pride that, whereas at Westminster she was one among thirty of the greatest singers in Europe whose co-operation was supposed necessary to an efficient performance, at Sydenham she was the one soprano in all the world whose presence was indispensable, but sufficient in itself to secure all that was required for the solo pieces of Handel's master works.

Mendelssohn, in his first visits to London, was a frequent visitor at the house of Mr. Vincent Novello, who was one of the quickest to perceive, and one of the warmest to acknowledge, the greatness of his genius. Music was the ruling spirit of that artistic home, and the first musician of his time was especially in his element when surrounded by a family, every member of which sympathized with his all-pervading feeling, admired his singular powers, and took part with him in the execution of the choicest works the art possesses.

It is said that in summer weather, parties were frequently formed, of which he was one, and Malibran was another, for excursions into the fields round London—those charming spots where, after an hour's walking, one may suppose oneself a long day's journey from the turmoil of the city and its dust,—those spots justly celebrated by the so-called "Cockney poets," who, we have shown, were also constant guests of the Novello family. On these occasions, as on all others, music was essential to the day's enjoyment: accordingly the masterpieces of the great Italian and English vocal writers form the necessary baggage of the caravan of pleasure; and with these spread out before them, seated on the grass beneath the shade of hedgerows, and beyond the chance of interruption, the cheerful groups would sing the madrigals or the motets, the part-songs or the anthems, which delighted their forefathers, and with the melodious art rivalled the choristers of the grove at least in the cordial pleasure they felt in their own performance. Here was abundant opportunity for Mendelssohn to discover the natural and the acquired powers of our heroine; fully estimating which, he invited her to Leipsic to sing at the famous Gewandhaus Concerts then under his direction, whither she went in the autumn of 1836. The extent of her success, in Leipsic—at that time rendered by the presence of Mendelssohn, and by his influence, the most musical city in Europe—may be supposed from the great composer's reply to a request of our Philharmonic directors that he would recommend them some singers to engage for their series of concerts; "The greatest singers in Germany," answered Mendelssohn, "are Miss Clara Novello and Mrs. Alfred Shaw." The very great merit of the latter lady is as well remembered as her loss to the public is regretted: the former is still, and will be till November next, before the world; and her powers and the popular appreciation of them have constantly increased, from the time when Mendelssohn so spoke of her until now that she is about to leave us.

From Leipzig she proceeded to other German cities, and carried her success with her wherever she sped. In Berlin she was received with remarkable favor, and so especially pleased the King of Prussia that he gave her letters in his own hand to his sister the Empress of Russia; upon the strength of which valuable introduction Miss Clara Novello visited Petersburg.

It would seem that Apollo, as if to make up to the dwellers in the frozen North for his scanty allowance of warmth and of light, had gifted them more freely in comparison with the other domain of his godship, endowing them with an extraordinary love of music, or at least—what is perhaps of equal importance to the advancement of the art—an extraordinary liberality in paying for it. There is no place on which the sun shines where musical executants are so warmly welcomed or so munificently remunerated as in the Muscovite capital; and there is no singer who has more fully proved the Petersburg power of patronage than Miss Clara Novello. We may refer to any of the records of the roubles that have been showered upon each and every of the singers and players who have exercised their ability in the North Eastern Empire for testimony of the openhandedness of the princes and nobles of the land reviled for its despotism: let them read this testimony, and let them understand that neither the praise nor the pay lavished on the most fortunate of others were withheld in the case of Miss Clara Novello.

From Petersburg, with its shining honors thick upon her, she returned to London to resume her career of triumphs, which seemed to flow with still greater force than before, as though in consequence of its interruption by her absence abroad. She sang here for a season at all the principal musical performances, and then went with her father and her brother to Bologna, to consult Rossini as to the desirability of her devoting herself to a yet untried branch of her profession, the art of dramatic singing. The great master was delighted with her voice and charmed with her talent; he earnestly encouraged her inclination to go on the stage, but advised her that she must go through a course of special instruction to fit her for the new artistic character she purposed to assume. Accordingly she went to Milan, where she became the pupil of Micheron, the master of the greatest theatrical singers of the day, and applied herself to diligent study under his teaching for an entire year. It was no little act of forbearance to retire from the admiration her every performance elicited, and to seclude herself from the opportunities of applause for so long a period; but self-reliance gave her confidence in still greater success when she should become qualified to be a candidate for it, and this was amply sufficient to compensate her for leaving thus long uncultured the laurels which she knew were everywhere ready for her to gather. She was well repaid for all she denied herself in this year of study, by the result. On her re-appearance in public, she entered upon a new course of success that exceeded all she had previously achieved.

Musical Pitch.

(Concluded.)

It is certain that a change from the present pitch of C 546 to C 512—a change of about a semitone—could not be made without great inconvenience and pecuniary loss to the body with whom the adjustment of the pitch practically rests—our orchestral performers. Such a change, too, would fall heavily on musical instrument makers, probably to the extent in many cases of rendering the great portion of their existing stock valueless. This objection, it is thought by some even of those who are most anxious for a great depression of the present pitch, would be fatal to any proposition which did not in some way meet it. Information has reached the sub-committee that considerable difficulties are found in enforcing the new musical diapason in France, and that authority such as never would be sought for or obtained in this country has found a powerful antagonism in

"the inexorable logic of facts." Why, it has been asked, should we not profit by this experience, and abandoning the chase after that which others, with more advantage than ourselves, have as yet found unattainable, turn our attention to that which would seem to be within our reach. For, it is believed, though so great a change of pitch as that involved in the descent from C 546 to C 512 would experience an amount of opposition which there is no means of overcoming, a change smaller in amount, while it would afford considerable relief to the vocal performer, would not be unacceptable to the instrumental, since it could be carried into effect without appreciable injury to, certainly without the destruction of, his instrument.

It is well known, that neither by the committee called together by the Society of Arts, nor by the Commission appointed by the French Government, has the attempt to deal with the now intolerable evil of an extravagantly high pitch, been made for the first time. Among other attempts, that of a Congress of Musicians at Stuttgart, in 1834, has attracted the most attention. This body recommended a pitch of 528 for C, = 440 for A, basing their calculation on a 32 ft. organ-pipe, giving 33 vibrations per second instead of 32. The following would be the scale at this pitch—the only one yet proposed which gives all the sounds in whole numbers:

This pitch, of which the C is 16 vibrations per second higher than that of C 512, and 18 vibrations lower than the Cat the present pitch (of 546), is as near as possible half-way between the two latter, and, therefore, a quarter of a tone above the one, and a quarter of a tone below the other. To lower the stringed instruments to this pitch would obviously be attended with little difficulty. Depression to the extent of a quarter of a tone is said to be easy with the brass instruments and possible with the wooden wind instruments—the flutes, oboes, clarionets, and bassoons—now in use. Few organs exist of higher pitch than the Stuttgart, and the raising of those which have been tuned to C 512 would not be attended with serious difficulty. The Stuttgart pitch, then, if not the very best that could be conceived, may be regarded as the one which, with many recommendations, would have the best chance of attaining the general assent of contemporary musicians. Though higher than the pitch of 512, the Philharmonic pitch, or the diapason normal, the Stuttgart pitch is but a few vibrations higher than the last two of these,—one of which experience has proved to be a good pitch for instrumental music. It is a quarter of a tone below the present pitch, by general consent voted intolerably high. Its adoption would involve little, if any, inconvenience, or pecuniary loss to instrumental performers or makers of musical instruments. It would, therefore be likely to meet the support of the majority of those interested in the question of pitch.

The Committee, in bringing their inquiries and discussions to a close, cannot but express an earnest hope that whatever recommendation of a pitch may be adopted by a General Meeting, it will be received by professors and amateurs of music in a spirit worthy of an attempt to deal with a question in which every musician must have a strong interest, and with that respect which must ever be due to a conclusion not arrived at without much patient labor and very serious consideration.

List of the several pitches referred to in the foregoing report:—

Handel's Tuning Fork (c. 1740).....	A at 416	—C at 409 1-5
Theoretical Pitch.....	A at 428 2-3	—C at 512
Philharmonic Society (1812-42).....	A at 433	—C at 518 2-5
Diapason Normal (1859).....	A at 435	—C at 522
Stuttgart Congress (1834).....	A at 440	—C at 528
Italian Opera, London (1859).....	A at 455	—C at 546

The Dusseldorf Festival.

The Lower Rhenish Music-Festival (the 37th anniversary, has passed off amid its accustomed genuine and unostentatious enjoyment. They always select the "merrie monthe of Maye," "ces bons Allemands," as their (and our) encroaching (and "lively") neighbors call them; and this time, as from time out of mind, the 27th, 28th and 29th were devoted to the glad event. Dusseldorf, the garden-city of the "river of Rhene" (or Rhine), was the favored locality, Köln (or Cologne), the City of the Magi, having been thus distinguished the year before, and Aachen (or Aix la Chapelle) the City of Carlo Magnus (or Charlemagne), the year before that.

These triennial music fêtes, on (or near) the edge of the stream with which the satiric poet (or poetic satirist) Heinrich Heine, communed and sympathized, in some degree resemble our own triennial gatherings in the Cathedral towns; only that while the cider-drinking people give charity a voice in their rejoicings, the Hoch-quaffing Rhenish burghers make theirs a mere bond of harmonious brotherhood among the triple populations. The Dusseldorf meeting derives additional interest from the fact that Mendelssohn at one period chose Dusseldorf as his headquarters; and that at Dusseldorf, in the same month of May (1836), he first brought out his immortal Paulus. There is no Mendelssohn now to direct the performances, and consecrate the festival by the presence and example of genius; but in place of Mendelssohn, there is Mendelssohn's fellow student and intimate friend, Hiller—Kapellmeister Ferdinand Hiller, of Cologne, whom—for some reason only known to his amiably whimsical self—Mendelssohn would at the Paulus-fete, invariably salute as "Hiller's Studies." "Here comes Hiller's Studies," he would say to some English friends, on spying out his old "chum," while a smile would light up that countenance which was rather the countenance of an angel than of a man, and show the bright side of the angelic nature at its brightest. Ferdinand Hiller, Principal of the Conservatory at Cologne, is also an admirable musician, as all musical Europe knows; and a capital fellow, as is best known to his friends. Since Mendelssohn deserted the Rhine, to walk in the shadow of John Sebastian Bach—at Leipzig, the city of the Thomas-Schule—no such popular chief has been known to Dusseldorf, Cologne, or Aix, as Hiller.

On the whole, to judge by our correspondence, the 37th Niederrheinisches Musik-Fest was not one of the most brilliant on record. Dusseldorf looked as gay and animated as of yore, it is true; and the morning rehearsal in the Ton Halle as busy and exciting. The programme, however, does not appear to have afforded unanimous approval. At the first performance, concert (Sunday), which began at 6 P. M., (what would our late dinner "fashionables" have said to that?) the selection comprised Robert Schumann's orchestral symphony in B flat, and Handel's oratorio of Samson—Samson according to Mosel, one of the modellers who have re-adjusted the giant's proportions. Of Schumann's work, a correspondent writes:—

"With regard to Schumann's symphony much cannot be said, for a more chaotic composition, I should think, was never heard; and had it not been performed by a remarkably fine orchestra, nobody would have sat it out."

This opinion, however, must be accepted with great reserve, inasmuch as, further on, the same correspondent, who adopts the pseudonym of "Philomousos," shows himself a not very competent authority. Take the following as an example:—

"Music is certainly in a state of anarchy in Germany at the present day owing to the endeavors of the Zukunfts party (that which the present will not acknowledge, and the future will not believe to have existed), who state that they are to be the great reformers of music, the chief members being Franz Liszt, R. Wagner, Schumann, (before his death), and the French composers, Berlioz, Gounod, not forgetting Litolff, and the Belgian, Gewaerts."

"Philomousos" speaks only by rote. At any rate, his light is at best a rushlight, for it has not helped him to the knowledge of some very important ("patent") facts: among the rest, that M. Hector Berlioz has indignantly protested against his name being associated with the Zukunfts party, and that Mr. Henry Litolff broke his stick at Weimar, (not over the head of Father Liszt, but as a symbol of his rupture with the anarchists). Then, to rank such helpless innocents as formed the Gaul, and Gewaerts, the Walloon, among this formidable tribe of savages! The composer of music to Le medecin malgre lui, and the composer of music to a book on Quentin Durward, illustrating the "Art Work of the Future," is too comical. On the contrary, they much more properly belong to the past. Herr Wagner would scout them.

Of the execution of Handel's Samson, our Correspondent writes (allowing for some necessary abbreviations) as follows:—

"All the choruses were magnificently executed; but unfortunately this was not the case with the solos. The Germans go upon the economical system: thus the solos were not in the hands of first-rate artists. It is a case of 'Mes beaux jours sont passés,' with Madame Jenny Burde-Ney, her singing now being little better than screaming. Fraulein Schreck (alto) sings carefully, and has some very good notes. The tenor, Herr Schnorr, must have been suffering from a cold, for he literally sneezed through his part. If he be the 'most magnificent tenor singer in Germany,' had must be the best. Herr Stockhausen, the bass, is the artist to whom one can listen with pleasure. But the Dusseldorf fanatics attach too much importance to the abilities of all these singers. Mr. Hiller has made additions to the instrumentation of some of the airs in Samson; and no less than five were introduced, restored, that have always hitherto been omitted. Barbeitung und Verbesserung! There is no organ in the Dusseldorf Music Hall, nor is it customary in Germany to give Handel's choruses with organ accompaniment. If people wish to hear Handel's compositions thoroughly well performed, they must go to England."

On Monday, when the concert began at the same hour, the subjoined was the programme:—

1. Overture, "Wasserträger;"..... Cherubini.
2. Ver Sacrum, oder die Gründung Roms;..... F. Hiller.
3. Selection from "Iphigenia in Tauris;"..... Gluck.
4. Symphony in A major (No. 7)..... Beethoven.

The overture of Cherubini was, it appears, admirably played. Indeed, the orchestra at this festival, if the ear of "Philomousos" may be accredited with sharpness, carried all before it. Read the subjoined, in reference to Beethoven's symphony:—

"No words can sufficiently express the praise due to all the members of the orchestra for their attention to nuances. The crescendi and diminuendi were perfect."

Gluck seems not to have fared so well, however:

"The selection from Iphigenia in Tauris was but a poor affair. The whole went astray; as did also Hiller's composition," &c.

What follows is a tirade of the most abusive character, directed not only against Hiller's Gründung Roms, but against Hiller himself; not only against the literary share which Herr Bischoff (of the Köln-Zeitung and Niederheinisches Musik-Zeitung) had in the Cantata, but against Herr Bischoff himself. Hiller is accused of every conceivable artistic sin, while Herr Bischoff is thus dismissed: "The text is rubbish, although the idea is fine." We must be excused from printing any part of this criticism, and are too glad to pass on to the third and last performance, which took place on Tuesday, at the same hour of 6 P. M. Mendelssohn's overture to Fingal's Cave was as finely played as the other instrumental pieces; and Mdlle. Schreck (the contralto) very successful in an air from Bach's Passion Musik (violin accompaniment by Joachim). The other vocal pieces were a trio from Fidelio, an air from Boieldieu's Fête du Village Voisin (Herr Stockhausen); the hacknied scene from Der Freischütz (Madame Ney-Bürde); a tenor air from Euryanthe (Herr Schnorr); Liedel, by Schumann, Hiller, and Schubert (Herr Stockhausen); Venzano's Falsch (Madame Ney-Bürde); and the concluding chorus from Samson. There were two overtures, Spontini's Olympia, and a concert-overture by Herr Tausch of Düsseldorf; Beethoven's pianoforte concerto in E flat, played by Herr Tausch, and a couple of violin solos by Joachim, viz., his own, on Hungarian melodies, and one of Beethoven's Romances (which of the two our correspondent does not state).

About this concert we subjoin the remarks of "Philomousos," abridged as expedience may have suggested:

"Joachim's violin solo was beautifully executed: Mozart's 'Ave verum,' could not have been better given, whether by orchestra or chorus. In fact, the weak points throughout the whole festival were owing to the mediocrity of the solo singers. Herr Tausch's concert overture was a childish affair; the composer, who directed its performance as a conductor, more childish still, and yet he holds the appointment of Städt Musik-Director in Düsseldorf. Herr Tausch is a pupil of F. Schneider, brother to the man who tortured the people in 1852 with an interminable organ fugue at Exeter Hall. The concerto of Beethoven was nicely executed by Herr Tausch, and well interpreted. The even manner in which he gave the rapid passages deserves praise; but as a pianist, he can't play, and never will be able to play, like Miss Arabella Goddard or young Mr. Barnett.

"Beethoven's Romanza was divinely executed by Joachim, whose pure style must always be admired. Indeed, it is impossible to overpraise Joachim in this admirable performance, which so affected the audience that many of them were in tears! Madame Jenny Ney-Bürde, to a certain extent, vindicated her reputation in Weber's Sera.

In defence of the "Bearbeitung" (adaptation) and "Verbesserung" (amelioration) of Handel's Samson, which has been commented upon in a hostile spirit, let one of Hiller's advocates in the Kölnische Zeitung speak:

"It is by no means the intention of Herr Hiller to bring Samson before the public in its complete and unabridged form, since neither the work nor the audience would benefit thereby. Mosel, in the arrangement through which the oratorio has acquired universal favor, has cut in freely with a very powerful knife, and in performing the operation has evidently gone too deeply into the flesh. But in spite of all that Handel fanatics say about the injustice done to this work, which should have been handed over to the world unmutilated, the adaptation is preferable to the original score. The latter, besides recitatives, contains sixteen airs and one duet more than have been heretofore published. Among these Herr Hiller has selected those which he considered the best suited to give prominence to the chief supporters of the action—Samson and Delila. He has fitted these pieces to a German text, and made necessary additions to the instrumentation, and it is not to be doubted that the work has been thereby enriched."

So deep is the feeling of spite evinced by "Philomousos" against Hiller, that he even allows himself to be led into a non sequitur:

"Portraits of Hiller are being sold in all the booksellers' shops, as if he were Beethoven returned to the world again—which accounts for the vanity of the man."

The worthy Kapellmeister of Cologne may console himself with the lupus involuntarily committed by his detractor. The artistic stature of Ferdinand Hiller is not diminished one hair's breadth by such inconsiderate attacks. May his shadow be never the less—and "Hiller's Studies" the name by which he is remembered when the trenchant shears of the Parce cut the thread of his existence. He who was the friend of Mendelssohn, and is the friend of Rossini, may laugh at an obscure Philomousos.—London Musical World.

Reed Stops in the Organ.*

The reed stops are the third great class of registers. We will not speak of those that are called free reeds, because their application is too exceptional, but of the stops with reeds which beat, of the reed stops which are altogether classical, and in general use; the bright sound of which has also a certain metallic roughness, because the tongue of metal vibrates with considerable violence, and at each vibration beats against a reed, which is also of metal.

This kind of register, the introduction of which has completely changed the former character of the organ, on account of the vigor of its sounds, and their great majesty as compared with other registers, in certain combinations and on some occasions, is used in church music, even when it is required to be most solemn and impressive. It embraces in its scale all the degrees of tone, from the six-inch pipe to the thirty-two feet; and hence it gives the sound of all reed wind instruments, from the largest to the smallest. The six-inch reeds lay claim, moreover, to the high-sounding title, and it is not an unworthy ambition, of vox humana, while the sixteen-foot reeds represent the trombone and the bombarde, this last being an old reed instrument of the sixteenth century; though they represent it perhaps more in the name than in reality; and the thirty-two feet reeds, which are commonly not more than twenty-four feet in fact, represent the contra-bombarde, called by the Italians the bombarlare, as they have made trombone out of tromba.

The grave inconvenience of reed stops, considered instrumentally, is that the treble notes overpower the basses. This arises from the fact that the depth of tone depends on the increase in the size of the tongue and reed. Hence the lower the sound descends towards the bass, the stronger does it of necessity become. The tongue, on the contrary, becomes smaller as it ascends higher into the treble notes; and therefore, also, the sounds produced by it become thinner or weaker and out of all proportion with the fulness in volume of the sounds of the bass. This is also so much the case, that for the full effect of the higher sounds, reed stops by themselves are not enough, but require to be strengthened with some member of the flue-pipes. There are, indeed, some builders who, not being able to obtain sufficient power with their reed stops in the higher octaves, make use of flue-pipes for this purpose instead of reeds, and voice them as keen and clear as possible. More commonly, however, the organist, in order that the two or three last octaves of a reed stop may be heard distinctly, combines with it a very forcible mixture called a cornet, which, when it is well managed, decreases in power in proportion as it approaches the bass, and therefore gives additional strength to the treble notes of the reed stop only. None of these plans, after all, are quite equal to the task of raising the reed stops to exactly the same position as the flue stops, because, when they are added, they make a complete change in the quality of the register, of which it is intended they should be only a continuance; in fact, they do nothing more than cause it to break off abruptly at a given place, and from that place put themselves instead of it.

The character, then, of reed stops is exactly the reverse of flue stops, since these last yield piercing sounds in their treble notes, and are, comparatively speaking, veiled in their sound in their basses. The consequence of this opposition makes itself especially felt in the song of the Church in both of these stops. In France, where the national character is lively and positive, the common way is to make use of the reed stops in accompanying the ecclesiastical chant; and as the trebles would naturally be covered by the vigor of the basses, it is these basses that are used to intone the melody of the Church,—namely, the plain chant. It would be easy to show to such persons as do not see it for themselves, that to make in this way a bass of a popular chant is wholly at variance with the original intentions of the composers of this chant; for the voice of the people is not a bass voice. It could be easily shown also that the counterpoint, the best of its kind in this old sort of music, in which the treble, used as the accompaniment, is made to take the place of the bass, and the bass that of the treble, is rather an offence against common sense than a counterpoint at all.

It is in accordance with the rules of harmony to give the melody to the right hand and its accompaniment to the left; but then the reed stops must not be employed. The French fashion of making use of the reed stops on all occasions, even in the most simple form of recitative, that of the ecclesiastical chant, has caused this chant to become coarse, harsh, and insupportable; and the French organ has most commonly abjured all its more mellow tones for such as are hard and without expression. Our builders, as regards soft stops, have, to speak generally, remained stationary; while the German builders, on the contrary, have not ceased a moment from creating the most delicate variety of sounds in all shades of tone in this kind of stop. But let us take courage: for some years past our most eminent builders, though they are but few, have set to work to imitate the delicacy of the Germans in these matters; and where the French begin by imitating, they generally end by surpassing.

Leopold Mozart to his wife.

Milan, January 8, 1771.

Yesterday we had a little concert at Count Firmiani's, where Wolfgang had a concerto—a very fine one, and quite new—given him to play. Next Monday we shall go to Turin, where we shall spend a week. Our son's opera marches onward amidst universal approbation, and as the Italians say, it is going up to the skies (alle stelle). Every one is curious to behold the maestro and to speak with him.

During the three first performances Wolfgang sat at the first harpsichord, and the maestro Lampagnani accompanies him on the second. Now it is the latter who plays the first, and the maestro Melchior Chiesa the second.

The Philharmonic Academy of Verona has admitted our dear son among its members, and the Cancelliere dell' Accademie is busy preparing the diploma to send it to us. God be thanked! the opera is so attractive that the theatre is crammed full every day.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—It is long since I wrote, I have been so busy. Now that I have more time I shall attend better to my duty. The opera, God be thanked, pleases, for the theatre is quite full every night, which astonishes every one, as every one says that in Milan no first opera ever drew such a crowd. We are well, and I hope at Easter to be able to tell everything in detail to you and our good mother. A propos—yesterday the copyist came to see us, and to tell us that the court of Lisbon had asked for a copy of the opera. Keep yourself in health, my lady sister.

I have the honor to be and eternally to remain,
Your faithful brother.

Venice, February 20, 1771.

We arrived here the Monday before Shrove Tuesday. We go every night to the opera and to the other places of public recreation. The former impresario, Cressa, miserably drest, crawls about the streets of Milan a beggar. God thus punishes the deceitful.

I have yet to tell you, about our stay at Milan, the following fact:—we heard a thing which will seem to you incredible, and which I thought I never could have heard.—N. B. in Italy. We heard two poor people, a man and a woman, singing together in the streets, and singing entirely in fifths, without missing a single note. This is what I never heard in Germany. From a distance I thought at first that two persons were singing separately. As we drew near we found that it was a duo in pure fifths.

I cannot sufficiently lay stress on the politeness of M. Wider, the merchant to whom I have been recommended, and on that of all his family. It is impossible to give them too much praise. I have learnt a little to read the men of this world; but I have seen few, very few, so obliging as these,—frank, kindly, and open, at the same time that they are polite, well-mannered, and free from pride. They have invited us to dinner every day that we have no other engagement. We shall soon have had enough of our journeys in gondolas. To-morrow we dine at Catarina Cornero's, Sunday at the Patriarch's, Monday at Dolfino's, next week, almost every day, with other nobili.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—I am still alive, God be praised, and in good health. Do you know what it is to receive the attacca? In order to become a true Venetian, you must allow your hinder part to be brought violently in contact with the ground. It was decided that I should be initiated. Seven women laid hold of me, and they succeeded in bringing me—how shall I say?—aground.

Venice, March 1, 1771.

We are constantly invited out, now at one place now at another; there is always some lordly gondola before our door ready to carry us to the Grand Canal. On our return we shall have to make a stay for a few days at Vicenza, the bishop of which, who belongs to the Cornero family, will not allow us to pass through the city on any other condition; the same with Verona. I am vexed that we shall only have melancholy fast days during our whole journey. We may, perhaps, reach Reichenhall on Good Friday, where we shall hear the usual opera of the Passion. I will relate to you all we have seen; the arsenal, the churches, the hospitals; there are a thousand things to admire here.

We shall not bring the opera back with us. It is still in the hands of the copyist, who, like all the copyists of Italy, will not let the original of an opera go out of his hands as long as he can make a profit of the copies, in order that he alone may have the benefit of it. When we left Milan the copyist had made five complete copies, one for the impresa (management), two for Vienna, one for the Duchess of Parma, and the other for the court of Lisbon, not to speak of the single pieces of which he had many copies to make. He has not executed all his orders yet.

Tuesday there is a grand concert; Sunday we go to the Imperial ambassador, Monday to Maffetti's.

We are so plagued and dragged at in every direction, that I cannot say who, of all that ask us, will succeed in getting us. It is a pity we could not have stayed longer here, for we have made a wide acquaintance with all the nobility, and everywhere, in the drawing-rooms, at the dinner table, we are so overwhelmed with honors, that not only are we fetched and brought back in gondolas by the secretary of each house, but the master of the house himself accompanies us home, and they are among the first people in Venice, the Cornero's, Grimani's, Mocenigo's, Dolfini, Valieri, &c.

I am afraid we shall meet with very bad roads, for there have been frightful rains. Basta! we must take things as they come. All these things do not interrupt my repose, so long as we are in health.

We had made everybody believe that we should start a day earlier than we meant, in order to have a day to ourselves, and to have time to pack up. But the trick was nosed out, and we had to dine once more with Cotari, and with Cornero, who presented us with a handsome snuff box, and some fine lace cuffs. We saw all that we could contrive to visit in Padua in one day, for there we could get no rest either, and Wolfgang had to play in two places. He also found some work there, for he is to compose an oratorio for Padua. We paid a visit to the Maestro Padre Valotti* al Santo, and then Ferrandini†,

We have been here since the 21st. The poem has not yet been sent from Vienna. The archduke arrives on the 15th of October, and the marriage will take place on the same day.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—We were overcome with heat on the road; the dust followed us up most pertinaciously and impudently to such a degree, that we should certainly have been stifled and have died, had we not had the good sense to do nothing of the kind. Keep your promise to me; you know very well what I mean. O thou all-beloved, I beseech thee; I shall most certainly be beholden to thee.

At this moment I am suffocating! I open my waistcoat. Addio. Overhead we have a violinist; there is one below us; in the next apartment there is a singing-master giving lessons; opposite to us there is a colonel. This is an amusing state of things when you are composing; it gives one ideas.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, August 30, 1771.

The poem has come at last. As yet Wolfgang has done nothing but the oversure, to wit, a tolerably long allegro, an andante which is to be danced to, but only by a few persons. Then instead of the concluding allegro he has written a sort of contredanse and chorus, which is to be sung and danced to. We shall have a pretty good deal to do this month. We are going to see M. Hasse, who has just arrived.

We went to see the Princess, the betrothed of the Archduke. She was extremely gracious; not only did she chat a long time with us, but, moreover, gave us the most charming reception, for as soon as she caught sight of us, she advanced quickly to meet us, drew off her glove and presented her hand, and began to address us before we could say a word to her.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—I have already in your honor eat lots of pears, peaches, and melons. My sole pleasure is talking in signs with the dumb people, for I can do it to perfection. Let me recommend to you my prayer for the other, so long as there is another, you understand.*

No. 106.

I received your few lines; it was a most economical idea to write only a little on the first page and scarcely anything on the second; for so many thousands of letters might add such weight to the epistle, that it would require six horses to convey it to Milan. Heavens, what an amount of postage! Blank sheets are always less costly to be conveyed than those which are covered with writing.

‡Count Flomiani wrote to him from Milan, in the name of the Empress Maria Theresa, to confide to Wolfgang the composition of a grand serenade for the stage, to celebrate the marriage of Archduke Ferdinand. It was called Ascanio in Als. The opera composed on the same occasion was entrusted to the eldest of the chapel masters, the celebrated Hasse.

‡Mozart returned in August to Milan, with his father, to compose his serenade, and work at an opera at the same time.

*A young lady, a favorite with the young composer, and who was shortly about to be married.

Our heads are quite full. We received the poem very late, and even then it still remained some days in the hands of the poet, that he might make all sorts of changes. I hope it will have a good success. But Wolfgang has a heap of things to write, for he is also obliged to compose the music for the ballet which connects the two acts, or the two parts of the serenade.

I did not think it at all extraordinary that the Archduke Maximilian should have become a canon of the Cathedral. I everywhere, and on all occasions have said it, since my return from Italy to Salzburg, that it would happen. We shall see the rest: patience. I am sorry I cannot write all I have to say. Salzburg is not the sole motive for this first step.

No. 107.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, September 13, 1771.

Wolfgang will, I hope, with God's help, have finished the serenade in twelve days; it is properly speaking an azione teatrale in two parts. The recitatives, with and without accompaniments, are all finished, and the choruses also, five of which are sung only, and three others sung and danced to at the same time. We attended to-day the rehearsal of the dance, and we admired the zeal of the two ballet-masters, Pick and Fabier. The first tableau represents Venus emerging from the clouds, accompanied by Genii and Graces.

The andante of the symphony is danced to by eleven personages, eight Graces and three Goddesses. The last allegro of the symphony is a chorus of thirty-two choristers, eight soprani, eight contralti, eight tenors, and eight basses, and at the same time danced to by sixteen personages, eight women, and eight men.

There is another chorus of shepherds and shepherdesses; and besides chorus of shepherds alone, that is tenors and basses; next there are choruses of little shepherdesses, that is of soprani and contralti. In the last scene they are all together, Geni, Grazi, Pastori, Pastorelle, choristers, dancers of both sexes, and all dance together to the final chorus. In the above enumeration are not included the solo dancers, namely, M. Pick, M<sup>me</sup>. Binotti, M. Fabier, and M<sup>me</sup>. Blache. The small solos which intervene between the choruses, sometimes between two soprani, sometimes between alti and soprani &c., are intermingled with solos by dancers of both sexes.

The personages of the cantata are: La Venere, Signora Falchini, seconda donna; Ascanio, Signor Mansuoli, primo uomo; Silvia, Signora Girolli, prima donna; Aeste Sacerdote, Signor Tibaldi, tenore; Fauno Pastore, Signor Solzi, secondo uomo.

N. B.—We have already in hand our Venice affair for 1773.

(Here follows in Italian the agreement for an opera to be performed in Venice at the Carnival of 1773, and requiring the presence of young Mozart in that city from the 30th of November, 1772. The terms are seventy sequins.)

P. S. from Wolfgang.—I shall write only for the sake of writing. I am not very well. I have a cold in my head and chest. Tell M<sup>lle</sup>. de Moelk I am greatly rejoiced at the idea of returning to Salzburg, if it were only to receive for my minuets such a present as I received once after a certain concert,—she will know well enough what the present I mean was.

Musical Correspondence.

CAMDEN, N. J., JUNE 23. — Although we are not accustomed to share our musical treats with the readers of the Journal, yet we presume you will be pleased to hear from an old friend. We were not a little surprised a few days since by the announcement of "A Grand Concert to be given in the Court House, Friday evening, June 22, by the Camden Sacred Musical Union." The selections were from Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Romberg, Möhring, Fesca, Speyer and other eminent composers, and were performed with much credit. We would particularly mention: "The Heavens are Telling," from Haydn; the air for soprano: Deh, se piacer me vuoi, from "Titus," by Mozart; the "Hunter's Song," by Kücken; "The Wanderer," by Fesca; Air for soprano: "Angels ever bright and fair," from "Theodora," Handel; a solo and chorus from the "Power of Song," by Romberg; "Rest in Peace," by Möhling; and a charming Quartet by Foster. We should be unjust did we not also mention the Piano Solos; especially the introductory one from C. M. von Weber, performed by Mr. JACKSON, the conductor of the Association. It convinced us that certainly there was one excellent pianist in Camden. Mr. J. has done much for music here, and we are glad to learn he is reaping the fruits of his labor from a good number of pupils, and the high esteem in which he is held by all the lovers of good music here. The Hall was well filled by an appreciating and attentive audience, who expressed their pleasure and satisfaction by frequent and hearty applause. The Society was organized in October last, and is composed of the best talent in Camden. We trust they will continue their rehearsals, for we are sure, if they can draw so large a house, this very warm season, as was assembled last evening, they cannot fail to meet with even greater success during the winter months.

Our residence here has been short, yet we have been gratified to hear so much good music both in Camden and Philadelphia, and we are promising ourselves many happy hours from music here, which we have so often enjoyed in Boston.

NEW ENGLAND.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., JUNE 26.—THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB, assisted by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, gave their sixth concert at Lyceum Hall, Cambridge, on Wednesday evening, June 20th. Nothing could be more unpropitious than the weather; the rain had been pouring in torrents all day, and only increased as the hour for the commencement approached. But at eight o'clock every seat was taken, and the ladies were somewhat in the majority, proving the popularity of the music of the Club. Here is the programme:

PART I.

1. Quintet in B flat, op. 57, Allegro and Adagio. Mendelssohn
2. The Cheerful Wanderer. Mendelssohn
3. Polonaise, op. 26, for Piano. Chopin
4. Wandering Song. Mendelssohn
5. Thema, and Variations, from the Quartet, in A, op. 18. Beethoven
6. Possenti Nunt, Song and Chorus from the "Magic Flute." Mozart

PART II.

1. Song written for the Germans at Lyons. Mendelssohn
2. Souvenir de Sonnambula, solo for Violoncello. Kummer
3. Turkish Drinking Song. Mendelssohn
4. Wanderer's Night Song. Lens
5. Scenes and Aria, from "Le Pré aux clercs." Herold
6. Summer Song. Mendelssohn
7. College Songs.

The Glee Club, not the Quintette, as is seen in the bill, gave prominence to Mendelssohn. They have made him a study the past year, and with excellent success, if their performance be taken as the result; the involved parts were rendered with great clearness and self-possession, and there was none of that nervous hurry so often incidental to an amateur performance. This was the more creditable, since the class of music was of a higher standard than they have ever before attempted. After the Club had recovered from the throat-parching effect of the first piece, the voices came out clear and brilliant. The great successes of the evening were No. 6, in the first part, and No. 3, in the second part. Both were received with great enthusiasm, and repeated. The "Turkish Drinking Song." I preferred to the same as performed by the "Orpheus," because there was not that excess of light and shade by which some of the tones are lost in a vanish, and there is a freshness and brilliancy in the young voices of the Harvard which is very pleasing.

The Quintette were an inspiration to the singers, and must have been refreshed in performing to such a cordial and appreciative audience. Too often the instrumental part is counted a bore, when compared with the vocal, but the performers were twice recalled; the last time they could not refuse, and so they repeated part of No. 5 in the second part.

During the whole evening the audience seemed to forget there was such a thing as weather. We are very sorry to hear that this is the last time the Club will appear. It seems that the "powers that be," with the advice of the musical instructor, have decided that the Club is detrimental to the interests of College music, and so have dissolved it.

The "Philharmonic" Problem.

The problem is, to organize some system, sure, efficient, permanent, whereby those who really love and thirst for great orchestral music, such as the Symphonies, the Overtures, &c., of Beethoven, of Mozart, of Mendelssohn, of any master who has power to interest us and inspire us as these do, may rely from year to year upon stated and sufficient supplies (concerts) of such music. The problem is, in short, the organization of the highest class of instrumental concerts, with a single view to true musical culture and the maintaining of a high standard of taste. ART, and not mere amusement, not material profit found in catering to amusement, is the main thing to be sought. A musical society, springing from this motive and with this end, is what has commonly been understood in older cities by the term "Philharmonic Society." It is a society which ministers to a true love of Music as an Art, by furnishing frequent opportunities of hearing and enjoying the best works of the great composers (not of course too narrowly restricting itself to these).

Now there are several methods by which we may get such concerts. One is to trust entirely to private enterprise, to managers and companies, who may come to us from abroad, or who may spring up at home, and who find their interest in catering to a manifest appetite in the community. Such appetite of course manifests itself in its readiness to patronize and pay for such things: and if the appetite be high, be classical, if classical music pay best, then classical music we shall have offered us on all sides by competing speculators in the article. This method we have tried abundantly; enough to know that it is exceedingly uncertain for all good purposes. They who speculate in concert-giving always seek to create a feverish and unwholesome appetite in the public. They care not for the kind of audience, they care only for the largest. Anxious to attract and please the many, they find they can afford, at least, for the time being, to overlook to a great degree the wishes of the real music lovers,—those on whom, in the long run, the entire support of music really depends. If they can get up an excitement now, and draw great audiences, and reap large profits, what care they if the fire burn over the soil and leave it dead and barren for some years to come! Much good music we do surely owe in Boston to these chance enterprises. But we cannot rely on them, amid the factitious and capricious tastes and preferences of a half musical or wholly unmusical public.

A second method is for the musicians who compose the orchestra, and who reside among us, to organize themselves into a society, (as they have just done), and manage the whole thing themselves for their own profit, as a matter of business, and for the artistic profit of the music-lovers so far as this may coincide with their own profit. There may be mingled with this business motive a great deal of the disinterested, higher motive, of love of Art for Art's sake, as there doubtless is in many of the musicians who have organized the "Boston Philharmonic Society." Of course, many of them, perhaps the most of them, are even more anxious to have such a union as a mutual guaranty of the artistic tone and character among themselves, than as a new means of professional employment. It depends upon the individuals composing it in the first place, and secondly upon the degree of interest and confidence their union can inspire among the real music-lovers, whether they can serve the true ends of a Philharmonic society. The plan is perfectly legitimate, even on the lowest ground of a mere business corporation; and we cannot deny that, from the higher view, there is much ground of confidence in many of the gentlemen who have formed the new society. But here lies the danger and the doubt: it is composed of and managed by the actual performers in the orchestra exclusively; it must embrace those who are available for actual service on the instruments required, whether the artistic spirit be strong in them or not; it is wholly and exclusively under the control of those who earn their livelihood by playing on orchestral instruments, and who unfortunately are so placed that they must look to every means of multiplying occupation for themselves. The majority of course govern. Where then is the guaranty that those members who have the real cause of Art at heart may not be at any time outvoted by those who only look to profit, and who play at "Philharmonic" concerts, just as they play in bands or theatres, merely by the hour for wages?

A third method (and this is what we had hoped would at least be tried, and what might still be tried without any interference with the other) is for those who really love and want classical orchestral music, to organize their want themselves, by forming some society in which music-lovers, amateurs, orchestral performers, and musical artists generally shall have a voice and influence, and so pledge themselves to its support. Let the musical taste of the community organize itself, as it were, into some permanent, effective system for the furtherance of its desires. To this end it would seem most natural, as a first step, after the thing has been sufficiently talked about in chance ways, here and there, in private, to have a meeting called, for conference, of the leading friends of music (of course we mean the lovers of orchestral music in the highest sense). Such a meeting should include the leading friends and patrons of such music; the persons of most taste, musical character and enthusiasm; such actual performers in orchestral concerts, as feel a paramount interest in music as an art, and not chiefly as a business; also amateur performers, who might be useful in the counsels, and perhaps even in the working rank and file of the orchestra; and above all, the leading musical artists in the city, whether engaged in orchestras or in other departments of the art. In a word, it should be a meeting of just those persons who constitute the musical character (in the best sense) of the city. A full and candid conference, or series of conferences of such a company—the more informal the better—would naturally lead to the appointment of a committee, in which all the above named classes should be represented, who should study the problem together in earnest, and report at an adjourned meeting the outlines of a plan of a Philharmonic Society, to be composed not merely of actual performers in the orchestra, but of those who have the cause of the best music most at heart, and who will pledge themselves to the work of securing both subscribing audience and orchestra year after year, upon a permanent system, which may grow in strength and efficiency as it goes on. This plan should not be adopted until after it has been thoroughly and critically canvassed. It will have the merit of placing both the artistic control and the pecuniary responsibility of the concerts in the hands of those who really want the concerts. The society, so organized, may either organize an orchestra of its own, from time to time or permanently, as shall seem most expedient; or it may employ any orchestra already in existence, such for instance as our musicians have been forming. But the control and the responsibility will rest with those who want the concerts, in other words with those who look to the artistic end, instead of with those who take it up in the routine of their own professional business.

Of course this is only hinting the initiatory steps, together with the spirit that should govern such a movement. The working details of the plan would soon suggest themselves.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The CORTESI Troupe brought its brief season to a close on Wednesday, with a benefit performance of Saffo, in which Mme. CORTESI took the part of Sappho, with Miss PHILLIPPS as Ismene and MUSIANI as Phaon. We were not present, and therefore had to lose the satisfaction of witnessing what the announcement styled the "greatest rôle of the greatest lyric tragedienne," as well as the rendition of the "famous ut-de-poitrine, which has seduced Musiani in the front rank of living tenors," and something tantamount to that. By the way, "Vanity Fair" has cleverly translated ut-de-poitrine (or Do-di-petto) into picture; we know not whether the hearing or the seeing gave us the most pleasure.

The audiences generally have been not large. FABBRI has gained in general esteem as really an admirable artist, of a truly lyric stamp. In her second performance, in Ernani, her very powerful voice appeared a little harder and less genial than in Nabucco; and it has been justly observed that her middle tones are weaker and of less positive character than her splendid, ringing highest tones and the solid, satisfactory tones in the contralto region. The middle register in fact betrays the German quality of the voice. Mme. Fabbri's first career was German, under her maiden name of Agnes Schmidt, and in the great German rôles, as Fidelio, Agatha, Iphigenia, as well as in Meyerbeer's operas. It is only within the last two years that she has sung in Italian. She is not, as we have said before, one of the most finished of mere singers; and on that account it rather pains us when she undertakes much ornamental or bravura work. Her trill, for instance, is rich, reedy, penetrating, birdlike, but not even, and she indulges in it too much. But she has the lyric fire, a true dramatic quality and power. Her Elvira was fine, but hardly as impressive as her Abigail. We thought, too, that she over-dressed the part. MUSIANI's tenor rang more powerfully than sweetly in the music of Ernani. SUSINI was as largely and musically sonorous in voice as he was dignified and grand in bearing, as the old Silva. The union of three principal voices of such extraordinary power was something rare; and accounted perhaps for the excessive loudness of the orchestra, wherever drums and trombones had a chance. It was an over-loud, otherwise an uncommonly good performance of Ernani as a whole. Sig. BARILI put more than usual vigor and expression into the part of Don Carlos, though his voice was hardly adequate.

We have not had the pleasure of hearing FREZZOLINI in either of the two parts she has taken here, Lucia and Gilda in Rigoletto. But on Saturday afternoon she sang, between the acts of Nabucco, the crazy scene: Qui la voce, from I Puritani, giving evidence of a voice of sweetest and most feeling quality and cultivated to a very high point of perfection; but style and feeling could not overcome the painful impression of the great labor with which the voice is now used. She must have been a very admirable singer, and there is lady-like refinement in her look and manner; but she lacks the strength and freshness now to make a positive impression. FABBRI was all herself again that afternoon as Abigail. On Tuesday evening she sang the Traviata, we are told, with great success. Mme. FABBRI is engaged by manager Ullman for his next Academy season, when we trust she may be heard in music better worth her talent than mere operas of Verdi.

Musical Chit-Chat.

The Maennerchor and young Maennerchor Societies of Philadelphia had a picnic and concert in the woods last Monday, at Hestonville. The music consisted of an overture by the Germania orchestra; choruses of priests from Zauberflöte; the Rienzi chorus by Wagner; part-songs by Kreutzer and others.... ULLMAN has engaged FABBRI, PATTI, BRIGNOLI, SUSINI, FERRI, for the next season. AMODIO goes to the Brazils.... The "infant musical phenomenon" of three years old, MARTHA STORY, of Essex, Mass., who plays more than fifty tunes, and does other extraordinary things, is about to give daily exhibitions next week in this city. This is done, we understand, to raise the means of giving her a musical education. See advertisement.

The report of RUBINSTEIN's death is contradicted.... Liszt is about to marry a Russian princess. "The German journals," says The Gazette Musicale, "announce the approaching marriage of Franz Liszt with the princess Wittgenstein. The dispensation so long expected has arrived from Rome. The ceremony will take place at Fulda, and will be performed by the Bishop."

Music Abroad.

Germany.

VIENNA.—The Musik-Zeitung sums up the musical performances of the whole season of 1859-60. As it may interest our readers to see how much and what music may be had in a German city in one season, we translate the article.

The concerts, public or semi-public, which have taken place during the past season, are:

5 Philharmonic Concerts; 4 of the Society of Friends of Music; 2 of the Singverein; 3 of the Sing-akademie; 2 (repeated) "Academies" of the Ton-künstler Society; 3 Concerts of the orchestral Euterpe; 3 private performances of the Orchestral Union of the Musical Association; 2 Concerts of the Männergesang and 2 of the Academie Gesang-verein (besides other such societies); 10 Quartet Concerts of Herr Holmesberger; 2 by Vieuxtemps; 4 Trio soirées of Herr Dunkl; 3 Quartet performances of Hr. Hoffmann, and 4 Soirées of Hr. Carl Debrois van Bruyck. Moreover, there have appeared, either independently or in other concerts: the violinists Vieuxtemps and Poznansky, the pianists Dreyschock, Carl Meyer, Freiber, Boscovitz, De Lange, Dachs, Epstein, Hans von Bülow; and the singers Herren E. v. Soupper, S. Marchesi, Stockhausen, besides many resident artists and dilettanti. Moreover the ladies: Clara Schumann, Fr. Suck, Fiby, J. von Asten, Th. Kress, H. Fritz, and others. As composers: Herren C. D. v. Bruyck, Mögele and F. Mair.

In these concerts the following works of importance were performed:

London.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.—The fourth concert of the season took place on Monday evening, "by command," and was honored by the presence of Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, the King of the Belgians, and the Princesses Alice and Helena. The royal party entered the Hanover Square Rooms shortly after eight o'clock, and the National Anthem was played by the band, both on the arrival and departure of the illustrious visitors. The programme, although it included two symphonies—namely, the so-called Italian of Mendelssohn, and the Eroica of Beethoven—(both finely executed under the able direction of Professor Bennett), was much shorter than usual, and included but one novelty, the first appearance at these time-honored concerts of Mlle. Ariôt, a young French singer of remarkable merit, possessing a very fine voice, and much musical feeling of the best kind. Mlle. Ariôt sang the intensely dramatic "Ah mon fils" of Meyerbeer, and the divine air "Doh vien non tardar," from Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, and in both instances met with well-merited success. The other pieces in the programme were the fine overtures to the Ruler of the Spirits and Ruy Blas, to each of which ample justice was done by the unsurpassable band of the Philharmonic Society. The Rooms were crowded.—Mus. World, June 9.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The programme of the twenty-fourth concert, last Monday, was selected from the works of various masters. The instrumental pieces were; quartet in G major (Op. 61) Dussek; Sonata Appassionata, Beethoven; quartet in E minor (Op. 44), Mendelssohn; a trio in F (No. 2), Spohr. Of these Mendelssohn's magnificent quartet—introduced by general desire—created the greatest effect. Dussek's quartet was played for the first time at the Monday Popular Concerts, and was quite as successful as its companion in E flat, introduced by the directors on a previous occasion. The one in B flat (No. 2) will doubtless come next; and this will exhaust the string-quartet repertory of this master. Herr Lubeck was recalled after the sonata of Beethoven, which he played in his accustomed style. The players in the quartets were M. Sainton, Herr Goffrie, Mr. Doyle, and Signor Piatti, whose performance in both instances merit the highest praise. Spohr's trio did not go well. The singers were Mlle. Jenny Meyer (who has a lovely mezzo-soprano), encored in Gluck's "Che farò," which, as also Schubert's "Ungeduld," she sang with the utmost purity of expression; Herr Hermanns, a young German singer, with a superb bass-voice and great declamatory power, who was encored in two songs "An dem Sturm," (Carl Evers), and "Falstaff's song" (from Otto Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor) for which he substituted "In diesen heiligen Hallen" (Die Zauberflöte); and last not least Mr. Sims Reeves, who was encored in Mr. Howard Glover's exquisitely beautiful setting of Shelley's "I arise from dreams of thee," and in Rossini's "Gita in Gondola" (soirées), accepting the compliment in the first instance and courteously declining it in the last, both songs being given to perfection. Mr. Benedict accompanied the vocal music with masterly skill. Although this was the twenty-fourth concert, of the second season, St. James's Hall was crowded in every part. And yet some will insist that "the people" don't like good music.—Ibid.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—By far the finest performance of Mendelssohn's Elijah that has been heard for a long time was given last week at Exeter Hall, before one of the most densely crowded audiences we remember. Indeed so great was the demand for places that the Society have found it advisable to announce a repetition of the oratorio, although this was intended to be the last of the season, and Elijah will consequently be heard again on Friday, the 25th instant. Lateley we had occasion to comment on its performance, by 3000 performers, at the Crystal Palace, when, owing to acoustic difficulties, impossible to overcome, much of the effect was lost. At Exeter Hall, however, it is a different thing; the 700 are quite sufficient (more than sufficient as far as the brass is concerned) to carry out the intentions of the composer, and every note is distinctly heard, not only of the vocal, but the instrumental parts, which is absolutely necessary to a proper understanding of the work. The principal soloists were Miss Parepa, Mad. Sainton-Dolby, Miss Palmer, Mrs. F. Lucas, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Santley, and Patey.—Ibid.

THE CHARITY SCHOOLS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The entertainment given on Wednesday by the children of the Metropolitan Charity Schools, was partly in consequence of the Annual Meeting at St. Paul's Cathedral being prevented taking place this year on account of the repairs being made in the interior of the building, and partly because the friends of the children were desirous to give them a holiday, and repeat the festivals of 1858-9, which were found so eminently successful. No less than forty-six schools sent their juvenile choirs, and the whole force amounted to nearly 4000. Mr. G. W. Martin, to whose beat the children are familiar (and who has succeeded to the position vacated by Mr. Bates), conducted; Mr. James Coward presided at the organ; Mr. T. Harper was first trumpet; while, to strengthen the accompaniments (which some of the pieces in the programme required), there were a second trumpet, two horns, four trombones, and the gigantic drum played by Mr. Chipp. The following was the selection: "The Old Hundred Psalm": Chorus, "Lord of Heaven and Earth" (Haydn); Chorale, "Come sound his praise abroad" (G. W. Martin); Chant, "O sing unto the Lord"; Chorale, "Martin Luther's Hymn"; "Hosanna," for three trebles (G. W. Martin); "God and King of Jacob's nation" (Costa); Chorale, "God that madest earth and heaven" (T. B. Southgate); Psalm, "O praise ye the Lord"; Chorale from St. Paul, "Sleepers awake" (Mendelssohn); and "God save the Queen." The performance on the whole was most admirable, more especially in the unison pieces, in which the singers felt no timidity, and sang with their hearts as well as their voices. There were three encores, the Chorale, "Come, sound his praise abroad," the "Hosanna" for three trebles (both by Mr. Martin), and the Chorale from St. Paul, "Sleepers awake." At the end of the Concert, when the National Anthem had been sung, there was a tremendous demonstration on the part of the singers as well as the audience. First the audience clapped their hands sore, and then the children roared themselves hoarse, and then both joined issue and screamed and applauded in unison, until fairly wearied, the juveniles holding out the longest. At last the schools retired from the orchestra in military order, and were soon seen swarming over the terraces and walks, where the Upper Fountains were made to play for their gratification; and here we must leave them, having no doubt that they enjoyed themselves heartily, and went home happier than princes, potentates, or members of the House of Commons.—Ibid.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The sound of harps. (Il suon dell'arpe. Duet.

"I Martiri." 35

Celebrated Duet for Soprano and Tenor in the last act of this now standard opera. Piccolomini, in this duet, achieved one of her finest triumphs as a singer and an actress. The melody is the one most easily recalled from the gems of the opera. The voices do not range high.

O keep me in your memory. Ballad. S. Glover. 25

Easy and pleasing parlor ballad.

Each morn in life, or the Maiden's Prayer. Ballad. Badarzewska. 25

Adapted to a melody in the instrumental piece of the same name, with which just now all pianos resound. It makes a very pretty and taking song and will have a great sale.

Instrumental Music.

Marche du Vainqueur. Jacques Blumenthal. 50

Whoever knows Blumenthal's fine "Marche des Croates" and "March militaire"—and who has not at least heard of them—will expect something unusually fine under this title. Nor will he be disappointed. It is a noble march, full of manly joy in its remarkable melodies, and with a sombre religious strain in commemoration of the slain, for its trio.

Gems of Verdi's Operas for Young Players.

Each number, Rimbault. 15

A capital polka, dedicated to the Republican nominees.

Books.

THE OPERA OF DON GIOVANNI, by Mozart. Complete, with Italian and English words. Bound uniform with Ditson's Series of Standard Operas. 3,00

This forms the ninth volume of this Edition, unsurpassed in clearness of type, beauty of appearance, general correctness and cheapness by any other. This edition of Don Giovanni contains all the recitatives which are usually omitted in German and French editions, a history of the Opera down to the present time, the entire Libretto or Text in condensed form, and a thematic index. The instruments to which the accompaniment is entrusted in the Orchestra are indicated in the Pianoforte Score. This volume contains 407 pages, which is more than double the amount of any other number of the series; yet is sold at the same price.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Summer Shower.

BY T. BUCHANAN READ.

Before the stout harvesters falleth the grain,
As when the strong storm-wind is reaping the plain
And loiters the boy in the briery lane;
But yonder aslant comes the silvery rain,
Like a long line of spears, brightly burnished and tall.

Adown the white highway, like cavalry fleet,
It dashes the dust with its numberless feet.
Like a murmurless school, in their leafy retreat,
The wild birds sit listening the drops round them beat;
And the boy crouches close to the blackberry wall.

The swallows alone take the storm on its wing,
And, taunting the tree sheltered laborers, sing,
Like pebbles the rain breaks the face of the spring,
While a bubble darts up from each widening ring;
And the boy, in dismay, hears the loud shower fall.

But soon are the harvesters tossing the sheaves;
The robin darts out from his hower of leaves;
The wren peereth forth from the moss-covered eaves
And the rain-spatter'd urchin now gladly perceives
That the beautiful bow bendeth over them all.

A Musical Sketch of the Days of '76.

Poptown, July 4, 1860.

[To JOHN S. DWIGHT, Esq.,—

Dear Sir,—On this sacred day—the anniversary of the birthday of our glorious and blessed nation—I am moved to send you a sketch appropriate to the occasion, which for reasons hereafter given has lain for some time in my desk, and which requires a word or two of introduction or preface.

One of the principal ornaments of the literary society of this place, where it has pleased Providence to cast my lines, as a dispenser of the Word and a fisher of men, is a young lady, first assistant in our high school—of great talents and virtues, and of the Methodist persuasion. Of the writers for the Evening Budget, which is read at the meeting of the "Social Lyceum," none is more sure to meet with profound attention, elicit hearty applause and be afterwards the subject of sincere commendation than she. Her name is Elizabeth Polky—but we all know her as Miss Lizzy Polky—indeed her pieces are signed "Lizzy." Formerly most of her communications were poetical, but during the past winter, she has neglected the poetic muse, giving us however an ample compensation in a series of tales and sketches founded upon incidents in the history of our glorious Republic.

True, in these she sometimes departs from the literal truth of history, but as you well observe in a recent number of your valuable journal, "it is understood that they are fancy pieces, and hence no one will look to them for biographical (historical) authority." Equally well do you say, "nor is literal truth of history always essential to that more inward moral truth, the truth of mind and character, which may be conveyed through an imaginary picture or tissue of incidents and conversations," wherein you have expressed my own opinion exactly.

I have for some time been desirous of aiding Miss Polky to find a publisher for a volume of these tales and sketches, but have been discouraged from taking any active steps by the ineffable stupidity of the publishers, as shown in their want of appreciation of the volume of sacred poetry, concerning which I wrote under date of Feb. 28, 1859. Can you credit the fact that not an application has been made to me for our manuscript hymns arranged from the great poets! Consequently the church is deprived of their use, and deacon Malachi has sold his sorrel colt to a racing sinner on Long Island. (It is a gratifying circumstance to me that the nag has approved my judgment in horseflesh, by taking the cup at the last meeting on the Long Island course.)

However, my regard for Miss Polky and my earnest desire that her talents should be known to and appreciated by an enlightened public, induces me to swallow my own disappointment, and send you as a proof or sample of what she can do, a sketch read by her with unbounded applause in the Evening Budget, of Feb. 27th, for insertion in your paper. For my own part I consider it equal to any of those with which you have lately favored us, translated from the German, besides having the advantage of being national in subject, patriotic in spirit, and American in sentiment. In which Mr. Esel fully concurs.

In the hope, sir, that you will not refuse this sketch a place in your columns,

I remain with all respect your servant,

HABAKUK LOT,

Pastor at Poptown.]

SCENE I.

In the uncommonly fine month of June, 1776, between five and six in the afternoon, a man might have been seen walking up and down the broad and beautiful lawn in front of a handsome but modest house, with a long and deep verandah. This lonely promenader walked on slowly, proudly and securely—at all events no danger was apparent—occasionally raising his eyes to drink in the glorious view of the broad and placid bosom of the Potomac, which lay before him, but mostly with his glance turned earthwards, and his hands crossed behind him. A wig, with a broad military cocked hat, partly concealed his thoughtful forehead. No one could have passed him by unmarked; the stamp of the extraordinary was visibly imprinted on his brow; the power of genius drew a glory around his bended head, his wig and his cocked hat. At times the proud look gave way to one of anxiety; but the strong, firm, steady martial tread belied the expression of his features—that is at these exceptional moments. At the upper end of his promenade, where, as he paced back and forth, he drew near the house, the little negroes would stop their fun and frolic, the old ones respectfully take off their remnants of hats, until the back of the master was again turned.

At this precise moment, the hearts of all America felt a most intense interest in this venerated apparition—which had become a solidity of bone and muscle, that might seem to render this term somewhat inappropriate. The Continental Congress, under the head of John Adams, who according to his rival Jefferson, was the Atlas of the Revolution, and to the great disappointment of Hancock, had a few days before elected this man to the awfully responsible station of commander in chief of the armies raised and to be raised for the great struggle with the mother country. And now Washington had come home once more to his beloved Mt. Vernon, to arrange his private affairs, before departing to Cambridge and Boston in Massachusetts, upon a mission, which was to detain him, he knew not how long—perhaps forever! This might be his last view of his glorious Potomac. Never more might he behold the sun sending his pointed rays from the heights of the Blue ridge ascend over hill and valley, forest and meadow and the river's bright bosom. He had "passed the ruby corn," as the village gamblers express it, when trusting their all to the chances of the red and white kernels of maize, and it was darkly hidden in the womb of the future, whether he was to be hung in chains and go down in history as the rebel, or was to return triumphant, and after ages place under his portrait the legend "Peter Patrie."

And now all his domestic arrangements were made. "On the morrow," said he to himself when

"envious streaks

Do lace the severing clouds in yonder East,
Night's candles are burnt out and jocund day
Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain tops,
I must be gone."

What emotions swelled that manly breast, who can tell!

It was now near sunset, and as he again drew near the house he called his favorite servant Tom. "Tom," said he arousing himself with an effort from the thoughts which had oppressed him, and drawing himself up to his full, majestic height; "Tom, we must be early away to-morrow morning. Call the people from the fields. I would fain see them once more together, speak a few parting words, and give them my patriarchal blessing." In half an hour all were assembled upon the lawn, neatly dressed and faces shining with soap and water,—all, from the aged man, who now lived upon his master's bounty, whose only labor was the amusement of cultivating his own little garden, down to the boy who lay in the sun and played with his comrades the live long day; from old Joyce Heth resplendent in a bright bandanna turban—she who had nursed the master in infancy and now lived the imperious and haughty old mammy of the estate, down to the little black girl, who played baby with a corn-cob, on which some benevolent nigger had marked a face like his own with charcoal.

All were there.

I shall not undertake to describe the interview between Master and people; there are scenes in which the tender sentiments conquer the sterner qualities of the man; when the hero becomes a child again. Such scenes are sacred!

Tears flowed in the verandah where Madame Washington and the Custis children, with a few friends from neighboring plantations were assembled. Tears flowed on the lawn, where the people stood and heard the words of their beloved Master. Those words were few, but they came from the heart and went to the heart.

"And now," said he at last, "enjoy yourselves this last evening, and let me during these remaining hours be surrounded by none but happy faces." There was a joyous shout at these words, Harry the musician produced his fiddle, and with that changeableness of temperament so characteristic of the negro, of children, indeed of all, who live without ease and anxiety for the morrow, in a moment every tear was dry, shouts of laughter arose on the soft evening air, and the light fantastic toe was tripping it in the mazes of the merry dance.

[I think this is a very happy passage.—H. L.]

But the joy rose still higher, when the Master snatching the instrument from Harry's hands, played as no other on the plantation could, one of the contra dances then en vogue; and reached its acme, when returning the fiddle to Harry, he seized the hand of his wife, and they too with friends and children stepped upon the lawn, and trod a measure to the sound of the music. But among these dances was more of sadness than hilarity. They felt it to be for the last time!

SCENE II.

The scene changes to Cambridge, in autumn, where, at the same hour of the afternoon, the tall form which we saw pacing the lawn at Mt. Vernon, may be seen walking up and down that part of the Mt. Auburn road included between the Craigie and the Lowell places. He comes neither earlier nor later; always at the same hour, after dinner; neither heat nor rain causes him to accelerate his pace.

On the particular afternoon to which we now refer, he might have been seen often looking at his watch and timing his steps so as to be at the Craigie house, his head-quarters, at a particular moment. As he now drew near the gate, he looked keenly down the road towards the Colleges, with the expression of one who is expecting a visitor. Seeing no one he drew his watch again from the deep fob in his knee breeches, and glancing at it remarked "still two minutes to the time."

[A characteristic touch this, for Washington was remarkable for punctuality.—H. L.]

Even as he spoke a lame man came in sight turning the angle in the road a few rods below the Vassal place. He too had drawn his poor, old pinchbeck watch from the fob, and seeing that he had a minute or two to spare, relaxed his pace, but looking up and seeing the "venerated apparition" of the commander in chief, he hastened forward. As he approached, the General noted that, though a man in the prime of life, fate and fortune seemed to have used him hardly. Besides his lameness, one arm was nearly useless and one eye was forever darkened. His iron-buckled shoes were shabby; his stockings much darned; his knee breeches had cheap buckles, not mates, and were clearly the worse for long hard usage; the coat had become one of many colors; the wig had lost its curl, and the cocked hat upon it, (to quote the antique and horrible conceit of the great Jo,) was rather a specimen of hard-wear than of dry goods. And now he stood before the commander in chief with his hat in his hand, veneration and awe marking the expression of his one eye.

["Marking the expression"—a finely turned phrase!—H. L.]

"You are the man I expect at this hour?"

"Yes, your excellency."

"And your name is —?"

"William Billings, at your Excellency's service."

"Come in with me Mr. Billings, you are the man."

The tall form of the Generalissimo, accompanied by the halting steps of Billings, might now have been seen—perhaps was indeed—moving up the gravel walk shaded by those elms, then young, which a few years ago in their age became food for worms—as we also must in turn—entering the broad portal of the house, where Tom relieved his revered Master of his hat, cane and sword, up the broad stairs where the old clock stood ticking

"Never, forever—Forever, never,"

and so into the private room of the commander. Giving Tom orders to allow no intrusion upon him, upon any less occasion than an attack by the redcoats upon the American lines, he motioned the composer—for every reader must have recognized in this Billings, the great American contemporary of Mozart, Haydn, Gluck and Beethoven—who stood trembling with the excitement of a private interview with the godlike hero—to take a chair, who, not more by his position, than by the dignity and nobleness of his union, impressed every one with a sense of "such divinity [as] doth hedge a king"— to be seated.

[How eloquent is this!—H. L.]

After a moment of pause the General began.

"I learn Mr. Billings that the army is indebted to you for both the words and the fiery music of that favorite canticle,

"Let tyrants' shake their iron rod
And slavery clank her galling chains"—

"Me," interrupted Billings,—

"We fear them not, we trust in God!
New England's God forever reigns!"

Yes, your Excellency, that is mine, both words and music and so is the new anthem. "By the rivers of Watertown, there we sat down, we wept when we remembered, thee oh, Boston!"

The grave features of the commander in chief relaxed into a smile at the composer's enthusiasm, and he continued:—

"It is recorded in history, Mr. Billings, that a great man once observed, 'another might make the laws of a people, if to him was left the composition of their songs and ballads.' In our day the laws have a greater relative importance, but the song has not lost its power. Your own patriotic hymns and anthems are doing a great work in keeping alive the right spirit."

Billings's eye gleamed and his face flushed with pleasure at this encomium from the great Virginian.

"I observed," continued the General, "during the campaigns of Frederick of Prussia, where I studied the art of war in my younger days—this sword was presented to me by him after the battle of Kunersdorf—how important an effect was produced upon the common soldiers, in raising their courage almost to enthusiasm, when the bands struck up their national Dessauer March, and the charge was sounded. We need something of the kind. For my own part, I think the best thing for our purpose would be a tune of a lively character and striking rhythm, which would serve both as a song for the men to sing and as a march for our fifes and drums—something like the "Malbrook" of the French. Now, speaking in confidence, uttering which words, he gave Billings a look that showed how dangerous it would be to trifle with this confidence, "I know the charms of music, and many a lonely hour have I beguiled with the wild strains of my violin."

"Oh, God bless your excellency," cried Billings, "if our New England folks could only know that, they would love you as they now respect and venerate you!"

[Another touch of true nature! For may we not read Shakspeare thus and say,

"One touch of music, makes the whole world kin"—H. L.]

"No," said the great man with a half-suppressed sigh, "this must not be. In foreign lands none too high to love and study art. How often did King Frederick, spend an hour or two at head-quarters, after the day's march, with his Capellmeister in playing the flute. And how this raised him in the affections of men! But in our land it is different, and were it known that I am in my small way a musician, no one would believe that I am capable of aught else."

"Too true," said Billings sadly, "they call me a vagabond because I devote my life to art!"

"Mr. Billings," and a half indignant, half contemptuous look accompanied the General's words, "do you know the verses made by one of the British generals about us?"

"Yes indeed," replied Billings, indignation burning in his eye and cheeks, "and there is not a man in the army, who would not be glad to thrust them down the throat of the man, who made them at the point of his ramrod, especially one verse."

"And that is?"

"That about your Excellency,

'And there was Cap'n Washington
With gentlefolks about him,
They say he's grown so 'tarnal proud
He will not ride without 'em.'"

"Ah the people are angry at this, are they?"

"Yes, your Excellency; it has been the common talk all through camp. True, I can't be any thing with my poor, battered body but a baggage wagon driver, but my music enables me to know everybody even if we whigs were not all one as good as another. And I can tell your Excellency, the men, if you would only lead them into Boston at the point of the bayonet, would show them that when 'Yankee Doodle' comes to town, John Bull will have to evacuate to 'Chevy Chase.'"

"Perhaps a time may come," said the General, smiling at this display of zeal, "meantime we can be preparing for such an event, and one preparation, Mr. Billings, is a tune to those words!"

"A tune to those words," cried Billings aghast—a tune to those words!"

"Certainly. They are written to burlesque and ridicule us. Many a man is impassible to all else, but the fear of ridicule, or the desire of revenge upon one who has made him a laughing-stock will carry him to the cannon's mouth. It is human nature, Mr. Billings.

"So it is," replied Billings, with that illumination of face, which shows the instant comprehension of a new and valuable idea, "you are a great man. I see, give the men a tune to which they can sing those words and they would march against all the redcoats in creation, if only to sing Yankee Doodle in their faces. By the hoky!" added he in his enthusiasm, forgetting in whose presence he was, and springing from his chair, "if we could beat the British twice on Breed's hill with nothing but duty before us, what couldn't we do, if we at the same time were scoring the Yankee Doodle account on their hides."

And here, as well as his lame leg would allow, Billings marched across the chamber, his eye blazing like that of a hero. But catching a sight of the smile on the face of the General, he was recalled to himself, and blushing with confusion he again seated himself, quite out of countenance, at the lengths to which his zeal had carried him.

"Never mind, Mr. Billings, your zeal is as honorable to you as was that of Corporal Trim to him."

"And who was he, your Excellency?"

"A celebrated English soldier, though only a corporal. But to our business."

"What sort of a tune would your Excellency like?"

"I think," said the General, humming a lively strain, "that something of this kind would be appropriate."

Billings' quick ear caught it instantly, and begging to be excused a moment, he drew a piece of coarse music paper from his pocket and went to the window, where he stood a few minutes, looking out over plain and river to the range of hills then covered with forests, from Corey's in Brookline round to what is now Mt. Auburn, and all now lighted up by the slant rays of the setting sun.

And now he began to write. A moment more and that wondrous inspiration, which was, before a century had passed away, to be known through out Europe as the then national air of the then not existing United States of America, was noted down in the enlivening key of si be mol! Returning to his seat he sang a stanza or two in a full manly voice, of the well known

"Father and I went down to camp"

the Father of his country beating time and humming a passage occasionally.

"That is excellent, Mr. Billings," said the general, "you have caught my idea perfectly. I am greatly pleased with it, and only wish it was in my power to reward you adequately."

"Reward!" exclaimed Billings, half indignantly, "Yankee as I am I should spurn any other reward on such an occasion than the approbation of Your Excellency, and of my own conscience. Is it not my slight offering for the cause for which you offer and risk everything? No, God forbid!"

[I had the honor of suggesting this stroke to Miss Polky, for I thought none had done justice to the sweet singer of the days of seventy-six.—H. L.]

"And now, Mr. Billings, one thing more. Suppose a time should come, when we should meet the enemy in the field and victory should perch herself upon the pine trees of your New England banners, would not the first impulse of every true American heart be to give the glory to the higher power which guides and directs the affairs of men?"

"Yes, after your Excellency," said Billings.

"Mr. Billings," said the General, with some sternness, "I can allow no such remarks, I am but an instrument."

"True, though, any way," muttered Billings.

"Now, picture to yourself" continued the other, not noticing the interruption, "that moment. The enemy fly—the field is ours—and after the pursuit the army is drawn up into close array, and the voices of the chaplains are heard giving thanks to the Most High. In foreign lands grand Te Deums are sung in honor of victories. We want a Te Deum, but one which is simple, yet noble and majestic, which all who can sing at all can execute, which shall be a universal popular melody, and go down to future generations wedded to the words of our long metre doxologies, such as,

"From all that dwell below the skies"

"Be thou, O God, exalted high."

I desire you to give wing to your imagination fancy yourself on the victorious field, and under such inspiration compose such a tune. Should you succeed to my satisfaction, of which I have no doubt, that shall be our Te Deum. Be in no hurry. Let the tune come from the heart and it will reach the heart."

After some minutes of silence Billings said, "But how to make these tunes known through all the army is the question."

"I have thought of that," replied the General, "You must select a few men from all the various regiments, who have good ears and voices, say to the number of a hundred, and having taught them, they in turn must be the teachers of others. Those whom you select shall be free from all other duty whenever you require their presence."

SCENE III.

Day is just beginning to break, but a thick fog buries city, village, plain, river and harbor in impenetrable darkness. Silently the American troops are concentrating in large bodies, at the extremities of Boston and Charlestown Necks, of the Milldam and the Cambridges. [This is a rather strong anachronism, I must allow, since the bridges were not built until some years later. But as they are necessary to the finale, and Miss Polky is not writing history, I think we may let them stand.—H. L.] Putnam and Prescott, Ward and Heath, Dearborn and Hull, all are passing along the columns under their charge, encouraging their men and telling them to put their trust in Providence, and especially in their bayonets and in Washington. They remind them of Breed's hill; of Lexington and Concord; of the sufferings of the poor people of Boston; of the glorious hopes of the future if they now are strong and of good courage; of the Declaration of Independence, and the pledges given to support that document. The emulation of each division is excited to outdo the others. No man in the army, who cannot picture to himself the broad pastures and fields, which at that time crossed the western slopes of the hills at the foot of which, on the other side, the town of Boston was built, and who does not see with his mind's eye, the fortified top of Beacon Hill, and the British Cross and Lion floating in the breeze above it. To this point, every column must urge its way, and the glory will be to that division which shall cause that proud flag to stoop. In all silence the attacking columns are to advance, and not until the command is given are the fifes and drums to strike up their music; and an order has been given that at this command, the new tune to the British doggerel, now familiar to every man in the army, shall be the only one played.

And now all is ready. A rocket is seen on a distant hill in Roxbury, and a moment afterward the boom of cannon is heard from Dorchester heights, and a heavy ball crashes into the decks of a British vessel of war in the harbor. This is the signal for the onset. In Boston all is in consternation. Before the redcoats can form in battle array, the American troops are pouring out of boats, which have been silently borne by the tide across the river, under cover of the fog, are rushing across the bridges, and carrying the forts and batteries of their enemies. There was no resisting the impetuous onset. A hundred fifes with their shrill voices were heard in all directions in the thickness of the darkness, playing the exciting melody of "Yankee Doodle," and keeping step to its inspiring strains, the sturdy farmers and mechanics of the American army rushed upon their foes like the veterans of the Prussian king.

Consternation seized the redcoats. They remembered Breed's hill, and fled for refuge to the town, in whose narrow streets they were brought by their officers to a stand. The crown of Beacon hill had carried and when the sun had dissipated the mists and the landbreeze had cleared away the smoke of the fight, Washington was already there, calmly surveying the scene. The British general had stationed himself upon the top of Fort Hill, and was examining the condition of affairs with a critical and gloomy eye. The cannon still boomed upon the heights of Dorchester and the position of the English fleet was evidently untenable. Howe and Burgoyne were in deep consultation. The two armies had rested from their fearful occupation and stood face to face, the Americans having the advantage of being above and looking down upon their enemies, the latter that of being defended by the buildings and streets of the town. To dislodge the enemy the American commander saw would involve the destruction of the town. To fight with the Americans the British generals saw would involve the destruction or the departure of their fleet, so securely had the New England men intrenched themselves upon the heights of Dorchester, whence every shot told upon the ships in the inner harbor.

"Burgoyne," said Howe, "this is a bad business! Your Yankee Doodles and Cap'n Washington have most decidedly come to town!"

"Yes, Howe, and in a way I never dreamed of; the rascals have made a tune to those words, and march to it like so many demons. It is what I call a decisive demon-stration."

"How can you be jesting and punning at such a moment," said Howe, sternly.

"I should rejoice with an exceeding great joy, if I knew what else under Heaven there is for me to do just at this moment," said Burgoyne, bitterly.

Howe wrote a few words and calling his aid de camp sent him with all the speed his horse could make, with the white flag in his hand, across the hollow to the height of Beacon, where Washington was deep in consultation with his chiefs as to the best steps now to be taken. The British army was in his power, but only as it seemed at the sacrifice of the town. On the other hand, how his raw and undisciplined troops, who, under cover of the fog and darkness, had surprised and driven the enemy into the streets of the town, would behave in such a conflict as would follow an attack upon the British troops in the light of the bright sun; this was a question of deep import and difficulty.

Howe's messenger now approached and presented a note addressed to "G. Washington, Esq."

The General instantly returned it. "Go tell your masters," said he, "this is no moment to insult a victorious general. I will permit one half hour of truce. If in that half hour a shot be fired, a dwelling be set on fire, we be to you."

The messenger, who had approached with a cavalier air, turned pale at the voice and manner in which the American spoke. He was awed before this Republican as an Englishman usually is only in the presence of a member of his royal family. Before the half hour had passed he came with quite another air and with due respect delivered the note now addressed to "His Excellency, General Washington, Commander-in-chief of the Forces of the United Colonies." The note contained an offer on the part of the British Generals to evacuate the town, immediately, without damage to person or property, providing they were allowed to do so unmolested and take all stores and munitions of war save those won by the American army in course of the morning; but declaring their determination in case these terms were not allowed to sell their lives as dearly as possible amid the ruins of Boston.

The offer was of course satisfactory to the American chiefs. The signal was given to the forts on Dorchester heights to suspend all firing; while on the British side the embarkation began immediately.

The sun set on that day upon an extraordinary scene. Ten thousand American troops stood, around the lone height on Boston Common, soon to bear the bronze statue of Washington on his noble charger, while from its top the venerable pastor of the Old South Church, so long used as riding school by the British cavalry (the church, not the Pastor) poured forth in chosen language, mostly from sacred writ, in prayer, their thanks for the victory of the day.

Then arose on the calm evening air from all that multitude in a mighty chorus to the grand strains composed since the interview at the Craigie house, in that grand and majestic key of la,—those strains, which so long as our country lasts, will be known in memory of Billings and his century of singers as the psalm tune of the Old Hundred!

"From all that dwell below the skies"

Madame Clara Novello.

Madame Clara Novello made her theatrical debut at Padua, and chose the character of Semiramide for the occasion. Her success was complete, and this even increased as the experience she gained in her after engagements gave her greater familiarity with the special requirements of the stage. She appeared, in course of time, at Rome, Bologna, Fermo, Milan, and other places. Triumph walked in her footsteps, and the rich Italian language was almost exhausted in epithets of admiration, and taxed to the utmost of its sweetness to furnish poems in her praise. The Musical Antiquarian Society, established in London for the resuscitation of the works of early English composers, was at this time actively carrying on its operations, and, as a means to its end, collecting a library of works that might illustrate its purpose. It may or may not prove Mad. Novello's Italian popularity, to state, that her father contributed towards the accumulations of this institution a very extensive series of the laudatory verses addressed to his daughter, enjoining that, in case of the dissolution of the society, the entire collection should be transferred to the library of the British Museum, where the poems were accordingly deposited when the Musical Antiquarian was broken up, and where they will for all time be open to the examination of whomsoever may be interested in them.

The public performance in Paris of Rossini's Stabat Mater, some ten years or more after the production of his last opera, gave a new impetus to the universal esteem of this composer, and added a fresh laurel to his evergreen crown. The work was immediately transplanted to London, and reproduced in every musical city in Europe. It was first heard in Italy, at a performance in Bologna, where Rossini then resided, who was consulted upon every arrangement for the occasion. Donizetti was the conductor, than whom no one then living could more completely identify himself with the true spirit of the composer; and, by Rossini's expressed stipulation, Mad. Novello was preferred above all the singers in Italy to sustain the soprano solo; and the grand vocal effects of the famous "Inflammatus" were thus first made known to the countrymen of the composer through the medium of her beautiful voice. When the Stabat was given in Florence a year afterwards, the same lady again, by the composer's desire, was engaged to fill the same part in the performance.

In Italy all theatrical engagements are effected by means of correspondents,—agents whose entire occupation is to negotiate the arrangements between the impressario and the composers, the singers, the players, and every other functionary of the operatic establishment, which holds so important a place in public consideration and exacts so large a share of government attention, that it may almost be regarded as one of the chief political institutions of the country. Through some mistake of the correspondenti—mistakes will happen, even in the transactions of the most trusted officials—Mad. Novello was engaged for the carnival season of 1842, at both Rome and Genoa, and the director of each theatre demanded the fulfilment of the scrittura. Universal as we may esteem the talent of the lady, the person of the prima donna was certainly not ubiquitous, and the possibility of her completing the two discrepant contracts was consequently non-existent. The Roman and Genoese manager had each the law in his favor—alas that jurisprudence should be so imprudent as to see a parity of right on each side of a dispute—but the impressario of the Papal States had more than the law, in having possession, which constitutes the nine points that supercede all the others. In the autumn season of 1841, Mad. Novello was the prima donna at Fermo, a city, as is well known to all familiar with Romagnian topography, that is located within the papal territory, and consequently under the jurisdiction of the Roman authorities. She could not quit the place without a passport, which document he of the opera house at Rome had the power to prevent her obtaining, and he thus held the lady in such firm possession as would effectively hinder her from appearing at the other theatre, if it did not compel her to sing at his own. The minister of police at Fermo, Count Gigliucci, communicated to the cantratrice the restraint imposed upon her by the Roman manager, whereof he, the count, was the unhappy instrument; and communicated, too, that he was under the sad necessity of placing the lady under arrest until she should have made arrangements satisfactory to the impressario, whose interests he protected. The courteous captor became in turn a captive, his captivity being effected by the personal charms of the fair prisoner whose person he held in durance, and he did not release her from her thralldom until she had vowed to bind herself to him for ever. Her hymeneal engagement, however, was not to interfere with the two theatrical concerts which then perplexed her, nor with subsequent professional duties to which she had already pledged herself; but it was to be discharged when she had freed herself, by fulfilment, from all the legal demands upon her talent at that time pending. The first of these was, of course, that which was the subject of the Romano-Genoese controversy, and was the immediate occasion, therefore, of her connection with her future husband. The said controversy was finally settled by arbitration, to the following effect:—It is permitted to the flock of the pope to eat flesh and to hear operas for the entire period intervening between the Feast of the Nativity and the solemn term of Lent, and the carnival season of 1842 was thus to extend over twelve weeks, for six of which, dominion over the vocal and histrionic powers of the songstress was adjudicated to the manager of Rome, and for the other half moiety, the same advantage was ceded to him of Genoa.

One of the engagements that Mad. Novello had upon her hands was to Mr. Macready, who was then conducting Drury Lane theatre upon a principle of truly poetic purity, which has vainly been emulated by subsequent directors of dramatic taste in London. Mr. Serle, the actor and dramatist, and the husband of Mad. Novello's retired sister, was the chief confidant of all the arrangements of the great manager, and it was to his suggestion that the London public owed the opportunity Mr. Macready afforded them of witnessing the lady's talent in a capacity in which she had not yet appeared in her native country. Her debut on the stage in England was in the summer of 1842, and she chose Paccini's opera of Saffo for the display of her ability,—a work, however, which was far better fitted to exercise the refined classic taste of the director of the theatre in the arrangements of the mise-en-scène, than to place the artistic talent of the prima donna in an interesting light before the public. Her brother-in-law translated the libretto, and everything that could possibly be accomplished to give good effect to the performance was done; but nothing could render a weak opera of a weak composer an interesting work, and the error of judgment in choosing such a piece for her appearance was not a little injurious to our heroine's first impression on the London playgoers. In the repertory of Drury Lane theatre was Handel's Acis and Galatea, the production of which, with Mr. Stanfield's scenery and Mr. T. Cooke's instrumentation, was one of the most remarkable events of Mr. Macready's management—nay, of modern theatrical history. On the withdrawal of Saffo, Mad. Novello sang the chief character in this immortal work, and produced an effect in it which was impossible to her in the feeble music of the modern Italian composer.

She sang that year at our provincial music meetings; and then, without a formal farewell of the public, she retired from the field of her constantly fortunate efforts, and became the Countess Gigliucci. The historian may not pry into the incidents of her private life, and there occurs, therefore, a necessary hiatus in the current of our narrative, which cannot be resumed until the period when Mad. Novello returned to the exercise of her profession.—London Musical World.

Italian Conservatories.

(From Hogarth's Musical History.)

It may be interesting to give some account of these Seminaries called Conservatories, which have been frequently mentioned as having given musical education to the great Italian composers who filled Europe with their fame. There were schools of this description at Venice, Naples, Bologna, and other cities. The most remarkable were those of Venice, for girls, and those of Naples, for boys.

The Conservatorio of Santa Maria di Loreto, at Naples, was the most famous of the whole, and formed many of the greatest ornaments of the Neapolitan schools. Children were admitted into these Conservatories from the age of eight to twenty, and received instructions in composition, singing, and playing on various instruments, according to the bent of their genius or disposition. If the children did not show sufficient talent to afford a promise of excellence, they were dismissed to make room for others. Each conservatory had two principal masters, one of whom taught composition and the other singing; and these masters were frequently the most eminent men of the age; Leo and Durante, for example, having been masters in the Conservatorio of Santa Maria di Loretto. There was also a master for each instrument. As the pupils were often very numerous, (the last named Seminary having generally contained two hundred) the method of instruction resembled a good deal that which is known by the name of the Lancasterian system. The master gave lessons to four or five of the most advanced scholars; each of these, again, gave lessons to as many more, and thus the lessons were propagated through the whole schools, and descended to the pupils of the lowest grade. These subordinate lessons were given under the general superintendence of the master who was thus enabled to see that they were given and received without negligence or impropriety. The pupils at stated times had public exercises, consisting of little oratorios, operas, and miscellaneous pieces of music, composed and executed by themselves. They also performed the musical service in the different churches; and the money gained in these various ways contributed to the revenues of the establishment. The pupils were dressed in uniform; and numbers of them not only studied, but practised in the same room. Dr. Burney, in his "Musical Tour in Italy," gives the following account of his visit, in 1779, to the Conservatorio of Santo Onofrio, at Naples, which presents a curious view of a mode of education, which, notwithstanding its unpromising aspect, formed a school of music possessing, in a supreme degree, those very qualities of elegance, delicacy, and refinement, which, at first sight, it might appear calculated to destroy. "This morning," says Burney, "I went to the Conservatorio of St. Onofrio, and visit all the rooms where the boys practise, sleep and eat. On the first flight of stairs was a trumpeter, screaming upon his instrument till he was ready to burst; on the second was a French horn, bellying in the same manner. In the common practising room there was a Dutch Concert, consisting of seven or eight harpsichords, more than as many violins, and several voices, all performing different things, and in different keys: other boys were writing in the same room; but, it being holiday time, many were absent who usually study and practise in this room. The jumbling them altogether in this manner may be convenient for the house, and may teach the boys to attend to their own parts with firmness, whatever else may be going forward at the same time. It may likewise give them force by obliging them to play loud, in order to hear themselves. But in the midst of such jargon and continued dissonance, it is wholly impossible to give any kind of polish or finish to their performance: hence the slovenly coarseness so remarkable in their public exhibitions, and the total want of taste, neatness, and expression in all these young musicians, till they have acquired these accomplishments elsewhere.

The beds, which are in the same room, serve for seats to the harpsichords and other instruments. Out of thirty or forty boys who were practising, I could discover but two playing the same piece; some of those who were practising on the violins, seemed to have a good deal of hand. The violincellos practise in another room, and the flutes, hautboys, and other wind instruments in a third, except the trumpets and horns, which are obliged to fag either on the stairs or on the top of the house. The only vacation in these schools, in the whole year, is in autumn, and that for a few days only. During the winter the boys rise two hours before it is light, from which time they continue their exercises, an hour and a half at dinner excepted, till eight o'clock at night; and this constant perseverance for a number of years, with genius and good teaching, must produce great musicians." There were three Conservatories for boys, at Naples. Those of Venice for girls, were four in number, and conducted upon a similar plan. They were maintained at the expense of the wealthy amateurs of the city. The girls, it is said, were strictly brought up, and generally remained in the school till their marriage. Strangers who visited these Conservatories, were struck with the singularity of young women, at their concerts, playing upon all kinds of instruments, even the horn, the bassoon, and the double bass. Such was the state of these celebrated Italian schools, till the old state of things was put an end to by the power of Napoleon. During the decline of music which has since taken place in Italy, most of the Conservatories have disappeared, and those which still exist, have dwindled into comparative insignificance.

Milan, September 21, 1771.

To-day is to take place the first rehearsal, with orchestra, of M. Hasse's work, who is quite well, God be thanked. Next week will come the rehearsal of the serenade. Monday that of the recitatives; on the other days those of the choruses. Monday, Wolfgang will have quite finished. Manzuoli often comes to see us; Tibaldi almost every day at about eleven; he stays at table with us till one. Wolfgang composes during the whole time. All are extremely polite, and evince the greatest consideration for Wolfgang. We have not the slightest annoyance to complain of, for we have to do with good singers only and reasonable people. The serenade is, properly speaking, a little opera, and the opera itself is no longer, as regards the musical portion, for it is only prolonged by the two grand ballets, each of which lasts three-quarters of an hour.

Two days ago Italian comedy terminated its performances, because the theatre was wanted for the preparations to be commenced. These comedians are extremely good, especially in character pieces and in tragedy.

You tell me, in your previous letters, that many persons have gone mad in Salzburg. Now you inform me that many die of dysentery. This is very bad, for when people are seized by the head and by the — at the same time, the thing becomes dangerous. I must have carried away something myself from Salzburg, for I still frequently have vertigo. It is not astonishing, for when the air is infected one may easily catch something; that is why I asked you for some pills. I want to cure my head.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—As for me, God be thanked I am well. I cannot write to you at any length. First of all, I have nothing to say; next, my fingers ache with scribbling notes. I often whistle and call, but no one answers. Only two airs more and the serenade is finished. I have no longer any wish to return to Salzburg—I am afraid of going mad like the rest of them.

Our holidays and amusements have commenced. We are going out a-walking. To-day the first full rehearsal takes place. I can tell you beforehand for your solace, that I am in hopes Wolfgang's composition will have a great success. First of all because Manzuoli and all the singers, male and female, not only are in the highest degree satisfied with their pieces, but are still more anxious than we are to hear the serenade with all the accompaniments; next, because I know what he has written, and what effect it will produce, and because he is quite certain that he writes as well for the voice as he does for the orchestra. (We are quite well) Tell me always about the weather.

The serenade so astonishingly pleased the people on the 17th, that it has to be played again to-day. The Archduke has asked for two copies (besides the two copies made for the Emperor and the Archduke which we are having bound). Every one accosts us in the streets to congratulate Wolfgang. In short, I am sorry for it, but Wolfgang's serenade threw Hasse's opera into the shade to a degree impossible to describe.

Give thanks to God and pray for us.

The public were witnesses yesterday at the theatre of the enthusiasm of the Archduke and Archduchess who not only caused, by their applause, two airs in the serenade to be repeated, but during the serenade, and at the end, both leant out of their box towards Wolfgang in the orchestra, and betokened their approbation by crying out, "Bravissimo maestro!" and clapping their hands, an example which all the nobility and all the people imitated by applauding with all their might. If you want any dresses, have made what is necessary; neither you or Nanette should be without what is proper. You must do whatever is to be done. Don't take anything bad. It is false economy to buy inferior goods. Have a fine gown made for yourself for grand occasions, and the one you had at Vienna you can wear every day. No woolen stuff—it is not worth a curse.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—My work being finished, I have more time to write, but I have no news to tell you, unless it be that the numbers 35, 59, 60, 61 and 62 came out at the lottery, and thus if we had staked upon those numbers we should have won, but not having staked we have neither won nor lost, but made fun of the people. The two airs in the serenade asked for again were those of Manzuoli and Girelli.

Milan, November 24, 1771.

M. Hasse and Wolfgang as well have been richly recompensed for their compositions. Besides what they touched in money, M. Hasse has received a snuff box, and Wolfgang a watch set in diamonds. We shall see each other again soon if it be God's will. It is very certain that the serenade has pleased everybody to a singular degree. But that the Archbishop will bethink him of Wolfgang when there is an appointment vacant is a point on which I have my doubts.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—Manzuoli, who, however, passed in people's eyes for the most reasonable of castrati, has committed in his old age an act of folly and of pride. It was agreed he was to have 500 gigliati for the opera; but as there was no mention made of the serenade in the scrittura, he demanded another 500 for this, consequently altogether 1000. The Court only gave him 700 and a handsome snuff-box (I should think that was enough). But he like a true castrato returned the 700 gigliati and the snuff-box, and departed without taking anything. I do not know what is likely to be the end of this history; a bad one I imagine.

We shall not arrive before Monday. Count Spaur, who is here, will not hear of any other proposal.

Bozen, October 28, 1772.

We were not able to start from Innsbruck before seven o'clock, because there was no mass before the six o'clock one at St. John's. From Innsbruck we went out driving as far as Hall to see the Ladies' Institute there, which was shown to us in detail by the Countess Lodson. Wolfgang played on the organ in the church there. Bozen is a melancholy place. But the pleasant disorder which is of the essence of all journeys has put my health in order. If, therefore, travelling be necessary to keep me in health, I shall try and get a place as courier, or at any rate as conductor of a diligence. Wolfgang is well; he is just now writing a quintor to while away the time.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—Here we are already at Bozen. Already? Only! I am hungry, I am thirsty, I am sleepy, I am lazy, but I am well. I hope you will keep your word.

Milan, November 7, 1772.

Don't be alarmed at seeing my writing instead of the father's. He has not time to write, because we are at M. d'Ost's, and Baron Cristiani has come here, and these gentlemen have so much to gossip about that he cannot leave them. We arrived here on the 4th without mishap. There is not a word of truth in the rumor of a war in Italy, of which there is so much talk in Germany, any more than there is in that of the fortifications of the castle of Milan.

We embrace mother 1,000,000 times (I cannot get in any more O's here, and I prefer embracing my sister in person to doing so in fancy).

P. S. from Mozart.—We spent Wolfgang's fête day merrily at Ala, at the brothers Picili; we stopt also at Verona, and this is why we go to Milan so late, where we have already seen the opera buffa.

The elder Mozart to his Wife.

Milan, November 14, 1772.

After living tranquilly for several weeks at Milan

* Mozart arrived at Salzburg at the end of December, 1771, and the following year composed another serenade, Il Saggio di Scipione, by Metastasio, to celebrate the election of the new Archbishop of Salzburg, Jerome, of the princely house of Colloredo and Nola, elected March 14, 1772. In October, 1772, father and son set out for Milan, where Mozart wrote the opera seria, Lucio Silla.

I am beginning to feel some symptoms of indisposition. I allow myself to get thinking of Salzburg, and without being conscious of it take a pleasure therein; when I come back to myself, I shake myself up, or endeavor to shake myself up and cast aside these reminiscences as I used to cast aside the evil thoughts with which the devil inspired me in my youth. There is no one here of our company but la Signora Saarti who plays the parts of the secondo uomo. Meanwhile Wolfgang has had enough to do, having had to write the choruses to the number of three, and to rewrite in part the recitatives which he had composed at Salzburg; for the poet had shown his manuscript to Metastasio, at Vienna, and he modified it, improved it, and added an entire scene to the second act. Lastly, Wolfgang has composed all the recitatives which were wanting in the Overture.

There is at Brescia a certain Count Lecchi, a capital violinist, and a great connoisseur and amateur of music, at whose house we promised to alight immediately on our return.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Japanese Visit the Opera.—At half past two o'clock in the afternoon, about twenty-five of the members of the Embassy, consisting of the officials and servants, visited the Academy of Music, to attend the matinee. The Embassadors were not present. Long before the hour for opening the doors of the Academy, a crowd gathered in front of the building, and in a few minutes after admission was gained, the parquet, first circle, and balcony, were filled with a well-dressed audience, a large portion being ladies. In the balcony, the centre rows of seats were reserved for the Japanese, and when they entered they had no difficulty in being accommodated, and were not compelled to bear the pressure of a crowd. A few were placed in one of the stage boxes but these did not stay after the first piece. Tommy was along, dressed in his best, but looking very downhearted, the result, it is whispered, of a strong attachment for a young lady in Washington. The three physicians of the Embassy were also present, and were conspicuous from the closely shaven head. Most of those present exhibited, with evident satisfaction, gloves purchased since their arrival in the country, and in approved fashionable style, they watched the ladies through opera glasses. The strangers glanced carelessly around the house, but did not seem astonished either at the magnificence of the building or the crowd of persons assembled to greet them. They have evidently schooled themselves to conceal their thoughts, and nothing can be gained by watching their countenances.

Soon after the entrance of the Japanese, the orchestra, numbering over 45 performers, opened with the grand overture to William Tell. To this the Japanese paid but little attention, but when the curtain rose on the second act of Lucretia Borgia, with Mlle. Parodi as Lucretia, every Mongolian who possessed an opera glass leveled it at the performers, and so watched them during the act, which was a short one, to the evident relief of the Japanese. Next, Buckstone's comedy of the Rough Diamond claimed their notice, and in this respect the acting was more pleasing to them than the singing. Many of the strangers conversed together, and seemed somewhat amused at the lady performers, while others smiled when the audience would applaud any "point" made in the course of the piece. All the performers played their best, and received considerable applause; but as nearly every body was watching the effect of the play upon the Japanese, and thus losing the run of the performance, the enthusiasm was not so general as our people are in the habit of showing. The choruses of the Mænnchor and Young Mænnchor were given without any show of appreciation on the part of the Japanese, but the inexhaustible egg-bag of Blitz excited the undivided attention of the strangers. Mlle. Parodi gave the Star Spangled Banner in glorious style, assisted by a full chorus of two hundred singers.

This part of the performance was well managed. As the curtain rose, the singers were seen grouped in the rear of Mlle. Parodi, and on one side stood an American sailor with the flag of Japan, while on the other stood a representative of Japan, with the American colors. The magic dance of two nations, by Mr. W. Wood, caused them some amusement. Mr. Wood first appeared as a Japanese, and after dancing a few minutes, suddenly wheeled, and presented the appearance of an American sailor. But the pantomime of Vol-au-vent did the business. Here was something they could understand nearly as well as the rest of the audience, and, although many of them endeavored to keep a straight face they gave it up after a few trials, and enjoyed themselves to their heart's content. One old fellow who sat like a statue through the whole afternoon, smiled once at the antics of Mr. Wood; but feeling the impropriety of such undignified conduct, he held his fan to his face for concealment. They seem to have a quiet sort of enjoyment, for while several seemed convulsed with laughter, no sound of mirth could be heard two feet from them. After the performance, the party drove in open carriages to the hotel, no crowd following. And, by the way, we may state that a wrong impression has gone abroad that the Embassadors were insulted on Saturday. This is all a mistake. Along the route there were of course, some noisy demonstrations, but no word was spoken which, if understood, could have roused their pride.

MUSIC.—There is something very wonderful in music. Words are wonderful enough, but music is even more wonderful. It speaks to our thoughts as words do; it speaks straight to our hearts and spirits—to the very core and root of our souls. Music soothes us, stirs us up, it puts noble feelings into us; it melts us to tears, we know not how; it is a language by itself, just as perfect in its way as speech, as words; just as blessed. Music, I say, without words, is wonderful and blessed—one of God's best gifts to man. But in singing, you have both the wonders together—music and word. Singing speaks at once to the head and to the heart, to our understanding and to our feelings; and therefore, perhaps, the most beautiful way in which the reasonable soul of man can show itself (except, of course, doing right, which always is, and always will be, the most beautiful thing) is singing.—Chas. Kingsley.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTH SEAS.—Our Puritan ancestors used to pay their church rates in beans and cord wood, and the natives of the South Sea Islands now buy their concert tickets with bananas and pine-apples. We copy from the New York Musical Review the following poster and prices of admission of the Alleghenians, who are having a fine tour in the South Sea Islands. D. G. Waldron of this city is their business agent.

"By royal command of King Makea V. and the Rarotonga nobility, the Alleghenians will give a grand concert at the School-house this afternoon at four o'clock, January 19th, 1860. Prices of admission: Tickets to admit one, 1 hog, or 2 pigs, or 1 turkey, or 2 chickens, or 25 pine-apples, or 2 bunches bananas, or 5 large pumpkins, or 2 baskets oranges. Children, half price."

The profits also might be a novelty. The writer of a letter says:

In order to get at the amount of the receipts in dollars and cents, I have valued every thing at about New York retail prices:

79 hogs at $5 each.....	$395.00
93 turkeys at $1 each.....	93.00
116 chickens at 38 cents.....	44.08
16,000 cocoa nuts at 12 cents each.....	1920.00
5,700 pine apples at 12 cents each.....	684.00
418 bunches bananas, averaging 75 to the bunch, making 31,350 bananas at 6 cents each.....	1881.00
600 pumpkins at 15 cents each.....	90.00
2,700 oranges at 2 cents each.....	54.00
limes, mats, fans, etc., about.....	25.00

Musical Correspondence.

CINCINNATI, JUNE 25.—We have been once more convinced of the beneficial influence that may be exerted by a person, animated by sincere love of Art, since Miss FANNY RAYMOND became an associate in the musical department of the Ohio Female College. We have attended several soirées and concerts at the College; and could not avoid remarking, with satisfaction and pleasure, the good effect produced by the efforts of this artist, already known by our readers through her charming poems and musical translations, and to whom the cultivation of the highest in music is a necessity of life.

How much courage and determination is required, to oppose successfully the Humbug that reigns supreme in most of our institutions, fostered by the double dealing of ignorant teachers.

Is it not a remarkable fact, that precisely where its good may be promoted in the most influential manner, the art of music is most degraded? Is not the task of awakening, in young and pliant minds, a love for the fair and noble in art, a glorious one?

But for this task, integrity, and a heart sensitively alive to the beautiful and true is required, to say nothing of the necessary knowledge.

"People are satisfied with things as they are," is reiterated again and again. And why? Because people know not better. Because the merchants and farmers who send their daughters to these institutions know nothing save that which is brought before them in such places: yet we have invariably found, that good music, even tolerably well performed, pleases a larger majority than bad music brought out in a similar manner. But supposing people will have "things as they are," it is no less the duty of those who are convinced that "things" are not as they should be, to strive boldly to obviate the evil, and, if patience and good-will are not wanting, success is sure to follow.

Miss Raymond, a cultivated vocalist, skilful pianist and well versed in the theory of music, saw, on her entrance into the Ohio Female College, where the breakers lay, and steered courageously towards the work of reform. Knowing that mere lesson giving is not sufficient to ensure a pupil's progress, Miss Raymond gained the assistance of some of our best artists, and thus, by means of musical evenings, considerably extended the horizon of her scholars.

The influence of such a spirit was perhaps most fully displayed in the music that illustrated the recent Commencement Exercises at the Ohio Female College, and which partly suggested the above remarks. To be sure, we had no overtures or fifty pianos; no Flower-queens. "Coronations of the Rose," or any of those displays, whose awkward attempts at attitudinizing, inappropriate fancy dresses, and bashful hints at scenery, are so admirably calculated to draw off the attention of pupils and audience from the wishy-washy music that usually accompanies them; neither had we any of — and Co.'s Music murdered for the Million, — but we had choruses and trios by Curschman, Donizetti, Bennett, songs by Haydn and Bishop, the piano compositions of Thalberg, Gottschalk, &c. What was the consequence? An artistic and harmonious effect about the whole affair; general and pleasant satisfaction; and favorable comparisons between past and present years.

TEMPO.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., JULY 4th.—In a recent number of your valuable issue, there appeared a very interesting tale of the invention of the Harmonica. Apropos, a highly accomplished and enthusiastic German pianist, C. E. Hering, of Saxe Gotha, visited us last Monday, and gave an evening performance, which drew a highly respectable audience, of course, not such who generally attend "Negro Minstrelsy exhibitions." The novelty and great feature of the evening was his performance on an instrument named the "Palmelodicon" said to be similar to that invented by Franklin, improved by Weber (not Carl Maria), and perfected by the concert-giver.

I will not attempt a description of this instrument, since Mr. Hering proposes to visit your city, where without doubt the lovers of music will patronize him. I heard him play on it (simply by friction with the tip of the fingers) a "song without words," and an impromptu of his own, The last Rose of Summer, and some other pieces. The different shades and gradations of tone emitted were perfect. Now it would resemble the flute, and again the soft diapason of the organ, swelling and dying away—now a sort of reedy tone, and soon after, strains very much like those of the violin: sostenuto passages with left hand accompaniment, perfect trillos, unisons, and chromatic progressions—these are all executed with taste, intensity of feeling, and an artistic finish, that equally produce wonder and delight. We have not had such a treat for a long time—indeed since the Draytons left here three weeks ago, nothing in the shape of good music has been given. In private, I learn that the pianist Casseres and a few distinguished amateurs are engaged in rehearsing operatic works, &c. The appreciation of good pianoforte music is at a very low ebb here, for instance Hering played Listz's Transcription of Schubert's Ave Maria in a very creditable manner. They could not appreciate this, although the motive was well delivered, and the variations neatly performed. A few German operatives present showed their delight however, while the would-be elite stared and wondered "why those men make so much noise about nothing."

Revenons a nos moutons. The Palmelodicon is played on by very few persons, but I learn from good authority that only four persons have achieved any thing like success, Miss Davies, Herren Weber and Hierling and the present Herr Hering who is a gentleman and a thorough musician.

Yours, &c.,

BOSTON, JULY 7, 1860.

L'Année Musicale.

On Revue Annuelle des Théâtres lyriques et des Concerts, des publications littéraires relatives à la musique et des événements remarquables appartenant à l'histoire de l'art musical, par P. Scudo. Première Année. Paris 1860.

M. Scudo in this book, the first volume of a projected series, has undertaken, after the manner of similar publications of a historical and scientific nature, to collect together the most notable events of the year in the musical world, in a convenient and permanent chronicle, which affords a good deal of pleasant reading to the musical amateur; as it is done in the graceful pleasant style peculiar to Scudo and cannot fail to be an interesting work to all concerned in any way with the matters of which it treats.

M. Scudo says in his preface, that "books treating especially of the musical art are very rare in France. This branch of literature so rich in England, Germany, and even in Italy, especially in the last century, has produced among us, with some rare exceptions, only works of no worth and not even of any great utility. A few didactic books, biographies filled with anecdotes, more piquante than instructive, interminable discussions on the theatre and dramatic music, on the preponderance of one school over another, of French opera over Italian; this is what in France makes up the literature of a profound and charming art, of the only universal language of the world. In an age like ours which looks for precision, desires to be well informed about everything, and demands to be speedily advised of everything interesting, there is not in Paris a single daily, weekly or monthly publication in which even the external facts relating to the musical art are arranged or treated in an intelligent and sufficiently impartial manner. You must go to public libraries, and turn over large volumes of general statistics, if you would ascertain the precise date of a performance that has electrified all Paris."

To fill this void M. Scudo has commenced this publication, which contains critiques of the works, that have been represented in the lyric theatres of Paris, notices of the artists and virtuosi who have attracted public attention, of important publications that deserve discussion and short accounts of singers, composers and writers on music who have deceased during the year.

And as all the civilized world is now so closely linked together, that the rest of it cannot be ignored, M. Scudo, never losing sight of the fact that Paris is the "hub of the universe" of Art, looks abroad at London, Naples, and even to far St. Petersburg, for material for his art-chronicle of the past year.

The result of his labors is a very readable book, which is especially interesting to us, from its notices here and there, of artists who have been among us, and now familiar to us and honored among us, even before possessing the prestige of an European reputation, such as the veteran Badiali.

We shall draw occasionally from the pages of this volume, for which we are indebted to Mr. Leypoldt, the agent of the publishers in Philadelphia.

BEETHOVEN AND PAER.

An old story is again on the tapis, this time with the honored name of Ferdinand Hiller, as authority, who heard it related by Paer himself. The substance of it is, that at a representation of Paer's "Leonore," Beethoven said to the composer in words to this effect, "The subject is so good I must compose it myself."

This might very well have been true of Paer's "Achilles," brought out at Vienna in 1801, but cannot possibly be true of the "Leonore." Paer must, in the course of years, have confounded the two in his memory.

Here are those stubborn things, the dates.

Paer called to Dresden as kapellmeister, 1803; produced his "Leonore" at Dresden, Oct. 3, 1804; Beethoven's "Fidelio" produced in Vienna, 1805; First performance of Paer's "Leonore" in Vienna, Feb. 8, 1809.

In answer to my request for some information as to his compositions, Richard Wüerst, of Berlin, gave me the following list:

- Op. 4. 2 Romances for violin and pianoforte.
- " 5. Trio for pianoforte, violin and violoncello
- " 7. 3 terzette; 2 soprano and alto with piano forte.
- " 11. Songs with pianoforte.
- " 12. 2 Romances for pianoforte and violin.
- " 13. 2 " " " "
- " 14. 3 Characteristic Pieces for pianoforte and violin.
- " 15. 4 Duets, soprano and alto with pianoforte.
- " 16. Song with pianoforte.
- " 17. 4 songs for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass.
- " 18. 6 songs with pianoforte.
- " 19. Duo. Pianoforte and violoncello.
- " 20. Songs with pianoforte.
- " 21. Prize symphony for orchestra in F major.
- " 22. Terzett; Soprano, alto, tenor, with pianoforte.
- " 23. 4 Two-part songs with pianoforte.
- " 24. 28th Psalm, for three-part female chorus, with solos and pianoforte.
- " 25. 2 Romances, pianoforte and violin.
- " 26. 3 Quartets for men's voices.
- " 27. Sacred piece for 4 part, chorus with solos and pianoforte.
- " 28. Aria di concerto per voce di contralto o mezzo-soprano, for orchestra, also pianoforte arrangement.
- " 29. 3 Songs for a low voice, with pianoforte.
- " 30. "Der Wassereck," a lyric cantate, solos, chorus, and orchestra, also pianoforte arrangement.
- " 31. 5 Songs for soprano, alto, tenor and bass.
- " 32. 2 Two-part songs with pianoforte.
- " 33. 3 String quartets.

The above are published. Besides these Wüerst has composed many works still in manuscript; among them a symphony and violin concerto, several times performed, and an opera, not yet known.

Musical Chit-Chat.

MARTHA S. P. STORY, the little three year old pianist, of whom our readers have seen some notice in our columns, has given the only concerts of the week. We do not know that she is another Mozart in her musical precocity, but have seen her, and heard her play in a manner that is certainly wonderful for a child of her age. A little fair-haired, blue-eyed child, three years old in November last, she stands at the piano with her chin on a level with the keys, and childlike plays on it if she is disposed, or at her good pleasure, crawls under it, and plays about the room. She performs a large number of tunes in correct time and harmony, never looking at her hands, but always around the room; sometimes going through her tune to the end, and sometimes jumbling it all together, as a little child repeats poetry. Her music is mostly simple psalm tunes and negro melodies, or Sunday school songs, such as take hold of a little child's ear, and her talent for rendering them so correctly is certainly quite remarkable, as is also her memory for retaining them. The person who exhibits her does it with discretion and good judgment, never in the least forcing her inclination. When she is tired she gets down from the stool and amuses herself and the audience in some other way till she is in humor to play again. She is well worth seeing, and children especially will be pleased with her pretty songs and her performance. The object of these public exhibitions of her talent is to obtain funds for her education.

ROTTERDAM.—Carl Formes has accepted an engagement here.

PESTH.—Director Salvi with his company will begin a series of Italian opera performances here, July 21st.

MILAN.—At the Cannobiana Theatre, Manzani's celebrated ode to Napoleon I.; "The fifth of May," is about to be brought out melodramatically, with soli and choruses; the music by one Herr Mazurezza.

RICHMOND.—The Inquirer of June 30, speaks as follows of our former townsman, N. D. Clapp, and of his success as a teacher:

The highly interesting exercises of "commencement week," at the Richmond Female Institute, were crowned on Wednesday by a brilliant musical soirée. The programme itself in the variety and choice of its selections from German, French, Italian and American music, evinced the catholic spirit and severe taste which preside over the musical department of this Institute. Prof. Clapp, the Principal of the department, (also well known as the excellent Organist of the First Presbyterian Church,) availing himself of his experience in other prominent institutions at the South, and of his unusual opportunities for familiarity with the best European methods and culture, has succeeded in raising the standard of musical education in conformity to the demands of an ever-improving public taste. It would have gratified the audience had he favored them with a touch of his own quality as an artist, but he evidently preferred to exhibit the proficiency of the pupils rather than that of their instructors.

It is not too much to say, that his pupils amply redeemed the promise of the programme. All the vocal pieces gave proof of careful training and patient study; and in several were displayed a facility of execution and powers of vocalization which would have elicited applause if they had been sung equally well by professional voices. The instrumental solos, duos, and concerted pieces, were played with a graceful ease, which suggested reserved power no less than assiduous practice. The choruses from different operas were rendered in a style at once spirited and correct. It was obvious that the performers might have delighted even a wider public than their relatives and friends who crowded the beautifully decorated hall of the Institute.

PARIS, MAY 31.—The last news respecting the Opera House is that the new building will be built upon the site occupied by the present house, and a square made in front of it and between it and the Boulevard. This will give the Boulevard, what it very much wants, a handsome garden, under whose trees loiterers may saunter the hottest hours away. The Passage des Panoramas and the adjacent houses must be pulled down before this can happen. All the houses on the Place Dauphine, or to speak properly, all the houses west of the Prefecture of Police are to be razed, the landlords indemnified, and the land sold, in order to have this portion of Paris as splendid as possible; no house will be allowed to be built until after the Government approves the plan. All the buildings north of the French Comedy have been pulled down.

The Opera in New Orleans is over. The Picayune, June 1, says:

"Jerusalem" was substituted, Wednesday night, for the "Trovatore," on the occasion of the joint benefit of M<sup>me</sup>. Dalmont and M. Cabel.

M<sup>me</sup>. Pauline Colson took her leave of us last evening, appearing in her great character, Uriel, the demon, in "Les Amours du Diable." M<sup>me</sup>. Colson having performed here fifteen nights, according to the contract of Mr. Boudousquie with Messrs. Strakosch and Ullman, leaves, to-day, for New York, and resumes her position as one of the Academy troupe, her engagement with the managers extending to May, 1861. That over, we understand, it is her purpose to return to her native France.

This evening, that powerful and popular tenor, Philippe, will take a benefit, at the Opera House, filling his favorite rôle of the Jew in "The Jewess." A bumper, at parting, for Philippe! We are glad to find the report that he returns, next season, is confirmed.

The same journal, June 3, suggests:

What an admirable arrangement it would be for Mr. Boudousquie and Strakosch to make a full and complete interchange of companies, dividing our six months' operatic season into two equal parts; and giving us French opera from November till February, and Italian the other three months. Undoubtedly this would pay both parties to the arrangement handsomely. The two Parodi weeks we had here this season sufficiently demonstrated the popularity of Italian opera in New Orleans, and if it was so successful under such circumstances, what would it be if given by a full, well appointed, first rate opera troupe, at our beautiful Opera House! The New Yorkers, Bostonians and Philadelphians have no idea of French opera, and would hail with delight its production at their Academies of Music. Is not this point worth considering, Messieurs Impresarii?

Paris.

The management of the Théâtre Lyrique has done a useful and a graceful thing in bringing out Hérold's first operatic work, Les Rosières, an opera comique in three acts, produced at the Salle Feydeau in 1817. On its first production, this work achieved a decided success, and at once informed the world that a composer of the highest promise was born to France. It kept the stage until 1826, when Marie, a much ripper and more masterly work, threw it into the shade, whence it has never been rescued until now. Les Rosières, though much inferior to the composer's subsequent productions, exhibits in a considerable measure the fundamental characteristics of Hérold's style. It lacks the rich and brilliant instrumentation, and the startling modulations for which he was afterwards distinguished; but the grace and facility of his melodic inspirations, the elegance, piquancy, and neatness of his style are already clearly discernible. The libretto of this work, although old-fashioned is still amusing; and the plot has a merit also somewhat out of date—clearness and simplicity. The principal female part, Florette, is played by Mlle. Girard, whose easy, correct, and brilliant execution, keen intelligence and agreeable organ, allied to graceful and spirited acting, place her among the first lyrical artists of the French stage. The other prominent characters are filled by Mlle. Faivre, and MM. Fromant, Mécquier Delauney, and Gabriel. A little one-act opera, entitled Les Valets de Gascoigne, has been produced for the first time at this establishment with sufficient success. The composer is M. Dufresne. Mlle. Faivre, M. Girardot, M. Wartel, and M. Potel, are engaged in it.

M. Henry Wuille, the well-known clarionetist, one of the many distinguished artists whom poor Jullien introduced to fortune and to fame, has made his début in Paris at the concerts Musard, and has won from the public as well as from the critics, the amplest acknowledgment of his uncommon talents.

At the Opéra Comique, the bills still alternate with L'Etoile du Nord, Le Roman d'Elvire and Rita, and Château Trompette with L'Habit de Mylord. A new opera, by M. Paul Dupuch, Gertrude, is in rehearsal, and will take its turn after Le Petit Chaperon Rouge, which is very soon to appear. The following artists will be engaged in this once most popular of Boieldieu's works—Rodolphe, M. Crosti; Roger, M. Warot; the Bailli, Lemaire; the Hermit, Barrielle; Rose d'Amour, Mlle. Marimon; Annette, Belia.

Before closing for the season the Théâtre Lyrique will produce a new operetta, the title of which has been changed since the first announcement from Le Mariage aux Epées to Maitre Palma. The music is by Mlle. Rivay, her first essay, and the book by Mad. Furpille and Gille. It is also expected that La Madone, by Lacombe will shortly be forthcoming. The manager has just engaged Mad. W. Kerlin Damoreau for next season.

The tenor Fraschini has just signed an engagement with the manager of the Opéra, at Madrid, for the ensuing season; and it is reported that Mad. Borghini-Mamo has contracted to appear at the Scala, in Milan, during the carnival season next year.

Roger has just returned from his provincial tour. He appeared last at Bordeaux, where he brought the season to a brilliant close. He is to proceed to Baden in August, where he is engaged, together with Mad. Miolan-Carvalho, to appear in a new opera, by Gounod.

London.

NEW PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The fifth performance on Monday brought the series to a termination. The programme included the overtures to L'Clémence di Tito and Preciosa, Beethoven's symphony in D, No. 2, Mendelssohn's concerto in D minor, and Spohr's dramatic concerto for violin and orchestra. In consequence of both Italian operas giving extra nights, Dr. Wylde was deprived of some of his regular "hands," and forced to look for recruits in all directions. Fortunately, good players in London are not scarce. To the execution of Beethoven's symphony, we have scarcely anything to award but praise, and the liberal applause which followed each movement proved that the audience was thoroughly satisfied. Herr Becker played the dramatic concerto—so great a favorite with Ernst, and introduced by that distinguished violinist on the occasion of his first performance in this country—in masterly style, and the applause at the end was uproarious. The grand concerto of Mendelssohn also was a triumph for Mr. John Barnett, who created a marked sensation. The last movement more particularly displayed the young pianist's execution and taste to equal advantage. The voice music was allotted to Miss Louisa Pyne, Mad. Lemmens Sherrington, and Herr Herrmanns, the new German bass, who made so great a hit the week previously at the Monday Popular Concerts. Herr Herrmanns introduced "Falstaff's song," from Otto Nicolai's Merry wives of Windsor, with the same success as before. He is an unquestionable acquisition to the concert-room. Miss Louisa Pyne sang a grand scena from Spohr's Jessonda, "Batti, batti," and a romance from Mr. Wallace's Lurline. The expressive manner in which she gave the air from Don Giovanni received the liveliest sympathy and won a hearty encore. Mad. Lemmens Sherrington gave an air from Weber's Euryanthe to perfection, but the audience were more pleased with Adolph Adams' "Ah! vous dirai-je mamma," which was redemanded. The hall was crowded in every part. Dr. Wylde may congratulate himself that the season has been one of the most successful in the annals of the New Philharmonic Society.

MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The fifth and last concert of the season was no less interesting than its predecessors, as will be seen by the subjoined programme:—

Overture, "Leonora".....	Beethoven.
Aria "Ach nur einmal noch in leben".....	Mozart.
Fifth Concerto, violin.....	Molique.
Recit. "E mi lasci così".....	Spohr.
Aria "Tu m'abandonni".....	"
Overture "Les deux Jourdées".....	Cherubini.
Symphony in A minor (Op. 68).....	Mendelssohn.
Recit. "Di ostili tende".....	Costa.
Aria "Dall'asilo della pace".....	"
Recit. "Kraft meines heiligen Amtes".....	Beilini.
Aria "Wenn Romeo den Sohn erschlagen".....	"
Overture, "Der Freyschütz".....	Weber.

THE LONDON GLEE AND MADRIGAL SOCIETY last week gave their hundredth performance with unabating vigor and success, and their present season will terminate positively this day. Their repertoire has consisted of above a hundred different pieces—glees, madrigals, catches, and old ballads—the most favorite of which have been included in the programmes of the recent performances. We looked forward with pleasure to the resumption of this society's pleasant entertainments next season, and hope to find Mr. Oliphant, whose literary illustrations have added so much to the success of the performances, provided with a fresh budget of information.

Books.

THE OPERA OF NORMA. By Bellini. Piano Solo. 2,00

This is the fourteenth volume of Ditson & Co.'s Edition of Standard Operas and in mechanical execution is fully equal to its predecessors. The type employed is smaller than the usual music type, yet its beautiful, clear and distinct cut renders it easily read. Another advantage is that with this type a larger amount of matter is placed upon a page, by which frequent leaf turning is avoided. The extremely low price at which they are afforded enables all who desire to do so, to possess a complete operatic library.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Meyerbeer.

L'ANNE MUSICALE. P. SCUDO.

Meyerbeer is certainly one of the most curious and interesting figures presented by the history of Art. A man of the North, beloved fellow disciple of Weber, who created the German opera, born of a family favored alike by nature and fortune, Giacomo Meyerbeer had nothing to do but allow himself to live. Having two brothers, one a celebrated astronomer, the other a distinguished poet, Giacomo wished that his name too, should be inscribed upon the book of life. After having been a remarkable virtuoso on the piano, as were also Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, after having tried his powers in several dramatic compositions, in the language of his country, he was suddenly seized by an extreme love for Italian music, and breaking all bonds with the new school, which had aimed to lead away the musical genius of the German nation from the influence of the Italian masters which had triumphed since the renaissance, Meyerbeer went to the peninsula, and established again by his example the old fashioned pilgrimage of German musicians to the pure sources of melody; for it is well to know that the pilgrimage of the German composers began as far back as the last half of the sixteenth century. Praetorius, Henri Schütz (who was a pupil of the school of Venice), Keyser, and all the dramatic composers who preceded Handel, Hasse and Gluck, were admirers and imitators of the Italian school then reigning. It was at the close of the eighteenth century, after the death of Mozart and Haydn, that the old alliance of the two great musical schools of Europe, was suddenly broken. Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Spohr, Mendelssohn and all the musicians who attached themselves more or less closely to the movement of renovation called the romantic, that is to say, national school, not only rejected the ancient teachings of the school which produced Palestrina, Carissimi, Scarlatti, Gabrieli, Marcello and Jomelli, but even any imitation of its original peculiarities and processes. The last manifestation of the German romantic school is that horde of iconoclasts who pretend to extirpate from music all idea of melody, and who speak with disdain of the works of Monsieur Mozart! and who have dubbed themselves musicians of the future, because the present age is not worthy to comprehend them.

Of keen intellect, a sagacious observer, endowed with an imagination at once ardent and under restraint, ambitious of glory, yet not in too great haste to conquer it, timid and anxious in details, audacious and profound in the conception of a general plan, Meyerbeer developed in Italy a complex genius in which an adroit imitation of Rossini is discreetly mingled with his own inspirations. Such is the character of his two best Italian operas, Marguerite d'Anjou and Il Crociato, which made him a reputation that much afflicted his illustrious fellow-pupil and friend, the author of Der Freyschütz and Oberon. We may read in the correspondence of von Weber, the letter in which he deplors the fact that Meyerbeer should have plunged deeper and deeper into the imitation of foreign forms, and that the love of success should have stifled so fine an imagination. "Was hoffen wir alles von ihm!—O verfluchte Lust zu gefallen!" Nevertheless in the midst of all the applause and viros lavished upon him by the Italian public, so warm and extravagant in the demonstrations of its satisfaction, Meyerbeer meditated, (for he is always meditating) a transformation of his manner. Der Freyschütz which had been given at Berlin in 1821, was translated into French, and represented at the theatre de l'Orléon, at Paris, in 1824 with a success that has become European. Stimulated doubtless by this example, by that given by Gluck in 1774, which Spontini and Rossini had followed so brilliantly, Meyerbeer also conceived the idea of essaying his genius in a country which possesses indisputably the finest and richest dramatic literature of modern nations. Robert le Diable was brought out at the opera in November, 1831. In March, 1836, he gave the Huguenots, in 1849, the Prophète, and in 1854, l'Etoile du Nord. I shall not undertake to comment on these works, which are known all over the world and performed in all the theatres of Europe. At some future time, we shall have occasion to recur to these great scores, which are very differently rated by critics, but of which no one can deny the powerful effect upon the public. Germany, where the works of Meyerbeer are judged by artists and critics with a rigor that borders on injustice, Germany runs to the representations of Robert le Diable, the Huguenots and the Prophet with no less enthusiasm than the Parisian public. Upon what then depends the evident and indisputable popularity of the operas of Meyerbeer? On the vigor of the coloring, the warm passion that pervades them, on certain situations powerfully rendered, on the effect of combinations, on profound inspirations that take hold of the masses, whatever may be the legitimate reservations of the man of taste who prefers the beauty that touches the heart and charms the imagination to the truth that strikes and impresses itself upon the intellect. We can say of Meyerbeer, who devotes himself above everything, to the true expression of life, what the Latin poet, Propertius, has said of Lysippus, the Greek sculptor:

Gloria Lysippo est animosa effingere signa.

It is a fine spectacle to contemplate the varieties of genius presented by the history of art. Going back no further than our own century, and restricting the field of observation to the three nations that represent the æsthetic civilization of Europe, the Italians, the Germans and the French, we perceive two great changes wrought, the one by Beethoven in instrumental music, the other by Rossini in dramatic music. These two geniuses, as different from each other as are the two nations whose aspirations and sentiments they express, proceed in the conception of their work as Nature proceeds: they imitate their predecessors, and as the poet says, "sur des pensers nouveaux ils font des vers antiques," for there are no lasting recollections in the intellectual world, any more than in the moral world, but those that rest upon some corner of the past. You cannot cite either a great philosopher, or a poet, or an artist, or even a real statesman whose original work is the result of an isolated force, of a purely individual activity. If it is incontestable that the first compositions of the author of the Pastoral Symphony reveal a more or less involuntary imitation of the style of Mozart, so neither does Rossini conceal the fact that he has been educated in the admiration of Haydn, Mozart and Cimarosa, whose essences he combines and mingles on his magic palette: but this has not prevented Beethoven from becoming the most vast, most profound and most original musical genius that has ever existed, or Rossini from being the most varied, most passionate and most brilliant dramatic composer of his epoch. Around Beethoven, who remains unique, has arisen in Germany a group of congenial geniuses such as Weber, Spohr, Schubert, and later Mendelssohn, who, deriving their inspiration from the same order of ideas and the same traditions, are no the less original for that, especially Weber, who first translated into the lyric drama the marvellous of the German poetry. In the train of Rossini, in the same way has been produced a family of brilliant disciples, of whom the most original of all is Bellini, who would have risen very high, had not death cut off before his time, this sweet singer of Sicily, who had known how to combine with his own yet youthful style, an imitation of the old masters, especially of Paisiello, and the manner of the great renovator of Italian opera.

While these two great revolutions in the musical art were in progress in Germany and Italy, France which comprehends and appreciates nothing but exclusively dramatic music, remained faithful to the double tradition of Gluck and Grétry. Spontini and Mehul are disciples and eloquent imitators of the creator of Armida and the two Iphigenias, while the influence of Grétry produced at the theatre of the Opéra Comique, a swarm of delicious and charming composers of whom M. Auber is the illustrious successor. On this vast theatre upon which Gluck, Piccini, Sacchini, Spontini, had come in succession to enlarge the domain of the lyric tragedy created by Lully and Rameau, submitting their differing genius to the severe taste of the French traditions, Rossini came also to write four great chefs d'œuvre, and terminates his glorious career, by the marvel called William Tell.

It might have been thought that all the grand combinations of dramatic music were exhausted, and that after Rossini and Weber, so profoundly different from each other, a new transformation of the lyric drama was impossible. But such reasoning fails to take into account the inexhaustible fecundity of nature. Then was seen to appear a man patient, of profound genius, endowed at once with a powerful imagination and a rare delicacy of mind. German in origin and, by the sound musical education he had received, become a little Italian by sympathy and inclination, he is French by the logic of his eminently dramatic understanding. After several years of trials and doubts, of partial successes that give him some appreciation of his powers, he comes to Paris whither the diverse tendencies of his nature attract him, and reveals himself to the astonished world in a work Robert le Diable, which produced an immense excitement. The Huguenots, the Prophète and l'Etoile du Nord extend and fix his reputation. I know all that an exclusive and partial taste can say of the style, and often complicated manner of Meyerbeer. We have ourselves arrived at a complete understanding of his work, only through a strong desire of equity, believing, as Poussin says, that our appetites alone should not judge of the beauties of art, but our reason also. Because we are naturally inclined toward that family of delicate and harmonious geniuses, who purify reality by the ideal, and temper power by grace, the chaste, restrained and truly divine geniuses who are called Virgil, Raphael, Racine, Mozart, shall we fail to recognize the manly and robust geniuses, who rejoice in the expression of grandeur, in the painting of vigorous characters and complicated passions, like Michel Angelo, Shakespeare, Corneille and Beethoven?

Is not the first quality of a judge or a critic impartiality? I mean that impersonality that forgets for a moment its secret affections, its natural predilections, so as to see that only which is submitted to its judgment, and the better to comprehend the work and the artist that do not belong to the order of ideas and sentiments with which it easily sympathizes. What a poor spirit would that be, which, educated in the admiration of a Titian or an Andrea del Sarto, could not comprehend a Rembrandt, that mighty colorist who loves the contest of lights and shadows, great contrasts of chiar' oscuro, types more vigorous than noble, and scenes of bourgeoise life, whence he causes to spring a profound thought and a dramatic interest.

Such are likewise the qualities of the works and genius of Meyerbeer. He excels in rendering the contrasts of extreme situations, the mêlée and shock of diverse passions in a powerful whole, in creating vigorous types, such as Bertram, Marcel and Fidès, who engrave themselves on the imagination of all, whom no one can forget, and in filling his immense canvass with tumult, life and light. In what modern drama can be found a finer female character than that of Valentine in the Huguenots, or a more touching scene than the duo of the third act with Marcel? Does a more pathetic air exist than the Grâce in Robert or a tableau more poetic and novel than the act of the Nuns in the same great work? I say nothing of the fourth act of the Huguenots, one of the finest pages of dramatic music in existence; but the divertissement and grand scene in the church, of the Prophète as well as the military scene in l'Etoile du Nord, are these not the production of an imagination more supple and more various than it is supposed to be? Meyerbeer is reproached with being wanting in melody. Certainly he has not the melody of everybody, those commonplaces that travel through the streets, and which the old troubadours love to repeat to the accompaniment of their cracked guitars. A dramatic musician above all, Meyerbeer could say, with Gluck, to his critics, "If I have succeeded in pleasing the theatre, I have attained the end I had in view, and I assure you that it concerns me little that my music does not please in a concert or in a saloon," (Life of Gluck, by Auton Schmid, p. 426.) A great tactician, a colorist full of relief, Meyerbeer could also add these words which the author of Armide said to a friend; "you should know that music in its melodic part, possesses very few resources. It is impossible, by the mere succession of notes that form the character of melody to depict certain passions." This is what album composers and the makers of canzonets do not understand; but the public, that for thirty years has applauded the works of Meyerbeer, listens only to the emotion it experiences and leaves to journalists the smartness that they was to in denying the brightness of day, and the power of so great a master.

In an age of great revolutions, of universal renovation, in which politics, poetry, science and the arts have extended the horizon of life and enlarged the bounds of the universe, music and especially dramatic music, has also renewed its forms, vivified its colors, and multiplied the number of its characters. Between Weber and Rossini, who have a manner of proceeding so unlike, and whose immortal works express a world of ideas and sentiments so opposite, Meyerbeer has succeeded in creating for himself a profound and original personality. The opera of the Pardon de Ploërmel far superior to l'Etoile du Nord, is in our opinion of all his works the most simple, the most agreeable and the most freely melodious author of Robert and the Huguenots.

Russian Composers.

BORTNIANSKY.—GLINKA.

In Russia, as in all other European countries, the earliest music is the music of the Church, and the most ancient musical document in Russia is a canticle composed in honor of two Russian princes who were canonized in the eleventh century. The manuscript of this canticle was discovered not very long since in the monastery of St. Sergius, near Moscow, and Count Dmitri Tolstoi, who has published a highly interesting work on the subject of early Russian music, argues with reason that it must have been written in Russia, inasmuch as no one out of Russia would have taken any interest in the canonization of two Russian princes. In the course of time the music of the Russian Church, which had originally been borrowed from Byzantium, lost much of its oriental character; and towards the end of the seventeenth century, the adoption of the European scale, together with the imitation of Italian models, had so transformed it, that the Patriarch of Constantinople felt it necessary to send a choir to Moscow, with the view of restoring the ancient Greek chants, of which the tradition had been lost. But the Constantinople choir did not succeed in their mission, and, indeed, the Russian Church music needed a reform of a very different nature from that contemplated by the Patriarch and his vocalists. Without going back to the antiquated and unsuitable Greek style, it was highly desirable not to continue the imitation of the Italians, which involved a complete sacrifice of words to music; for, in addition to the natural differences between the Russian and Italian languages, it must be remembered that the service of the Roman Church is in verse, whereas that of the Russian is in prose. Bortniansky was the first Russian composer who went seriously to work to harmonize and re-arrange the ancient and disorganized church music of his country. "The times were out of joint;" but it was not Bortniansky, it was Lvoff, the composer of the Russian national hymn, who was "born to set them right," and who in his twelve volumes of church-music, has adapted the ancient chants to the rhythm of the Russian words, so that they are now pronounced correctly, in the order in which they occur in the service, and without repetition. Bortniansky, however, after his return from Italy where he spent eleven years, wrote for the Russian Church the first music that it possesses; among other things a Mass in three parts, and forty-five Psalms, in four and in eight parts. During his residence in Italy, Bortniansky appears to have composed operas, symphonies, sonatas, but no music of a strictly religious character; this, however, was the style in which he excelled and to which he exclusively devoted himself after his appointment as Director of the Imperial Choir, an office in which he was preceded by Sallieri. Many who do not know the name of Bortniansky, are, nevertheless, familiar with some of his compositions, which have been adopted by the Roman church, and may be heard in the churches of Paris, and, for all we know to the contrary, in those of Italy.

The name of Michael Glinka is not new to the constant and scrupulous readers of the Musical World. About a year ago we published an article from the pen of a highly esteemed contributor, on seventeen of his (Glinka's, not our contributor's) songs, being either detached compositions, or selections from the operas of Rossian and Loodmila and Tizne za Tzarya. We also printed, a few months since, an article on the strange fortunes of the said Rossian and Loodmila, of which the end was, that the scenery, costumes, score, and orchestral parts of the work were burned in the fire that destroyed the Tsirk theatre last year. The charming trio by Glinka, performed at Prince Galitzin's concert, is from Tizne za Tzarya, or Life for the Tzar—an opera founded on the story of the peasant Ivan Soussannin, who when Michael, the first of the Romanoffs, was being pursued by the Poles (at that time the oppressors, not the oppressed, of Russia), misled the invaders, so that the Czar was able to escape, and refused, though put to the torture, to inform them of the route the Czar had taken.—Musical World.

Fétis on Beethoven.

As a specimen of the care with which M. Fétis has set about the task of remodelling his great work, La Biographie Universelle des Musiciens, by incorporating with the new edition everything that struck him as worth appropriating, we may cite (inter alia) the paragraph relating to Beethoven's celibacy, and the causes generally assigned for that self-imposed privation on the part of the illustrious composer. In the first edition the matter is disposed of in a few brief sentences: "Beethoven"—it informs us—"never married; M. de Seyfried even asserts that he was never known to have had any tender attachment. The author of the present Biography, nevertheless, remembers being told by Joseph Woelfl (the pianist and composer—once a pupil of Beethoven's), of a certain lady to whose house Beethoven used frequently to go in his youth, and to whom he was very much attached, though he never confessed it. He appeared stung with jealousy whenever compliments were addressed by any other persons to the object of his attachment. In such cases the pianoforte was the depository of his thoughts, and was made to reflect the storm that raged within him. A single look from the lady, however, accompanied by a few kind words, brought back tranquility to his heart, and caused sweet melodies to succeed the harsh discords of his impetuous and passionate soul."

In the second edition, this paragraph is enriched with a quantity of new and valuable matter. Dr. Wegeler, the friend of Beethoven's childhood and youth, never recollected him without some attachment, and generally one which exercised a great influence on his thoughts and actions. (Beethoven war nie ohne Liebe, und meistens von ihr im hohem Grade ergriffen.) Schindler, "Ami di Beethoven," also his Boswell and biographer, not only admits this assertion to be correct, but furnishes confirmatory details of considerable interest. The objects of Beethoven's regard were always, it would seem, persons of high rank, a circumstance accounted for by the nobleness of his disposition, and his frequent intercourse with the upper classes of society. His love, however, was always Platonic; the heart and the imagination were chiefly concerned the senses playing but a subordinate part in the drama. For several years, Beethoven was attached to Mlle. Julie de Guicciardi, who afterwards married the Count de Yallenberg, and to whom he dedicated his sonata in C sharp minor, (the well-known Mondscheins, or "Moonlight sonata.") Some letters written in the summer of 1806, from a watering-place in Hungary, whither the great composer had repaired in the hopes of finding a remedy for his deafness, and published in Schindler's Biography, tend to show that in this instance, at least, Beethoven's love was reciprocated. Schindler mentions also an affaire de cœur between Beethoven and the Countess Marie d'Erklady, to whom he dedicated the grand trios in E flat and D, Op. 70. Ferdinand Ries, too—Beethoven's favorite pupil, and who lived with him for a long time on the most intimate terms—says, that his master's love-fits were seldom of very long duration, and that the most lasting evidence of constancy he could cite did not outlive seven months! Beethoven's passion for Mlle. de Guicciardi, nevertheless—with deference to Ries and Wegeler—retained its hold on him for years. These additions to the chapter of love in Beethoven's "Life" greatly enhance its value. M. Fétis touches on the subject of Beethoven's friendships, about which the first edition of the Biographie Universelle was altogether silent. The illustrious musician seems to have been no less sensible to friendship than to love, but was so extremely sensitive, even on the most trifling points, that his self-esteem was easily wounded, and he would quarrel with his best friends. His brothers, who frequently disturbed his tranquility, and were the cause of his greatest annoyances, took delight in poisoning his mind with doubts about those for whom he entertained the sincerest affection, in order themselves to sway him the more completely to their purposes. Beethoven used to listen too readily to their insinuations, and instead of demanding a frank explanation, would sulk and repel by his coolness those against whom he fancied he had grounds of complaint. If, however, any one succeeded in persuading him of his error, he at once hastened to confess he had done wrong, implore forgiveness, and make every atonement in his power, with cheerfulness and alacrity. Although exceedingly attached to the friends of his youth, years sometimes elapsed without his even thinking of them.

One of his letters to M. Wegeler, the companion of his infancy, involves a confession that he had not written to that intimate friend even once during the space of seven years. Although almost as intimate with Schenck, the first who explained to him the defects of his musical education, he would appear to have forgotten his mentor altogether, when, one day, walking on the Boulevards at Vienna, he met Schenck, of whom he had lost sight for nearly twenty years. Mad with joy at once more meeting so old and true a friend, who for aught he knew might have been already in the grave, Beethoven dragged him into a neighboring wine-shop (at the sign of the Hunter's Horn), and, calling for wine, with a gushing outburst of feeling, as of youth, the generally taciturn and abstracted artist abandoned himself to uncontrollable gaiety, and narrated, in uninterrupted succession, an almost endless series of stories and anecdotes. After an hour thus spent in mutual unconstrained expansion, Schenck and Beethoven separated, never to meet again. This took place in 1824, in less than three years after which period the great "tone-poet" had ceased to exist.

The chapters on love and friendship are followed by one devoted to Beethoven's family relations. The characteristic anecdotes follow—of which, by the way, M. Fétis has made a most discreet and appropriate selection; and finally, we have a chronological catalogue of Beethoven's works, followed by an examination of the biographies, essays, appreciations, and other writings on the subject. If the rest of the new edition of La Biographie Universelle des Musiciens be on a par with the article "Beethoven," it will be no less a book of inestimable value than of unexampled labor and research.—Musical World.

Beethoven.

BY THEODOR HAGEN.

In July, 1805, Cherubini arrived with his wife in Vienna, in order to write for the theater an der Wien a new opera, Fäniska, which was performed for the first time in February, 1806. The Cherubinis were of course well received by Beethoven, who held the composer of the Water-Carrier in great esteem, which was never very warmly reciprocated, and which led some people to the strange assertion, that Beethoven, in his opera Fidelio, had taken the Italian's music for a model. It was in November, 1805, that the last-named opera made its appearance. The circumstances were not favorable. Although the female parts were well received, the male ones were so much the worse, the tenor having no voice, and the basso a very rough one, and no method. Besides, the nobility had left their residences, and among the masses a fear of the French soldiery prevailed, so that the audience at the performance of Fidelio consisted mostly of French officers. The opera was given three nights in succession, and the performance resumed only in March, 1806, under the title Leonore, and with some changes, as, for instance, the contraction into two, instead of the former three acts; also the introduction of a new aria, by Pizarro in C, because the singer of this part had resolutely refused to sing the old one in B flat. Further, a duo in C, between Leonore and Marcelline, with obligato violin and violoncello accompaniment, as well as a conic trio between Rocco, Marcelline, and Jacquino were left out. Once more, on April the tenth, it was given, and then left to the dust in the library of the theatre, where it remained until 1814, when it was again performed for the benefit of three subordinate officials at the Imperial Opera-House. At this time, at Beethoven's own instigation, several alterations had been made. We quote his own words, written to Friedrich Treitschke, artistic manager of the theatre: "The history of this opera is the most troublesome in the world. With most of it I am dissatisfied, and there is hardly a piece where I have not made attempts to lessen somewhat that dissatisfaction."

The performance was to take place May 23d; on the day before was to be the chief rehearsal, but the new overture in E was not yet written. The orchestra was ordered to rehearse this overture on the morning of the performance. Beethoven did not arrive. After a long delay, Treitschke took a carriage to fetch him, but he found him still in bed, in a profound sleep. At his side was a goblet with wine and biscuit in it; the sheets of the overture were strewn over the bed and on the floor. A candle, burnt out, showed that he had been at work till late in the night. The impossibility of finishing the work was at once settled, and instead of the new overture, the one to Prometheus was played.

In the evening Beethoven conducted, with conductor Umlant behind his back, to make right what the master's inability to hear made wrong. The applause was great, and increased with every performance. The seventh, on July 18th, was given for the benefit of Beethoven himself. It was on this occasion, that Rocco's air, "Gold is a fine thing," was performed for the first time, and the great aria of Leonore in E, with the three horns obligato, appeared in an altered state, in which it has since remained.

It must be mentioned here, that the artists engaged to sing in this opera at that time performed their task admirably. Mad. Milder Hauptmann, one of the greatest dramatic singers Germany ever had, sang Leonore; Michael Vogel, Pizarro, and Weinmüller, Rocco. Even the Italian Radochi, whose German was still worse than Vienna German generally is, in the tenor part of Florestan was entirely acceptable in voice, method, and figure. Unfortunately, soon after the successful resuming of Fidelio, Mad. Milder Hauptmann left Vienna in consequence of an engagement for life at the Royal Opera in Berlin, and the possibility of giving the opera to any satisfaction, became impossible. It was at least eight years before it could be again performed. It may be just as well to mention here a remark in Beethoven's own hand-writing, which was found amongst his papers: "The opera Fidelio, written anew, and improved in 1814, from March till May 15th."

Prince Galitzin.

Prince Galitzin advertises a "Russian Concert" for the 20th at St. James's Hall, and amateurs of music are asking one another who this Prince Galitzin is, and what this Russian Concert is to be that he proposes to give for the benefit of Garibaldi, and at which the Prince himself is to conduct. Some even go so far as to ask how it is that a Russian nobleman in such a position as Prince Galitzin occupies, ventures to get up an entertainment in honor of a man whom the despotic party in Austria and Russia regard as a rebel and a revolutionist of the worst kind. The late Czar would not precisely have smiled on a Russian prince who had announced a concert for the benefit of Garibaldi; but though the Garibaldi of 1860 is still the Garibaldi of 1848, the Emperor Alexander is not the Emperor Nicholas, nor is the Russia of the present day to be judged of by the Russia of the past reign.

As for the Prince Galitzin, who is to make his appearance on Wednesday at St. James's Hall, he is the son of Prince Nicolas Galitzin, to whom Beethoven dedicated three of his last quartets, and under whom Prince George (he of St. James's Hall) served against us and our quondam allies in the Crimean war. Prince George Galitzin has an estate at Tamboff, and has long paid especial attention to the musical education of his peasants. He himself teaches the children to sing, and admits those who have attained a certain proficiency into a choir which he has spent eighteen years in forming, and which includes every range of voice from the highest sopranos to lower basses, by at least half an octave than are met with in this country or in Italy. These picked chorists—of whom, when we heard them four years ago at Moscow there were as many as eighty, of all sizes and ages—are excellent musicians, and read any part music at sight. That they have a good knowledge of harmony may be inferred from the fact, that they will sing any chord of four notes in any key on the chord being named, and without hearing it struck. This was shown at the time of the coronation of the Emperor Alexander, in Prince Galitzin's house at Moscow, where the Tamboff choir sang various sacred compositions by Mozart, Bortniansky, &c., and afterwards underwent a sort of examination in the presence of Oulibicheff, Jossa, the chef d'orchestre of the Théâtre Français, Durand, the organist of the Pantheon, Lablache, Tagliafico, and a number of other musicians and amateurs. A variety of chords were named, all of which were satisfactorily given by the singers. The service of the Russian Church is sung without accompaniment, and Prince Galitzin's singers, who are, above all, singers of sacred music, are in the habit of performing without the aid of any instrument. Several times at the conclusion of a long piece the Prince verified the final chord at the piano, when it appeared that, contrary to all precedent, the voices had not fallen even the eighth part of a note.

Another remarkable thing in the performance of these Tamboff singers, is the manner in which, in certain compositions, they do, or rather do not, take their breath. Thus, they will chant the creed or the Lord's Prayer from beginning to end without stopping to breathe even for an instant. Such at least is the effect upon the audience; but as the Galitzin chorists live, like the rest of us, by inhalation, we imagine the Prince must have arranged some system by which they take their breath in sections, say ten at a time, so that out of the eighty, seventy only are continually singing.

The advertisements do not set forth explicitly that Prince Galitzin has brought his chorists with him to London; but we know that it was his intention to do so, and if he has left them behind, all we can say is, that he had better telegraph for them to Tamboff without delay.—London Musical World.

The Organ.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

Then swelled the organ: up through choir and nave
The music trembled with an inward thrill
Of bliss at its own grandeur; waves on waves
In flood of mellow thunder rose, until
The hushed air shivered with the throb it gave;
Then, pausing for a moment, it stood still,
And sank and rose again to burst in spray
That wandered into silence far away.

Deeper and deeper shudders shook the air,
As the huge base kept gathering heavily,
Like thunder when it rouses in its lair,
And with its hoarse growl shakes the low-hung sky,
It grew up like a darkness everywhere
Filling the vast cathedral;—suddenly
From the dense mass a boy's treble broke
Like lightning, and the full-toned choir awoke.

Through gorgeous windows shone the sun afloat,
Brimming the church with gold and purple mist,
Meet atmosphere to bosom that rich chant,
Where fifty voices in one strand did twist
Their vari-colored tones, and left no want
To the delighted soul, which sank abysed
In the warm music cloud, while far below
The organ heaved its surges to and fro.

Popular Music of the Olden Time.*

(From the Quarterly Review.)

During the early part of the civil commotions in the time of Charles I., the ballad-writers, who, distinguished from the literary poets, continued to exist in full vigor, were apparently on the side of the Parliament. They found a good unpopular figure ready made to their hands in the person of Archbishop Laud, and pandered to the rabble by squibbing that obnoxious prelate; but when an ordinance went forth not only for the suppression of stage-plays but also for seizing upon all ballad-mongers, the poets of the people found that they had sided with the wrong party. Chief on the list of royal rhymesters is Martin Parker, whose song "The king shall enjoy his own again" became a kind of party anthem among the Cavaliers, and whose name was so famous among his enemies that ballad-writers in general were stigmatized as Martin Parker's society, and perhaps formed an actual corporation.

Ritson, who considered Parker a "Grub-street scribbler," cannot help styling the "King shall enjoy his own again," the "most famous and popular air ever heard of in this country." The tune to which the words are written was already popular as "Marry me, quoth the bonny lass," but there is no doubt that he first gave it general celebrity by his poem, to which many verses were afterwards added, in order to suit the circumstances of the party. Wildrake, the typical cavalier in Sir Walter Scott's Woodstock, has this party effusion ever on the tip of his tongue, and for nearly a century it is identified with the cause of the Stuarts. In the days of Charles I., is sustained the courage of the Cavaliers; on the restoration of Charles II., it celebrated their triumph; after the revolution of 1688, it kept alive the enthusiasm of the Jacobites. The Anti-Stuart song, which rivalled the Cavalier lyric in popularity, was the famous "Lilliburlero," which with words directed against the Irish papists, first became significant about 1688, and was afterwards whistled into immortality by Sterne's Uncle Toby.

The line of demarcation that so distinctly separated the cultivated from the uncultivated lover of music, was to a great measure obliterated on the restoration of Charles II. Professors of the science now essayed to please the many as well as the few; the learned tuneless counterpoint which was the pride of an earlier day fell into disuse, and melody began to assert a supremacy over more scientific combinations. The gittern, now called the "guitar," encroached upon the domain of the more unwieldy lute, and the six-stringed viol yielded to the violin, which had hitherto been almost exclusively employed in accompaniment to dancing. This exchange of the viol for the violin denoted a change in the character of the music performed. As Mr. Chappell says:—

"The reason why viols had been preferred to violins, tenors, and violoncellos for chamber music was simply this: until the reign of Charles II., the music played was in close counterpoint of limited compass for each instrument, and in from three to six parts, every visitor being expected to take a part, and generally at sight. The frets of the viols secured the stopping in tune, which one indifferent ear in the party might otherwise have marred."

Viols, it may be remarked, were not all of the same size. A set, or "chest," as it was termed, contained instruments of five or six different dimensions to suit different registers.

The lighter instrument, as we shall presently find, gained its ascendancy through the introduction of French taste; but the stringed instrument played with a bow,—and which, without distinction of size or register, we may generally term a fiddle,—is of native British growth. The Anglo-Saxons called it a fithle (with the soft "th" represented by the obsolete ö), and the Normans, suppressing the middle consonants altogether, reduced the word to "fiele," the obvious parent of "viol." But why talk of Normans, when we have the following lines by an Italian poet, Venantius, who, towards the end of the sixth century, thus addressed Loup, Duke of Champagne?—

"Romanæque lyra plaudet tibi, Barbarus harpa, Græcus Achillæa, chrotta Britannia canat."

The "chrotta" was the "crowd" or primitive fiddle, the name of which is so familiar to the readers of Hudibras, and it differed from the modern instrument by the absence of a neck. An aperture was made so as to admit the left hand of the player through the back and enable him to form the notes by the pressure of the strings upon the finger-board.

The very circumstance that the violin had previously been associated with dancing, would seem to have been a recommendation with Charles II., who, according to Roger North, loved no music but that of the dancing kind, and put down all advocates for the fugal style of composition, with the unanswerable question, "Have I not ears?" A band of twenty-four violins (including tenors and basses), who merrily accompanied his meals, and even enlivened his devotions in the Chapel Royal, originally suggested the comic song, "Four-and-twenty fiddlers all of a row," that has lasted down to the present day. These innovations were deemed offensive by gentlemen of the old school, and the sober Evelyn was greatly shocked, when, in December, 1662, at the conclusion of the sermon, "instead of the ancient gravo and solemn wind-music accompanying the organ, was introduced a concert of twenty-four violins, between every pause, after the French fantastical light way; better suiting a tavern or play-house than a church." Unfortunately, too, the predilection of a king for French fiddlers formed part of his anti-national tendency, and was carried to such an extent, that John Banister, who had been leader of the twenty-four, was dismissed for saying, on his return from Paris, that the English violins were better than the French. Nor was this sacrifice of national feeling a tribute to superior accomplishment in the foreigner. France was the country least celebrated in Europe as the birth-place of musicians; and, while English gentlemen were not deemed properly educated unless they could play difficult music at sight, the twenty-four professional musicians who recreated the "Grand Monarque," and where the model on which Charles II. fashioned his own band, were not able to play anything they had not especially studied. But the French tickled the ears of the royal voluptuary by their dance-tunes, which the old contrapuntal "fantasies," as they were called, did not; and there was the end of all controversy.

A taste for the vocal music of Italy is, however, much older than the Restoration, and recitative, which is notoriously of Italian origin, was found indispensable in the Court Masques that were given during the reign of James I. and Charles I. As early as 1653, Henry Lawes, the friend of Milton and Waller, and the representative of native genius, was roused to an indignant protest, which with small variations has been repeated down to the present day.

"Wise men," says Lawes, "have observed our nation so giddy that whatsoever is native, be it ever so excellent, must lose its taste, because themselves have lost theirs. For my part, I profess (and such as know me can bear witness), I desire to render every man his due, whether stranger or native; and without depressing the honor of other countries, I may say our own nation hath had, and yet hath, as able musicians as any in Europe. I confess the Italian language may have some advantage by being better smoothed and vowelled for music, which I found by many songs which I set to Italian words, and our English seems a little overlogged with consonants, but that's much the composer's fault, who, by judicious setting and right turning the words, may make it smooth enough. This present generation is so sated with what is native that nothing takes their ear but what's sung in a language they understand as little as they do the music."

The same Henry Lawes, with Matthew Lock and Captain Henry Cook, composed the music to Davenant's Sirge of Rhodes, the story of which was told in recitative, and which was an opera in the strictest sense of the word. The work was performed in a room at the Earl of Rutland's house, in Aldersgate, in the year 1656, and preceded by thirteen years the establishment of opera in France. Indeed, Louis XIV. himself gave acknowledged precedence to the English, when in 1669 he granted to the Sieur Perrin the patent (afterwards withdrawn) for the establishment of an academy for the cultivation of public theatrical singing (pour chanter en public des pièces de Théâtre), as practised in Italy, Germany, and England. People who love to remark that tragedy was first introduced into France by Cardinal Richelieu may take pleasure in observing that the first English opera was licensed by Cromwell. To the fact that the performance took place in a room may be attributed this extraordinary liberality, of which we find traces among the religionists of the present day. The families, who hold theatres in abhorrence, yet patronize the most worldly and frivolous "entertainments" given in halls and galleries.

To the suppression of the theatres by the Puritans, and to the dispersions of musicians generally during the Civil Wars, may be traced the origin of public concerts. Having no other means of earning a subsistence, the musicians betook themselves to the taverns, which now became the sole places where music could be heard, and were much frequented on that account. However, a law like that which had formerly annihilated the minstrels of the ancient school, was now put in force against these hapless enterers for public amusement. By an Act passed in 1656-7 against "vagrants, and wandering, idle, dissolute persons" (our legislators always added insult to injury when dealing with music and the drama), it was ordered that "if any person or persons, commonly called fiddlers or minstrels, shall at any time after the first of July be taken playing, fiddling, and making music in any inn, alehouse, or tavern, or shall be taken performing themselves or desiring or enticing any person or persons to hear them play, or make music in any of the places aforesaid, they shall be treated as rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars. The poor wretches were not only forbidden to make music, but they might not ask to be heard; and the frequenters of taverns no longer amused by others were driven to their own vocal resources, which, thanks to their education, were not small. Part-songs, catches, and canons thus become the order of the day, and the proficiency of our forefathers in singing at sight is attested by the fact that there was seldom any difficulty in finding the requisite number of voices. On the restoration of Charles II., the obstacles to the development of professional talent were removed, but, nevertheless, the vocal performances of amateurs continued in full vigor. In the very first place of entertainment at which music was regularly played—a place situated (according to North) in a lane behind St. Paul's—shopkeepers and freemen were wont to sing in concert, mellowing their voices with ale and tobacco. The next experiment, which was made in Whitefriars, was of a more professional nature, the engaged "talent" being so excessively modest, that they were inclosed in a box, surrounded by curtains that rendered them invisible. The patrons of art paid an entrance fee, and ordered what refreshment they pleased. Here we have the exact prototype of the Canterbury Halls of the present day, save that the shamefacedness of the musicians has had no modern imitators.

The vocal music sung by the amateurs who frequented taverns in the time of Charles II. was usually taken from the now scarce collection of rounds and catches published by John Playford. A similar collection of rounds and catches had been published by Ravenscroft in the time of James I., but it was not till after the Restoration that the practice of writing catches became prevalent among great composers.

The Nine O'clock Bell.

It is a beautiful custom which prevails in many towns and villages in New England,—this ringing of the church bells at the good, wholesome hour of nine o'clock in the evening. It is an observance, too, sanctioned by time-honored usage,—handed down to us by our puritan fathers,—redolent of antiquity, and of those good old days when people went to rest betimes, slept soundly and sweetly upon hard beds, and arose with the sun, or the larks, if you please.

There is to us something inexpressibly pleasant in this ringing of the bells at nine o'clock, and we never pass a night in a strange village, but we feel more at home in it—more tranquil and fitted for repose, if we chance to hear at the usual time some faithful sentiment in a neighboring steeple, sending forth its evening chime. There is more than we think in the power of early associations. We never forget the mellow tones of the church bell which graced the belfry of the village church in our native hamlet. Its cadences will ever and anon sound in our ears all our lives long, though many dreary miles of land or sea make a gulf between us and our early home.

Who has not some particular bell in his memory, which to his boyish eyes seemed the largest bell upon earth? What an interest it had in his eyes! How he watched with eagerness for its ringing, and with what a feeling of curiosity, mingled with awe, he mounted, for the first time, the rickety staircase, wound his way up through the unfurnished garret, and stood face to face with the object of his admiration; or looked down from the dizzy height upon mother earth far below, and the blue hills in the distance, standing up like armed sentinels against the sky. What a variety of cadences the old bell possessed! On gala-days it rang a merry peal, and the child's heart leaped for joy. On the Sabbath its tones were more solemn and majestic, according well with the solemnity of the day and seeming to say to all within the sound of its voice, "this is none other than the house of prayer, the very gate of heaven;" but when it tolled the knell of a departed soul, the tones were sad and mournful, dying away upon the air with a tremulous sound, like a mourner's sob.

We have read that the travellers in foreign lands with the broad ocean rolling between them and home, have sometimes awakened at night, and seemed to hear the church bells ringing in their homes beyond the sea, and so real did it seem to them, that it was difficult to dispel the illusion, if such it be. May it not be possible that in certain peculiar states of the mind,—that wonderful creation of a divine hand,—the faculties become so acute, so intensified, the delicate nerves of sensation so enhanced in power, that time and space are annihilated, and we are borne on the wings of the wind as it were, very near our home and friends. It was not all an illusion when the heroine of that most delightful novel—Jane Eyre—seemed to hear the voice of Rochester calling to her in the darkness. Who has not in his own experience known instances similar to this, of those who heard voices in the night-watches, and gained strength and courage thereby.

"Perched God's right hand in that darkness,
And were lifted up and strengthened."

One need not go to the city for sweet-toned, musical bells. In many of the rural villages of the north country, we may hear as rich, full tones,—as harmonious cadences as ever fell upon the listening air of evening from cathedral dome or lofty church-spire. It is after all, the associations, the memories awakened, that render the tones of even a diminutive bell more majestic and soul-moving than organ music to our ears.

We recollect one bell in an obscure country village whose mellow tones will live forever in our heart. In the clear evenings of mid-summer, as the shadows deepened along the landscape and the stars peeped out one by one "in the infinite meadows of heaven," its clear, silvery tones might be heard echoing among the hills, proclaiming the hour of nine o'clock, and saying not inaudibly, to all the dwellers round about, "The night cometh; sleep on now and take your rest, for all is well!" It is impossible to describe the tranquillizing influence its tones exerted—the happy recollections it awakened in the hearts of those who nightly listened to its welcome music. At such a time, under the clear sky of a mid-summer night,

"The friendships old and the early loves
Come back with a Sabbath sound as of doves
In quiet neighborhoods."

Let us cherish with a feeling akin to veneration anything that tends to occasionally separate us from the busy toil and strife of life's battle,—soothe and calm our troubled spirits, and fit us for repose! Long may it be before the time-hallowed customs die out in New England which sets the church bells a ringing at the good hour of nine o'clock, for with it would vanish one of the most valued associations of childhood.

"We may build more splendid habitations,
Fill our rooms with paintings and with sculptures, but we cannot Buy with gold the old associations."

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Government is expending a great deal of money on the Grand Opera. The opera "Semiramis," in which the two sisters Marchisio are to make their appearance, will be gotten up in a style of magnificence such as has never been seen before, even here, where we have witnessed more than one folly in the way of operatic decoration. All books, all medals, all engravings, all drawings on Babylon have been consulted and analyzed, and Mons. Flandrin, who visited these countries on a mission given by the Government, has been appointed inspector of the scene painters. Consequently we shall have as faithful a representation of Babylon as it is possible to obtain. The scenery of the first act represents Babylon as it was in 1916 B. C., that is, in all its splendor—a splendor by the side of which Martin's most extravagant pictures and Piranesi's most extravagant architectural dreams seem tame and commonplace and dwarfed. Another decoration, which is not less poetical and not less immense than the scenery of the first act, is a representation of the hanging gardens of Babylon. The decoration of the third act represents a crypt which seems of infinite extent, and which the scene painters have attempted to make as gloomy and terrible as possible—this is the burial-place of the Assyrian Kings. Ninus's tomb will likewise produce a great effect. Ninus's ghost will appear at the summit of a gigantic staircase reaching heaven, and lighted by the most fantastic fires of modern pyrotechny. The costumes will be accurate and of unheard of splendor. The recitatives added to the score are by M. Carafa. Strange to say, it has been impossible to find a complete score of the opera. When Rossini composed it there was no such thing as musical engraving in Italy. The copyist of the theatre copied the scores for other theatres, and usually made a great deal more money by copying the scores than the composer made by writing them—as is still the case in the United States, where copyists get a great deal more from copying plays than the author dreams of receiving. The copies of opera scores made by those mechanics of ink were extremely incorrect and generally very incomplete: as most theatres had very small orchestras they usually purchased only the score of the instruments found in their orchestra. The quartet of stringed instruments was always complete, and more attentively copied than the rest, which was copied as God please. Rossini recently told one of his friends that the Italian opera here had not, and consequently never played, the opera as he wrote it. The Grand Opera has made every possible research to procure a correct score; its agents have examined the libraries of the best Italian opera houses, and the score it has obtained is believed to be nearly perfect. Galli, a famous singer in his day, "created" the leading masculine part; he was so much overcome by emotion that he sang constantly in too high a key: he was conscious of it, but he could not avoid it. Rossini was on the stage; but when the curtain fell Galli dared not go near him; Rossini saw his embarrassment, and running up to him with open arms, exclaimed: "Veni porco! give us a hug! you've sung magnificently false this evening!" The first allegro of the overture is a master piece overflowing with gaiety, youth, fire and joy. Rossini has taken the motivo of this allegro for the funeral march he has composed for his interment! His idea is, he is in the coffin, but sensible; he recalls his brilliant youth, he takes the most admired work of that period of his life, he veils it with crape, and turns it into a dead march, as if he'd make his youth weep for his death. This funeral march is of a power, a grandeur, a sadness which cannot be expressed; the auditor seems to hear all the great operas, the composer's immortal daughters, clad in thick black and wailing their father's departure from life. The idea seems at first of indecent levity; but when it is explained doesn't it appear poetical, and beautiful, and appropriate? Great embarrassment was felt about the music for the dancing, as there was none in the original score, and Rossini would not write any now, and as the Grand Opera was averse from interpolating any music foreign to the original score. However, by dint of patient researches the score of a cantata was found written by Rossini for his first wife, M<sup>lle</sup>. Colbrand, in 1818, to celebrate the return of the Bourbons to Naples. This cantata was composed of dances and songs. The sisters of Marchisio are said to be women of most extraordinary talents; they command at rehearsals the applause of the orchestra and their comrades. Mons. Meyerbeer, however, does not think them equal to singing his long promised L'Africain, which he offered to M<sup>lle</sup>. Cruvelli. Speaking of her, I may mention her husband, Baron Vigier, bought the other day "Garibaldi's House" at Nice for $26,000. Garibaldi always inhabited this house when he visited his birth place. It is on the Boulevard de l'Imperatrice.—Corr. of the New Orleans Picayune.

M. Wicart, the Belgian tenor, whose re-engagement at the Grand Opera I announced in my last, made his appearance last Friday as Arnold in Guillaume Tell. A great deal of curiosity was felt, to ascertain whether this artist had indeed made all the progress attributed to him since his first appearance in Paris. The result has proved in excess of what ever was anticipated, and so decided was his success that the strongest desire is expressed that he should in future make Paris his artistic home. His voice is of considerable extent, powerful, and especially clear and telling in the upper notes. In the celebrated air, "Asile héréditaire," followed by the stretta, "Amis, secondez ma vaillance," which is the trying piece of the part, and the one which would decide the character of his success, Wicart was enthusiastically applauded and several times re-called. He is to appear again in the same opera, and then twice as Raoul in the Huguenots; his engagement being only for four nights. I understand that the report of the commissioners appointed to make enquiries as to the most suitable locality for the new Opera House has been sent in, and that the decision is in favor of the site on the Boulevard des Capucines. The commission consisted of the following personages, M. Chaix d'Estance, chairman; M. Cristie, architect; and MM. Cornudet, Eugène Scribe, Varin, L. Véron, and Denière. Herold's maiden triumph at the Opéra Comique, Les Rosières, just revived, as I mentioned last week for the first time since 1826, is still running and meets with increased success every night. It is admirably executed, every part being well filled.—London Musical World, June 23.

BERLIN.—A very intelligent friend of mine, who holds an important post at the Court of Berlin, and of whose musical knowledge—amateur as he is—I am decidedly jealous, gives me some account of the operatic doings in that city. Marschner's opera of The Templar and the Jewess has just been revived. This is decidedly the most popular work of the composer, but on its first appearance it had to struggle against the influence of two such redoubtable rivals as Weber and Spohr, and consequently it was never appreciated at its just value. Marschner has now had his revenge, and has compelled the public to acknowledge the dramatic power which characterizes many of the pieces in this opera, the gracefulness of its melody and the richness of its instrumentation. Mad. Koester played the part of Rebecca and added fresh lustre to her reputation. Kreutzer's opera of A Night at Granada has been played at Kroll's establishment with great success. Stradella (Flotow's) is still attracting crowded audiences, and is being played both at the Frederick William Theatre and at Kroll's. The duo between the two brigands and the hymn to the Virgin are regularly honored with an encore whenever they are heard. It is the success of Martha over again. This is encouraging to Mr. Gye, who is to bring out Stradella during the present season. By the way, it is said here that he (Mr. Gye) has engaged Graziani for two seasons, 1861 and 1862, at the rate of 10,000*fr.* a month; you will better come at the truth of this than I.—Ibid.

VIENNA.—But to return to my German correspondent's budget of news. The Italian opera at Vienna closes on the 28th of the month, and next season the Pardon de Ploërmel will be produced, with Mad. Frassini as Dinorah.—Ibid.

MUNICH.—The Pardon has been played at Munich with M<sup>lle</sup>. Schazbach as the heroine. Gluck's Iphigenia in Aulis is announced here, and M<sup>lle</sup>. Stoeger is to sing the principal part. The Oratorio Society of Munich have brought their season to a close. Bach's Christmas Cantata and fragments of Handel's Susannah were given at the last performance. At Trieste, Mad. Amelia Jackson had just made her debut in Robert le Diable as Isabella, and obtained a legitimate success.—Ibid.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The programme of Monday evening's concert (the fifth and last but one of the season) was as follows:—

Sinfonia in E flat, No. 5.....	Mozart
Song—"The Quail," Mr. Tennant.....	Beethoven
Concerto in A minor, pianoforte, Herr Ritter.....	Hummel
Aria—"Vedrai carino," Mad. Borghi-Mamo.....	Mozart
Overture—"Isles of Fingal".....	Mendelssohn
Sinfonia in A, No. 7.....	Beethoven
Recit. and Aria—"Ah, come rapida," Mad. Borghi-Mamo.....	Meyerbeer
Concertino, violoncello, M. Paque.....	G. Goldmann
Overture—"Prometheus".....	Beethoven
Conductor—Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

—Ibid.

PRINCE GEORGE GALITZIN'S CONCERT.—This concert, of the holder and object of which we have already given some account, took place on Wednesday afternoon in St. James's Hall. Though its announcement did not, as we expected it would have done, fill the hall to overflowing, yet the audience was large, and many distinguished persons were present. Prince Galitzin, on presenting himself in the orchestra in the capacity of conductor of the concert, was received with loud and prolonged acclamations. He is a man of a striking aspect; tall, stout, and portly, with a handsome and noble countenance, and an air of great dignity. He conducted the performances with the skill of a practised musician, wielding his baton of command with remarkable grace, and beating the measure with very great clearness and precision. Altogether, this high-born stranger did not disappoint the expectations of those who were led by his illustrious name—which is a household word among musical amateurs—to look at him with curiosity and interest. The concert consisted wholly of Russian music, unknown in this country, but calculated to give a high idea of the state of the art in the far North. Several of the pieces were composed by Prince Galitzin, and showed him to be—not a mere amateur, but a thorough artist, possessed of original genius and great technical acquirements. A chorus "Santa Maria," which opened the concert was a piece of ecclesiastical harmony equally remarkable for purity of style and grandeur of effect. There was, too, a charming Romance with an "obligato" accompaniment for the violoncello, sung by Mad. Sainton-Dolby, and accompanied by M. René Douay, which enchanted the audience; and there was lastly a waltz for the orchestra, which, in vigor, brilliancy, and masterly treatment, reminded us of the best things of poor Jullien. In short, this illustrious amateur showed himself a master of every style of music. Besides these compositions of Prince Galitzin, there were several superb choral pieces of Bortniansky, a composer whose renown has reached this country, and whose music ought to be better known among us; and there were two specimens of Glinka, a famous dramatic composer of the day; one, a beautiful trio from a Russian opera, sung by Miss Louisa Pyne, Signor Mongini, and Mr. Patey; and the other a mazurka, played with remarkable grace and brilliancy by Miss Arabella Goddard, who was enthusiastically called upon to repeat it, but contented herself by gracefully acknowledging the compliment. Though the concert consisted of modern compositions, they were, for the most part, strongly marked with the Russian national character, a circumstance which enhanced their interest. The performances were received with the greatest enthusiasm; most of them, indeed, were encored, and at the conclusion Prince Galitzin retired from the orchestra amidst thunders of applause from all parts of the hall.—Ibid.

HERR STRAUSS AT THE MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The first appearance at these concerts of a violinist with such legitimate claims to notice as Herr Strauss (from Frankfort) must not be passed over without a line to record that it was eminently and deservedly successful. All genuine amateurs are acquainted with the Tenth Quartet of Beethoven, and know that it is one of the most difficult to play, no less than one of the most profound and poetical, of the seventeen master-pieces which the greatest of instrumental composers has bequeathed to the world of art. In this piece (which had already twice been led with great ability by M. Wieniawski at the Monday Popular Concerts) Herr Strauss made his coup d'essai before an audience become critical through the force of admirable examples, and so by no means easy to conciliate. Herr Strauss, however, in the first part of the first movement had done enough to satisfy all present that he was no mere flashy pretender, but, on the contrary, an artist of the foremost rank; while all the rest, up to the final variation of the theme of the concluding movement, was to match. Thus the Frankfort violinist was not "plucked," but passed his examination triumphantly. The decision was not just, Herr Strauss being not merely all that report had given out in his favor, but something more. Besides the Tenth Quartet, he played the Romance (No. 2), accompanied by Mr. Benedict on the piano-forte, and the Quartet in D major, the finest of the early set of six, numbered Op. 18, and the one which in certain places (instance the minuetto and trio) exercised an undoubted influence upon Mendelssohn.—Times.

THEODORE RITTER AT THE PHILHARMONIC.—The solo instrumentalists were Herr Ritter, a pianist quite new to this country, and M. Paque, the well-known violoncellist. The former was triumphantly successful, as he well deserved to be. The numerous disappointments we have experienced of late years with respect to "distinguished foreign pianists," whose visits to our shores were heralded by magnificent "puffs preliminary," each player being set down for the nonce as the greatest of the great, rendered us, we must own, somewhat special about the merits of Herr Ritter. We were thus surprised no less than delighted to find in this new performer a consummate master of his instrument—a pianist whose executancy presents a combination of manual agility with purity and elegance of style which not one player in a thousand attains to. Herr Ritter possesses, too, in its highest perfection, that gift of nature, a beautiful and sympathetic "touch." He handles his piano as though he loved it, and the piano seems to return his affection. The piece selected by Herr Ritter for his debut at the Philharmonic was Hummel's fine and far too rarely heard concerto in A minor. Herr Ritter could not have chosen more wisely. Nothing more thoroughly "pianistic" than this work exists; and perhaps there is none in which so much effect may be made in a natural and orthodox way by a legitimate pianist. We do not mean to say that Hummel's concerto in A minor is not "difficult" to play, for it demands graces of style and expression which none but a great artist can supply; but the florid passages, truly brilliant though they be, are all what is termed "grateful"—that is, they lie well under the fingers, and repay with interest whatever labor they may have exacted from the player. Herr Ritter was enthusiastically applauded, and recalled twice after his masterly performance.—Morning Post.

The Philharmonic Problem.

We yield the place of honor, with pleasure this week to the following communication from Mr. Ryan, the President of the Philharmonic Society, that his views upon this question may have as conspicuous display before our readers as have the remarks that have elicited this reply. We need not say, we trust, that nothing is further from the intentions and spirit of the "Journal of Music," than to misrepresent or prejudice the intentions or plans of this Society. The comments that have been made in our columns were such as were suggested by such information as had been vouchsafed to us of the constitution of the Society, and explanation has been already made as to those points in which we were misinformed or uninformed. Neither need this "Journal" say, that its best wishes and most earnest efforts, will always be cheerfully given to aid this endeavor of the new Society, to attain the desired success, or that whatever difference of opinion there may be as to what is the best plan, we shall not be behind hand in our exertions to forward the success of that which, for the time being, is adopted as such.

JOHN S. DWIGHT, ESQ.,—Dear Sir:—I have read with much interest your articles on the "Philharmonic problem," and as all music-lovers, and especially professional musicians, must regard it as a matter of great importance, I hope you will allow me the favor of expressing in your paper my views on the same subject, in order that the same readers may be able to judge after hearing both sides of the question; and though my views differ essentially from yours, yet I believe that we have an equal interest in the firm establishment of such a Society among us.

Before entering on the question at large, allow me to say a word in defence, not as President of the Philharmonic Society, but simply as a member. I admit your having made the amende honorable to our Society, for giving in your paper as articles in our constitution, matter that was not in the constitution, or thought of being introduced into it. Yet there is one more article which in your mind is an objectionable feature; namely that the Society is composed of orchestral performers only, and that none others can be members. I will simply say that the article relating to this matter reads thus, "The Society shall consist of sufficient professors of music to constitute a good orchestra." Now we do not mean by that, that such as play violins, flutes, clarinets, trumpets and the like, only can be members. No such idea runs through our constitution. It is sufficient that they be professors of music, good artists and serviceable ones to be admitted. For instance, we need piano players often as a portion of the full orchestra; and such artists would be all the more welcome, if they were as serviceable as our friends, Messrs. Timm and Scharfenberg of the New York Philharmonic Society, excellent pianists and most respectable in their double capacity in the Society, as big drum and cymbal beaters. Therefore if there are any of the "leading artists" of Boston who are willing to sacrifice themselves and work as hard for the cause as we shall, they have but to express a wish to become members of the Society, and there is little doubt of their election. Now who will be these "leading artists?" To say that we have always worked hard for the advancement of the cause of music in Boston, is no idle boast, if our friends will but remember the "Musical Fund Society." That society gave concerts for about five or six seasons, with an indefinite number of rehearsals, both private and public, without, I was going to add, the members receiving one cent. But I forgot; we one year received nine dollars, another year twenty-five dollars,—and that was the entire remuneration from those concerts for the five or six seasons that we were in active existence. We associated ourselves purely for art's sake, thinking that "we had a claim on the sympathy of those that value art, and that support would naturally flow in from all sides." We were mistaken, and I fear we will never see the day when "generous material support will never be wanting," though there were real friends then; they are still our friends, but for a city the size of Boston, we must respectfully say, that they are few in number. The public at large, upon whom the "material support" of large concerts really rests, deserted our standard in the hour of need, and went over to the enemy, the "Germania." That was proper in one sense, and was to be expected; theirs was a superior organization; but, on the other hand, does it prove that artists have only to show to the public the sincerity of their efforts, to receive every sympathy and large reward?

Notwithstanding all we have hitherto done for the cause, you still have no faith in our artistic intentions, and you plainly express it in your articles on the subject, that we as a body only care to increase our wages, by creating opportunities so to do. The "twelve dollar article" naturally gave rise to this in your mind. Now you have already, I concede, given the reason for the existence of such an article in the constitution, as it has been explained to you, viz., "to prevent the Government engaging in rash enterprises." So far, so good. In that sense, such a clause was imperative. But I will give still another reason why we ought as men and citizens, as well as artists to guard for the future, against laboring without remuneration, for none of us are in such a position that this absurdity can be expected of us, and yet I will aver Mr. Dwight, that the heart and kernel of our plan was not simply to make money.

You say "good symphony concerts are to the musician, what the White Mountains are to the painters." Precisely so! and yet can our brother painters afford to go to the mountains, spend their time in making sketches, studies, working them up into pictures of grace and beauty, and then return home to give them away to the picture loving public? By no means. They go to the mountains with the express intention of improving themselves in their art, of making the very best pictures their talents will allow them, with the equally express intention of selling them to the highest bidder. Yet they, none the less work for the true cause of art, as much as mortal man can, who must, to support life, have bread and butter. Now can any one censure them for all this? I think not. In fact, this matter of working for the progress of art, or any other good cause, and at the same time looking for a proper remuneration, can not be separated. It cannot I repeat be lost sight of, any more than we may expect the minister who preaches the gospel of Christ not to look for his wages, or the lawyer or doctor for their fees.

Why then can you expect a number of individuals to form themselves into a society, for the purpose of either educating or gratifying a large public, by the means of concerts, any more than you can expect an individual to give either matinees or soirees to a select number, for the same purpose without proper remuneration, though it may be considered ever so improving to the artists themselves? No example can be found of artists, (that is, all those who live by their art,) doing what you would have us do, because the nature and relations of men toward each other, are such, that it cannot be expected. It is perhaps unnecessary to illustrate this, as we all know what it means, especially when the butcher and baker send in their little bills. And now to come to the question itself—"Twelve dollars." Can any man say it is too much when he considers it as payment for a concert and four rehearsals; or in other words, for one evening and four afternoons. Given too at a season and the only one when the musician must make his harvest, and when his time is valuable? It is true we hope to realize more than that sum, but it is like "hoping against hope." Any one who knows the real labor attending the getting up of large concerts will immediately see that many of us will dearly earn our pay, before a single rehearsal or concert is held, yet will we work none the less for that, and shall still feel that our motives are as conscientious as those of any class of men in the performance of their duties. If we do not receive the support we expect, we will only hope at present that the fault cannot be laid at our doors.

We have formed a society according to the best plan, as we think, that the nature of institutions around us admits, and time only can prove whether we are correct or not in our opinion. And we stepped forward too in the cause, at a moment when there was every reason to suppose none others would.

You have objections to a Philharmonic Society composed of, and managed exclusively by professional artists. Our experience, and that of others in various cities, leads us to avoid, "councils of advice." No society is safely established that is composed of two (if not more) elements. I may here say, that it was the intention of our society, when the proper moment came, to invite to meet us all the most active music lovers in the city; to read to them our constitution, unfold our plans, and ask for their active coöperation and support, reserving to ourselves the immediate guidance of the whole working affairs of the society, because advice from non-professionals is not at all times practical, for the simple reason that every one knows his own business best. Concert giving, either exclusively or partly so, has been the business of some of us for many years, and consequently we may be supposed to have felt and watched the public pulse with great carefulness.

In my desire to defend our professional brethren from the very unfavorable opinion which you entertain of their intentions, I fear that I have already exceeded the length of a modest article, without at all touching on what I deem to be the most important feature of a Philharmonic Society, viz., the character of its programmes—now upon that the whole thing hinges—Ergo, the programme is "the kernel," it may be bitter and it may be sweet. Whatever kind of programme our Society will offer to its subscribers cannot here or at present be stated. But I will venture to say that we certainly shall make our selections with as careful weighing, and considering of the general circumstances, and the materials with which we have to work with, as any one can wish for. Bearing in mind even, that we have not a musical public such as may be found in London, Paris, Leipzig or Berlin to play for, neither have we an orchestra such as may there be found. For Boston is a small city yet, and though called the Athens of America is too poor to support a complete orchestra. On your part we could have wished Mr. Dwight, that you had allowed our scheme to go before the public on the strength of such reputation as we may have as individuals or collectively, instead of prejudging our intentions in a manner which, were we strangers in Boston, would have been of positive injury. But as we are not in that position Mr. Dwight, we do not fear that we have lost any ground, and I should not have felt the necessity of making so long a story now of this matter, if your readers were not numbered by thousands throughout the country, and not in a position to rightly judge us at a distance. Our Boston friends with whom we daily mingle, know us as we are, and what we strive to accomplish, but to those at a distance, many of whom are friends, self-respect required this effort at our hands; in order to not be mis-judged.

I cannot conclude, Mr. Dwight, without acknowledging the great interest you have ever shown in the cause of music in Boston, yet hoping you will believe there are others as purely actuated as yourself, among whom humbly hopes to be remembered, yours very truly,

THOMAS RYAN.

ST. MARY'S ACADEMY, ST. JOSEPH'S CO., IA. — On the afternoon of June 26, in compliance with the kind invitation of the Lady Superior, I found myself at the gate of St. Mary's Academy and an unexpected scene of beauty was here presented before me. The numerous buildings at St. Mary's almost hidden in verdure is a sight indeed refreshing to a denizen of the town.

I alighted from the carriage, and sauntered slowly along the path winding with the St. Joseph's River. The spacious grounds forming an area of many acres, certainly could not be surpassed in natural endowments and the artistic ornaments, exhibit on the part of the proprietors, a wise appreciation of the effect of physical surroundings upon the minds of youth. The St. Joseph's River whose swift current and shaded banks are a guaranty of health, twines like a protecting arm about the spot and glances up through the green boughs all along the south side of the premises. Rustic seats are arranged under the huge trees, and beautiful summer-houses dot the grounds over like charmed islands in an enchanted lake. The Exhibition Hall, the Academy, and the Novitiate of the Sisters of the Holy Cross stand parallel to each other, and glancing through the foliage they form a picture indescribably interesting. The first vacant arbor that I found chanced to be the lovely little greenhouse erected for the children of the Holy Angels, a confraternity established in the Academy, placing the members under the special guardianship of these invisible benefactors. The idea is, to say the least, strikingly poetical. A little farther on is the House of Loretto. This unique little Chapel is built exactly after the design of the house said to be the birthplace of the Virgin Mother of our Savior, and the residence of our Lord during the years of seclusion from the world. This "storied Fane" was built by the "Children of Mary," another Society composed of the young ladies of St. Mary's.

After passing through the Academy building, and admiring the neatness and simple elegance of the apartments, before repairing to the Exhibition Hall, I paused to observe the fancy work of the young ladies, and in the fine vases and baskets of flowers, I found that nature herself had well nigh been rivaled by the adroit fingers that had formed these beautiful bouquets. The painting and embroidery evinced equal taste and skill, and spoke well for the tuition of St. Mary's in the ornamental branches.

But the great treat of the day, the Annual Exhibition, was now about to commence, therefore I took my seat immediately, in the Hall, which was already full to overflowing. A fair orchestra of five beautiful young girls opened the entertainment by playing a fine entrance march, arranged for the occasion; Miss Mary Walker, of Elizabethtown, Penn., touching skilfully the chords of the grand double action harp at the right hand of the stage, while her little sister Anna swept the strings of another harp on the opposite side; Miss J. Aurentz, of Pittsburg, Penn., Miss Virginia Spittler, and Miss Mary Schwalm presiding gracefully at the fine pianos just in front of the platform.

It is rarely that one enjoys music of so high an order accompanied by a scene so exquisitely artistic as the one that greeted us at this moment. From a door behind the centre of the stage, the entire school, attired in white, appeared before the audience. In a fairy like procession they entered, making a graceful inclination to the assembly as they passed to their seats in time to the spirited music. All were impressed with the beautiful deportment of the young ladies, and a spontaneous murmur of admiration burst from the audience present.

When the young ladies were seated, the Overture to Zampa, by Herold, was performed upon the piano. After which, the pupils of the first Vocal Class sang with touching expression the grand Chorus by Lamhillotte, "O Cor Amoris Victimæ." The young ladies of St. Mary's truly are possessed of beautiful voices, and their instructors may well be proud of their execution.

Then followed a highly entertaining and instructive play, entitled, Filiola; after which followed the deservedly popular and beautiful vocal quartette, Music in the Air. This was performed by those talented young ladies, the Misses Walker, and Miss J. Aurentz. This ethereal and heavenly musical composition, is well adapted to the voices of these young ladies and the effect of its performance upon the audience was thrilling in the extreme. A vocal duet, with guitar accompaniment, succeeded, by the Misses Daly, of Chicago, Ill. The younger of these young ladies possesses a voice of remarkable vigor and compass, and is certainly a fine singer. Here followed a Cantata, alike beautiful in conception and execution. The Queen of the Graces descends upon earth to bestow the gifts of Faith, Hope and Charity. At the close of the Recitative a touching tableau is formed by these impersonated virtues, kneeling at the feet of their queen, and crowned by her as worthy to rule the hearts of men. After this came the distribution of premiums to the junior department of the school, kindling the light in bright eyes, and making young pulses throb joyously. The Misses Walker again sang one of their sweet songs; the "Merry Minstrels" followed by one of Glover's vocal duets, "We glide on the lake," and by the sparkling and lively chorus: "The Water Lilies."

The second part of the exhibition opened with the Overture of Mozart's celebrated "Il Nozze di Figaro," an instrumental trio, by Miss Mary Walker, Miss Mary Dennis, and Miss Josephine Aurentz. The Misses Coyle, of Peoria, Ill, now sang the exquisite duet, "Cara Lisa," and their charming voices will be long treasured as among the many choice remembrances of St. Mary's. This Institution has already sent out many successful music teachers, and it has been proposed to form as a distinct feature, a normal musical department, and judging from the skill displayed upon this occasion, such an enterprise could scarcely fail of eminent success.

After the Compositions followed the famous and favorite Concert Fantasia of Strakosch, "Yankee Doodle and Variations," by Miss Mary Walker, and Strakosch himself would have admired the skill of the youthful performer. The "Coronation Chorus," from Weber, was then sung, and Miss Ellen Flynn, amid the acclamation of all, received the Crown of Honor equal with Miss Healy who, I have learned since writing the above, has passed from the scenes of earth forever. The Valedictory then followed by Miss Mary Dennis, and was read with touching effect, and did honor to the mind and heart of the fair young graduate. The late hour deprived us of an interesting portion of the entertainment, as the distribution of premiums to the pupils of the Manual Labor School, and to the School of Deaf Mutes, as also a Pantomime Play by these silent aliens from the blissful world of sound, was on this account deferred. The Chorus Farewell to St. Mary's was now sung by the entire school and they all passed from the stage in the beautiful order with which they had entered.

The large company were now ushered into the dining hall, where a sumptuous repast was served us by the gentle Sisters of Holy Cross, and with sincere regret that a day so delightful had so soon passed away I bade adieu to this lovely spot. A VISITOR.

Musical Intelligence.

MANCHESTER.—The triumphant success achieved by the revival of Gluck's Orfeo at the Théâtre Lyrique in Paris last winter, suggested to Mr. Charles Hallé the production of another master-piece of the illustrious and too-forgotten composer, at the Gentlemen's Concerts in Manchester. Mr. Hallé had many chefs-d'œuvre to select from. He chose Iphigenia in Tauris, one of Gluck's latest dramatic works, and unquestionably one of his grandest. Iphigenia in Tauris was written expressly for the Grand Opéra of Paris, and was produced in 1779. The subject forms a sequel to the opera Iphigenia in Aulis, written to an adaptation of Racine's tragedy of that name, and brought out a year or two after Gluck had declared his new dramatic style in Orfeo and Alceste. Iphigenia in Tauris was not at first eminently successful; it grew, however, upon the Parisian public, and was held in high estimation for many years.

Certainly nothing was left undone by Mr. Charles Hallé on Wednesday night to recommend Iphigenia in Tauris to the hearers. An admirable band and chorus were engaged, and the principal parts of Iphigenia, Pyllades, and Orestes, were sustained by Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Wilbye Cooper, and Mr. Santley, with Miss Susanna Cole and Miss Theresa Jeffreys as Diana and the Priestess.

It is stated in the English papers that a difficulty has been raised at St. Petersburg about the reception of Lady Crampton, wife of the British Ambassador at that Court. The objection is that before her marriage she was simply Miss Victoria Balfe, an opera singer. The Russians are aghast at the idea of a singer having precedence of the ladies of the whole foreign corps diplomatique, together with the entree to the palace. They cannot see how the daughter of a musical composer, the leader of the orchestra of the Opera House, (herself a public singer, moreover,) can worthily represent the Majesty of England! They say "it is true a noble Earl married an actress, Miss Farren; the late Earl of Essex, Miss Stephens, the singer; the late Duke of St. Albans, an actress Miss Foote; the late Earl of Craven, an actress, Miss Brunton, &c., but none of these noblemen were Ambassadors or other representatives of British Sovereigns."

Madame Grisi has just lost her youngest and favorite daughter, a beautiful child of four years of age. The family had been passing the summer at Fulham, where the child was taken suddenly ill. She was removed to Brighton, but died in a few days. Signor Mario and Madame Grisi returned to London deeply afflicted, but the parents were both compelled to sing in the "Hugonots" two days after the funeral of their babe.

Mr. M. W. Balfe had arrived in London from St. Petersburg and Dantzic, accompanied by his two daughters, Mrs. Bereus and Lady Crampton.

At the last public performance, given in the Conservatorium of Leipzig, on the 23d ult., the two daughters of the English composer, John Barnett, carried away all the honors, both for their performances on the piano and their singing.

"So Mario and Mongina take subscriptions for the Sicilian Revolutionists," observed Lord Palmerston to Mr. Punch the other evening. "Just so," replied the gentleman, "and there's twenty pounds to begin with." "Eh! how do you mean?" asked Pam. "Why, my dear Lord, there are two tenners."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—Shortly after 5 o'clock on Friday afternoon, June 29th, the rafters which had been elevated on the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, preparatory to putting on the roof, were blown down by a sudden gust of wind, with a crash resembling a heavy discharge of artillery, resulting in serious if not fatal accidents to several of the workmen. One of the original founders and largest stockholders was present at the time, and was severely hurt by the falling of the timbers. A singular circumstance connected with the accident is in relation to a horse, which was employed on the ground floor in turning a drum-windlass for hoisting timbers to the roof. The falling timbers and bricks completely crushed the windlass, and actually cut the halter and stripped the harness from the horse's back, yet, strange as it may appear, without injuring the old animal in the least. He stood perfectly unconcerned until taken out some time afterward. The damage done to the building is estimated at from $10,000 to $15,000. Its completion will be delayed for about a month, in consequence of this accident. The disaster created the most intense excitement, and thousands of persons assembled in the vicinity within half an hour after the crash was heard.

"The Patti" has been singing a great many "farowells" in the west. At McVicker's theatre, in Chicago, there have been some interesting operatic performances, in which la bella Adelina has been assisted by her sister, Mme. Strakosch, Brignoli, the fine tenor, and Junca, the grand basso. Patti was announced to make her "positively last" and "only" farewell appearance in Chicago, in that great wigwam wherein the Republican Convention lately met. In alluding to this, one of the Chicago critics exclaims, "Think of Patti—the petite, pretty, fascinating pet of Irving Place opera-goers—singing to a crowd of Western roughs at two shillings a head, in a barn! And that, while the managers of London and Paris where Miss Patti has been engaged, are so anxiously waiting for her!" A writer in one of the journals of Chicago, who seems to know what he is talking about, reviews in detail the personnel of this troupe, and thus speaks of our old favorite, Junca:

For one that has seen and heard everything, he is good in every respect. A perfect musician, he is natural in his acting and singing. I may say with truth that he is the only one of the troupe that knows well how to behave on the stage. Respecting the public, he does all he can to give satisfaction, and does not appear at all as if he was always thinking "it is good enough for these Western people." How many times has Paris overcrowded the theatre when he was singing with Mad. Colson and the charming Miss Noel, I recollect "Si J'étais Roi," an opera, which Adam wrote partly for him. Junca is a perfect artist, and deserves the praise of every connoisseur. He gives the world a fair specimen of that French gallantry which regulates all his doings.

—N. O. Picayune.

Tamberlik was rather coldly received in Madrid, lately, until he bethought him of his do in petto, ("ut de poitrine," which drew forth enraptured plaudits from his audience, and secured his triumph. Musiani will have to C sharp after his laurels.—Ibid.

BOSTON THEATRE.—We are gratified to learn that the Boston Theatre will be managed the ensuing season by Mr. THOMAS BARRY as the representative of the proprietors. We trust that this beautiful house may be raised from the position to which it has fallen, and again take its place as the theatre of Boston.

ORGAN CONCERTS AT CHICAGO.—Miss Sarah Tillinghast—daughter of Mr. William Tillinghast, well known to our citizens formerly as a teacher of music in the public schools and in private families—recently gave two classical organ concerts in St. Paul's Church, Chicago, which are highly spoken of by the press of that city. She was assisted by several amateur vocalists. The Press and Tribune says of Miss Tillinghast's performances:

"The highest compliment that can be paid to a musical performer is a rapt attention on the part of the audience. The ordinary Sunday duties of an organist require less of manual dexterity and pedalling skill than of judgment and taste. But such compositions as Miss T. set down for herself on the programme, require the combination of all those qualities in a high degree. The manner in which she employed the vast resources of the noble instrument in St. Paul's Church, showed most conclusively that she possessed that combination of qualities."

We believe Miss Tillinghast is the regular organist of St. Paul's Church. Her father is engaged in the public schools of Chicago.—Rochester Democrat.

A MUSICAL SKETCH of the days of '76. Stella, the pleasant correspondent of the Worcester Palladium, in her last letter, speaks as follows of the story by the "Diarist" in our last number:

"Dwight's Journal of Music, contained, last week, a clever satire upon a class of writers with whom we have little patience, and who write what are called 'musical' stories and sketches; and who, under pretence of illustrating the life of some great composer, interweave truth and fiction so artfully that only the most assiduous student of facts perceives their absurdity. No name is too sacred to escape the sacrilege of their meddling pens, for none has oftener figured as the hero of these tinsel stories than Beethoven himself. In earlier years, in happy ignorance of the fact that all is not truth that is written as truth, we wondered how the great composers, men whose genius had bequeathed such music to the world, Mozart, Beethoven, &c., could stoop to the enacting of the scenes of which these writers—some of them only too able, had made them the unhonored heroes. A weak sentimentality pervades most productions of this sort which repels experienced readers, but which imposes upon the credulity of the less wary. We hope Lizzy Polky's 'Musical Sketch of the Days of '76,' will be a death-blow to this species of literature."

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.
Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

That well remembered strain. Ballad. W. R. Morris. 25

A very pleasing parlor song. Easy.

Sweet Annie Fay. Song. Carl Haus. 35
Composed for the rich contralto voice of Mrs. Kempton (formerly Miss Jenny Twitchell) by whom it has been sung in public at various times with the most unequivocal success.

I love to sing. E. L. Hime. 25

Fully equal to this composer's favorite song: "I wandered by the brookside."

The wandering stars. Duet. Stephen Glover. 40

The lily and the rose. Duet. " " 40

Glover's pen is still as graceful as ever. Each new duet seems to surpass its predecessors in freshness, charm of melody, and all those qualities which ensure popularity. This is particularly the case with the above new duets.

The home that I left long ago. Ballad. C. W. Glover. 25

Good bye! a long good bye. Charles Salaman. 25
Late popular Songs of favorite English authors.

Instrumental Music.

Fairy Polka. G. W. Stratton. 25

Victoria and Clara Mazurkas. A. Shide. 25

La Joyeuse Galopade. F. Hübler. 25

New and also dance-music for the parlor or social ball-room.

Tommy's delight. Polka. Geo. Danekin. 25

Japanese Polka. Charles D'Albert. 35

The first of these pieces was played for the first time at the President's Reception, Washington, where the Japanese were among the guests, to the great delight of Tommy, which distinguished individual expressed his admiration of the tune in the strongest terms. The second is in D'Albert's most popular style.

The dream of the wanderer. Romance. Brinley Richards. 35

A pretty, sentimental little Nocturne, not difficult.

Warblings at eve. Four hands. Brinley Richards. 30
An effective arrangement of this truly beautiful piece, by the author himself.

Fenilles d'Album. Two Impromptus. Mayer. 25

Very clever. In the style of some of Stephen Heller's minor pieces.

BERBIQUIER'S METHOD FOR THE LUTE. To which are added Drouet's Twenty-Four Studies in all the Keys. 2,50

This is a course of lessons of real, practical ability; one which is prepared, not merely for the object of getting up a book, but with the far higher aim of furnishing to all who wish to acquire a good knowledge of the use of the Flute a means of doing so in a thorough, masterly manner. The book has been successfully employed by the best teachers in Europe, and to beginners, as well as to those who, having some acquaintance with the Flute, wish to obtain a better knowledge of it, we recommend this Method as one of unusual excellence, and one that cannot fail to give them entire satisfaction.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Musician of Augsburg.

FROM THE GERMAN.

Many years ago there lived in the city of Augsburg a musician by the name of Niesser, who, besides a wonderful skill in musical performance, possessed also a great reputation in the manufacture of every then known instrument. He was at the same time a musical composer, and although none of his compositions are extant now yet old chronicles inform us that the fame of this accomplishment, as well as that of his others, had spread through the whole of Germany. Several other circumstances augmented his renown:—he possessed, besides much wealth, which, as was whispered, had not been acquired in the most righteous manner, a daughter, the only heiress to his riches, whose beauty and innocence alone would have been a sufficient dowry.

Esther was as much admired for the sweetness of her smile, the beauty of her blue eyes, and her many good deeds, as the old Niesser was envied on account of his wealth, reputed for the excellency of his stringed instruments, and despised for his few good deeds. The old gentleman, in spite of his opulence and the consequence, acquired therefrom, in spite of his musical celebrity, was very sad. Esther, his only daughter, the only representative of a long line of musical ancestors, could not distinguish one note from another, and a melancholy foreboding crept upon him, that to the talent which he esteemed as much as his riches, he would leave no heir. But as Esther had at last grown up to a blooming maiden, he consoled himself with the thought that, if he could not be father, he might at least become grandfather to a progeny of musicians. With the view of accomplishing this, he resolved to give his daughter, with a dowry of two hundred thousand florins, to him who would compose the best Sonata and play the principal part therein. This determination he caused publicly to be announced and appointed also a certain day for the competition, vowing, with a sacred oath, that he would keep his promise even if the devil himself should compose and play the Sonata. This, as some said, was spoken in jest; yet it would nevertheless have been better for Niesser if he had not said it at all. One thing, however, is certain: he was a wicked old man, who had no great veneration for religion. Scarcely did the old musician's determination become known in Augsburg, than the whole town got into a ferment. Many who never before had ventured to raise their eyes so high, now considered themselves wooers for the hand of the beautiful Esther. Then, besides her charms and those of her father's florins, artistic glory came in question, and where this was wanting, vanity took the place. In short, there was not a musician in Augsburg who did not feel himself called upon to compete for the beautiful prize.

In the morning, at midday, and in the evening, yes, even through the whole night, did the streets re-echo with melodious and discordant sounds.

Sonatas sounded forth from every window, and nothing was spoken of but the approaching competition and its results. A fever for music had taken hold of all grades; the best airs were learned by heart and played and sung in every house, the sentinels at the city gates hummed Sonatas, while marching up and down: merchants in their stores sang favorite pieces; customers who stepped in forgot what they wished to buy, joined and kept singing Duets with the salesmen across the counter; some even hinted that they had caught priests singing Allegrettos when coming from the confessional; and upon the last leaf of a bishop's sermon, two measures of a Presto were found.

During this general mania, there was one not infected with the common excitement. It was Francis Goertlinger, a youth who, although possessing the best heart and the most beautiful form in all Suabia, had equally as little musical talent as Esther.

Francis loved the maiden, and she would rather hear her name whispered by him in sweet, endearing accents, than all the Sonatas ever composed between the Rhine and Vistula. Niesser's resolution was therefore alike hopeless to both the lovers.

At last the evening preceding the decisive day was at hand, and Francis had not yet taken one step towards the attainment of his wishes, and how could it have been possible? Never had he composed a single measure of music, and the playing of one solitary air upon the Spinnet exhausted the whole of his talent. Late in the evening he left his habitation and sauntered through the streets. The shops were already closed, and the streets empty: from a few windows a light yet shed its rays, and the strains of some instrument in preparation for the (to him) sad occasion, broke jarringly on his feelings. Sometimes he stood listening, and was then enabled to see the countenance of the musician, radiant with joy in expectation of a certain triumph. Proceeding on his road in a rather contemplative mood and not taking much notice of the streets through which he passed, he found himself at last in a quarter of the town which, although he had been his whole life in Augsburg, he believed he had never seen before. Marvelling, he proceeded on when suddenly it appeared to him as if a strain of music, from time to time interrupting the murmuring of the river before him, melted away in the distance; breathlessly he stood and listened, and again he was sure that some wonderful melody greeted his ear. At last a solitary, far distant light convinced him that all the inhabitants of this quarter had not gone to rest, and that another watchful musician pressed the night to his aid, in order to be a worthy competitor on the following day. Francis continued his walk, wrapt, if possible, in a more melancholy mood from this conclusion. The nearer, however, he approached the light, the more forcibly there broke upon him a strain of such sweet and heavenly sounds, that in spite of his little musical talent, he could not resist their charming influence and the desire to find out whence they came or who the performer was. Quickly and noiselessly he reached the casement, through which, by the sounds emerging from it, he was sure to obtain a view of the virtuoso; raising himself to his utmost height, he was enabled to look into the interior, and there he saw what appeared to him to be a low arched chamber, in the centre of which was seated an old man, with a manuscript before him, luring from an instrument the like of which Francis had never seen before, those sounds powerfully had so attracted him. The performer's back was turned towards the window, yet an old looking glass on the opposite wall revealed to the listener the image of the old man's features. It was a countenance never to be forgotten; such unspeakable sweetness and goodness were impressed upon it, that the youth doubted whether it could belong to an inhabitant of this earth. The mysterious stranger played with wonderful dexterity, ceasing now and then evidently for the purpose of altering something in his notes, which the manuscript appeared to contain, and uttering his satisfaction at the change of melody thus produced, in a language entirely unknown to Francis. At first the youth could scarcely govern his rage at the thought of this little shrivelled old man venturing, as he supposed, to appear as one of Esther's wooers, but his anger gradually vanished, the longer his attention was chained by the beauty and strangeness of the music, and no longer able to repress his satisfaction at the conclusion of a brilliant passage, he broke out into loud and boisterous applause in evidence of his admiration. The stranger now perceiving that he was not without a listener at his nocturnal performance, immediately opened the door, and, much to the surprise of the young man said: "Good evening, Francis, come in and take a seat. Tell me how Sonata pleases you, and whether you think it worthy of gaining Niesser's daughter?" There was in these rather provoking words something so heart-winning that Goertlinger felt no enmity, but accepted the old man's invitation, seated himself, and listened with attention to the again resumed performance. After having concluded the last strain of it, the virtuoso once more asked him how he liked the Sonata. "Oh!" exclaimed Francis, "would I were capable of composing one only half as beautiful." "Listen to me," replied the stranger; "old Niesser has taken an oath that he would give his daughter to him who would compose the best Sonata, and, he impiously added even if invented and played by the devil himself. These were not spoken unlistened to; the night winds carried them on their black pinions, whispered them through the silent woods, and bore them to those evil genii who have their home in the dark valley. With mocking laughter they accepted the challenge, and their kindred spirits shouted their satisfaction through the silent midnight, from the depths of a hundred caverns and mountains. But the good angels also heard the old man's oath, and though not pitying the blasphemer, yet they had compassion on sweet Esther and her lover. Take this roll of music, and with it proceed to-morrow to Niesser's house; a stranger accompanied by two others will arrive and sue for the beautiful prize, producing a Sonata like the one in this roll, not possessing, however, its peculiar power; wait for a favorable opportunity when he plays it, and substitute these notes for his." The old man, after having finished these strange instructions, took Goertlinger's hand and conducted him by some unknown road to the city gates, where he left him.

The young man's mind was perplexed with the curious manner in which he had received the Sonata, and filled with plans, expectations, hopes and fears for the coming day. In spite of the old man's assurances, he could not conceive how he, himself so composer, should by the changing of the Sonatas, reach the goal of his wishes. Thus ruminating, he arrived at his habitation, went to bed and fell asleep, whilst Esther's blue eyes and the music which the unknown had executed, were alternately the subject of his dreams. The next evening Niesser's mansion was opened for the competition, and as the final hour arrived, musicians from all parts of the city were seen by the curious rabble to hurry towards the house.

Francis Goertlinger also took his music, and near the appointed hour stood at the door of the building which contained his dearest treasure, pitted by many, to whom his love for Esther and his ignorance of music was no secret. Stepping into the large saloon, he found it already filled with musicians and musical amateurs, which last had also been invited. Niesser himself as judge was seated upon a chair at the upper end of the apartment, and beside him stood Esther, ornamented and dressed in her best apparel, like a sacrifice ready for the altar. When Goertlinger pressed through the crowd, a smile spread over the faces of all present, they being perfectly well aware of Francis's inability to comply with the conditions. Niesser also smiled, but Esther looked wonderingly at her lover, a silent tear stealing down her cheek at the thought of their hopeless fate.

The competitors were now instructed to give in the names, and it was also resolved that each one's turn of advancing his claims, should be decided by lot. The last one of those who stepped forward, and to whom all involuntarily gave place, was a stranger, calling himself Lived. No one knew from whence he came, and so repulsive were his features, so piercing his eye, that even Esther's father whispered to her his wish that this man's Sonata might not be the best.

Everything being ready, old Niesser arose from his chair, and signifying his desire for the contest to begin, exclaimed with a loud voice: "I swear to give my daughter here, with a dowry of two hundred thousand florins, in marriage to him who shall produce the best Sonata, and play the principal part therein." "And will you keep your oath?" said the stranger, stepping immediately before the old man. "I shall keep it," said the musician of Augsburg, "were the Sonata even composed and executed by the evil one himself." A great silence prevailed throughout the assembly, when, at these blasphemous words, only a distant mocking laugh was heard; every one shuddered, the stranger alone smiled. It fell to his lot to play first, and seating himself, he opened his music, whilst two others, whom none had noticed before, placed themselves by his side, with instruments ready, waiting for the signal to begin. It was given, and as they raised their heads to look at the notes, every one present perceived that their faces resembled each other in every particular. A general awe crept over the assembly, none spoke, but all, as if by previous understanding, precipitately left the apartment, and flew in terror from the house. No one remained behind, except the three, who, without being at all disturbed, had commenced to play, and Francis, who had not forgotten the instructions of his nocturnal companion. Esther's father also sat in his chair, beholding the awful scene and remembering his unholy oath; he endeavored to rise, but some invisible force kept him in his seat.

It was now near midnight; Francis stood by the side of the terrible visitors, and when they were not far from the conclusion of their Sonata, he suddenly tore away their music and substituted his. Then a dark, ghastly change came over the faces of the three musicians, and a distant howl, as of disappointment, was heard. The tapers were extinguished, and darkness of night enveloped all. Upon returning to consciousness from the stupor occasioned by this sudden occurrence, Francis perceived, by the light of the moon which poured her mild rays through the casement, the old man who had given him the Sonata standing near him. At a sign from him, the youth raised the still insensible Esther in his arms, and following his good genius, left the unhallowed house, which gradually vanished beneath the earth.

It is needless to say that the lovers were soon after married.

Years passed: children and grandchildren mourned over their graves. On the spot where Niesser's house stood, a new one has been erected, but the three unknown musicians still play their Sonata, the sounds of which are heard at midnight echoing from the depths of the earth. The old man also remains in his chair, still endeavoring to rise, but is condemned to preside for ever over the concert of his unhallowed guests.

Thus ends the legend of the Musician of Augsburg.

Russian Composers.

The modern Russian composers write a great deal more vocal than instrumental music. Their songs are very beautiful, and the best of them have a decided national character. Several Russian airs have been appropriated by German composers, who have had German words written to them; for instance, the "Red Sarafan" (the first of the melodies played so admirably by Wieniawski) and the "Troika," called in German "Die blaue Augen." Count Vielgorski's, or Wielhorski's, "Buiwala," which, though an original melody, has all the national characteristics, has been made the subject of a fantasia by Vieuxtemps. Every one knows the magnificent national hymn by Lvoff, the Director of the Imperial Choir, who has also written numbers of more familiar strains, and who has even supplied the gipsy companies of Moscow with some of their most popular airs.

Varmaloff, one of the most graceful romance-writers of the day, has also composed or arranged music for the gipsies; and one of their favorite melodies, of which the burden is well-known in England, and which is also introduced in the ballet music of the Spanish dancers (itself full of gipsy characteristics) is signed by Glinka, who, however, can only have harmonized it, for the tune belongs certainly to the gipsies themselves. Various other Russian composers have written for the gipsy troops; and it appears to us that the modern Russian music may be divided into (1) melodies in the style of the old national airs, and (2) melodies founded on, or imitated from, the traditional airs of the gipsies, such as Alabieff's "Nightingale," "He loves me no more," and a dialogue-song, of which the name escapes us, but in which a young man makes all sorts of desperate promises and professions of love to a young girl who laughs at him and rejects him, because, in her character of gipsy, she values nothing so much as her own liberty. Both styles appear quaint to foreign ears; but the former is distinguished by great simplicity and sadness, the latter by wildness and passion, and by a certain oriental character. Naturally in some of the songs of the present day there is a union of the two styles; and, as in all European countries, a certain number of airs are published which are imitated more or less from the Italian. But in spite of the influence of the Italian Opera, and of the numerous Italian composers who have visited the country and written for its stage; in spite too of the number of German musical professors who have settled in St. Petersburg and Moscow, the Russians have certainly a national school of music, as can be shown, not only from their songs, but from the operas of Glinka and Verstovsky.

Of Glinka we need not speak again at present, but as the name of Verstovsky will be new to the great majority of our readers, we may mention that he is the director of the Moscow Opera, the composer of a great many songs (several of which are written for the gipsies), and of the music of two serious dramatic works, "Askoldova Mogila" (The Tomb of Askold), and "Gramoboi." "Askoldova Mogila" is not, and cannot be, esteemed by the Russians in a scientific point of view. The overture is miserably poor; there are no concerted pieces of any importance, nor is there even an attempt in either of the acts at a regularly constructed finale. By a musician, then, "Askoldova Mogila" would be at once set aside, that is to say, if judged only by the merits of its composer; but at the same time much of the music is interesting to a foreigner, because it is really national instead of being imitated from the Italian. As the composers for the gipsy troops write music in the gipsy style, so Verstovsky, in treating a national subject, has given a national coloring to his melodies, even if he has not in a direct manner laid old Russian airs under contribution, which he sometimes appears to have done. There is a tune in polacca measure for the hero which is quite in the style of those sung by the boatmen on the Volga (it must be remembered that polacca or polonaise is a misnomer, as that particular form of melody, like the mazurka, is in special favor with all the Slavonian nations), and the prima donna has an "Air with Chorus" which is also strikingly national. A large proportion of the melodies in this opera are in a minor key, as are by far the greater part of the old national airs; and the opera also abounds in airs with choral refrains or responses, which is another characteristic of the Russian popular music, whether sung by the peasants, the gipsies, or the Cossack companies. "Askoldova Mogila," then, is essentially a popular work, and we can understand that the habitués of the Italian Opera and of the St. Petersburg Philharmonic Concerts have no great opinion of it, though we repeat that it is full of interest for a foreigner.

We cannot take leave of Askoldova Mogila without calling attention to a strange account given of it by Baron Haxthausen in his valuable work on Russia. This learned economist has the eccentricity to state that it reminded him of La Sonnambula and Der Freyschütz. We should have thought that if it recalled one of these operas it could not very well have suggested the other, for there are no points of resemblance between the two. Nor can we understand how the music of Verstovsky could remind any one either of Bellini or of Weber. Verstovsky's last opera of Gramoboi would doubtless appear to Baron Haxthausen a veritable Der Freyschütz, for it is founded on a legend (which forms the subject of one of Joukovsky's poems), and involves the sale of a soul to the evil one. The action, as in Askoldova Mogila, takes place at Kieff, and the sins of Ruric the Norman again appear. This piece, which was produced in Moscow in 1857, had no success as an opera, and attracted only as a spectacle.

Some of the very finest Russian music, however (as those of our readers who were present at Prince Galitzin's concert will readily believe), is that which is executed by the Russian chorus-singers, of which there are numerous companies, organized under Government direction or by private individuals. All the works of Bortniansky and Lvoff are admirably sung by the Imperial Choir at St. Petersburg, which numbers one hundred and ten of the finest voices imaginable, the basses and tenors being especially remarkable. The most celebrated choirs at Moscow are those of Philaret the metropolitan, and of Prince Galitzin (not the Prince Galitzin of Tamboff, and of St. James's Hall), who has built one of the most beautiful chapels in the city. At the monastery of the Don, a few versts from Moscow, there is also an admirable choir, but composed only of men (and not of men and boys as elsewhere). In addition to the churches, each regiment has its choir, as well as the principal charitable and educational establishments; indeed, it would be difficult to hear choral music more perfectly executed than at the Foundling Hospital of Moscow.—London Musical World, June 30,

Chinese and Japanese Music.

The musical scale of the Chinese consists of only five notes instead of seven, and their music is not written on five lines like ours but in perpendicular columns, like the characters in their books. The elevations or depression of tones is indicated by distinctive names. They have no semi-tones, and hence arises a tedious monotony of sound. There is said to be a resemblance between the Chinese melodies and the ancient Scottish airs. If this be so, Scotch music in the days of Ossian must have been much ruder than it has ever yet been represented, for of all unearthly sounds Chinese singing is the most unearthly. There is no noise like it. Those who have attended a genuine Chinese theatrical performance have had a specimen of how the men acquit themselves in song; but Chinese music can only be heard to perfection by strolling through the narrow streets of a Chinese town. Men, women and children all strain their voices to the utmost squeaking falsetto. The singers are usually accompanied by the viola, and sometimes by the pig-skin drum likewise. One's tympanum throbs and thrums as though a dozen fairies were beating upon it. Yet the Chinese have their Jenny Linds, Grisis and Sontags; their Lablaches and Tamburinis. They have infant phenomena, too, who, if they keep their lungs whole until arriving at mature age, certainly deserve the name. You are frequently called upon to admire what in any other place than a Chinese town you would suppose to be an imitation of the piteous complaint of a pig jammed under a gate; being all the time in a state of nervous excitement lest the warbler should break a blood-vessel in your presence.

Unlike our private singers at home, the Chinese need no pressing to "favor" a company with a song. On the contrary, the performances are generally voluntary, and the performers never give the excuse of cough or cold. In truth, a slight cold is rather an improvement upon their style. The willingness with which they entertain you in this respect is only equalled by the evident vanity of the singers, or the exulting pride of the bystanders of celestial origin. "That booty?" one will ask, and others, "How you likee dat?" "What you tinker dat?" "Merjean side can sing so booty?" To all of which it must be your invariable rule to give the expected answers, or you will immediately find yourself involved in a discussion in which you are sure to have the worst, for the odds are too strong against you. * * *

Small square tables of lacquered ware, about a foot and a half in height and six inches square, were placed on the right side of the Japanese; these supported cups of tea, sweetmeats, cakes, and small lacquered bowls of rice and fruit. Four married ladies sat together on one side, and near them an old gentleman; opposite sat a young Japanese officer and two young ladies, one about seventeen years of age, the other about twenty; the latter were very pretty. We little dreamed of seeing such beauties in this retired spot; their skins clear and white as that of a Circassian, with a healthy blush on their cheeks, which required not the assistance of the rouge-box; finely arched brows, over bright black eyes, which grew brighter when the owners became animated, and were shadowed by long curling eyelashes; noses small but straight, one bordering on aquiline; small well cut lips, surrounded by even rows of teeth of pearly lustre. Their jet black hair was brushed from the sides and back of the head, and fastened in a knot on the top of the head, by a fillet of pale pink silk. The elder was the handsomer of the two, and the chief object of attraction to the young officer; as he frequently gave us an opportunity of observing, by placing an arm round her waist and looking lovingly into her eyes. There was gracefulness in all her attitudes, especially when she took up a guitar at the request of her lover and played a few airs for us; but the music was rather monotonous and without harmony; at least our dull ears could not detect any. She accompanied herself in a song, in a falsetto tone; a species of whine, not altogether so discordant as that of the Chinese, yet merely bearable from its strangeness. The sister now joined in a duet, one endeavoring to outshriek the other. Our elder hosts were in raptures with the performance, and they wondered at our stolidity; but our ears had been accustomed to the music of Grist and Mario, and could not endure even the finest of Japanese singers. Finding the ladies so obliging, we prevailed upon one to play while the other danced. The performance was peculiar; she went round the apartment, as in a slow waltz, making graceful passes with her hands, and humming an air to herself, smiling most agreeably, and bowing toward us as she went round. They were attired in richly embroidered silk; a loose tunic with wide sleeve was fastened round the waist by a broad sash of pale pink; a fan was passed through this, and, supporting the back of each lady was a tricornered flat board, covered with parti-colored silk. The married ladies were attired in robes of a fabric resembling cashmere, and of a sombre lavender color. After tea they introduced pipes and some light wine.

The Part-Songs of Germany.

These part-songs are too little known in England as one of the most national and not least engaging features in modern German music. It is forty years since Zelter and his friend Flemming founded at Berlin a congregation of staid elderly men, who met once a month to a good supper, and to diversify the pleasures of the table by singing four-part songs, principally composed by themselves. The number was 40, and for the larger portion of it composed of amateurs or men in office. It was an original statute that no one was eligible as a member who was not a composer, a poet, or a singer. During his lifetime Zelter was their president and principal composer; and in no branch of art did his peculiar talent evidence itself so brightly as in these convivial effusions, where humor, raciness, a masterly employment of the limited material at his disposal, and a fine sense of the poetry he took in hand, distinguished him among his contemporaries. Goethe used to give his songs to be composed by Zelter; and many of them were sung at the Berlin "Liedertafel" before they were printed or known elsewhere. Fleming also contributed some fair musical compositions,—that to Horace's ode, "Integer vitæ," amongst others.

It was in the year 1815, or thereabouts, that Berger, or Klein, and a younger generation of musicians, founded a young "Liedertafel" society, on the same principle, and for the same number of members. Friedrich Foster wrote some very pretty songs for it. Hoffman, the novel writer and kapellmeister, made it one scene of his strange and extravagant existence; and left behind him there an immortal comic song—"Turkische Musik," the words by Friedrich Foster. In general, a gay and more spirited tone pervaded this younger society than belonged to their classical seniors. It was the practice of both bodies to invite guests on holiday occasions; and by the younger part-singers ladies were admitted twice a year. Nothing could be sprightlier or pleasanter, a little extra noise allowed for, than these latter meetings. They were not long in spreading it far and wide. The good suppers became of less integral consequence; original compositions were not always attainable; but in every town it was natural to collect the younger men of all classes, for the purpose of singing together. A regular system of organization, of division and subdivision, has arranged itself. The town societies in combination form provincial assemblies, where many hundreds come together. In the north of Germany the large class of young men who are either schoolmasters or organists in the towns and villages, or are educated as such at the normal societies of their own, and periodical celebrations.

The provincial festivals of these societies are held in the good time of the year, so that open air performances are practicable. A fine site, too, is a thing always chosen. Not very long before my Harz ramble, the Liedertafeln societies of that district had been holding a congress at Blakenburg. These Liedertafeln societies take part in other celebrations not their own. When Schiller's statue was inaugurated in Stuttgart, the singing bodies of all the towns in the towns in the district round about poured in through the gates of the town, one after the other, each with its banners and its music, till the separate chords, to speak fancifully, united in a grand chorus in the market-place. And while there exists a well trained army of volunteer choristers ready to be called into action on all occasions—it need not be pointed out how different it is in quality to the body of subordinates at once semi-professional and untaught, at whose mercy lies so much of the best music ever to be heard in England—I should say, did lie; for part-singing is now flourishing with us like the bean-tree in the fairy tale.

It is needless, again, to remark how the works which make a whole great people vocal, must have a value and an interest in more aspects than one. To offer an instance or two likely to be familiar to the English—Music has nothing nobler in her stores than the battle-songs in which the harmonies of Weber and the burning words of Körner are united. We sit by our firesides, it is true, and know not the sound of an enemy's cavalry in the streets, nor the booming of an enemy's cannon without our gates; and hence are touched only faintly by the spell of the soul within them; but it is impossible coldly to listen to the masculine chords and bold modulations of "Lützow's Wild Chace," and the "Sword Song," and the "Husarenlied." Again, we have taken home to ourselves and half nationalized "Am Rhein," among our "Black eyed Susans," and "Rule Britannia's," because of its spirit and beauty; though we cannot fail save dramatically, and by going out of ourselves as well as from home, the joviality and mirth of those who dwell in wine-land, or the kindling of such a spirit as moved the army of Liberators on their return from victory, when within sight of Ehrenbreitstein, to burst out with one consent into that noble melody which was heard, with little ceasing for two days and nights while the band was passing over the river.—*N. ### Popular Music of the Olden Time.

(From the Quarterly Review.)

It is a similar circumstance, that the anti-national propensities of Charles II. brought into fashion the kind of music that had constantly been appreciated by the masses—the music of the old ballads and songs. That notorious dislike of all compositions to which he could not beat time, and consequently of the tuneless counterpoint that had found such high favor with his predecessors, led him to appreciate the common English airs, to which the poets of the people had written their words, as well as the dance-music imported from France. The man who was destined to turn the predilection of the monarch to good account, by bringing to the notice of the court those national melodies which had been despised by the scholastic composers, was the once famed Tom D'Urfey, who, having delighted the "merry monarch" with a now-forgotten comedy, called the "Plotting Sisters," became one of his chief favorites. The earlier English poets, with their hatred for ballad-writers, had avoided all metres that could be sung to common tunes, but D'Urfey, acutely perceiving the royal taste, pursued a course diametrically opposite, writing songs that would either fit the existing ballad-tunes, or enable the musicians to adopt a similar style of composition. Thus the line of demarcation that had so long served the music of the higher classes from that of the multitude was to a great extent obliterated, and the popular song was once more in fashion. Unfortunately for the durability of lyric poetry, fortunately for composers, honest Tom has had few successors; and it is to the fact that Scottish poets worked on his principle, whereas English rhymesters preferred new music, that Mr. Chappell attributes the incomparably greater popularity of the former. "Dibdin's sea-songs," he says, "are already fading from memory, because he composed music to them, instead of writing to airs which had stood the test of time."

On the other hand, the Scotch not only sang D'Urfey's songs, but composed new words to his tunes, and this brings us to an especial theory of Mr. Chappell's, that many of the times commonly called Scotch are really of southern origin. The collections that he has examined show a strange mixture, the third volume of Allan Ramsay's "Tea-table Miscellany," for instance, containing English songs exclusively, and the fourth a combination of English and Scotch, though the notification that these were all "Scots songs" still appeared on the title-page, to the great inconvenience of northern antiquaries, who are thus liable to praise English music, when they intend to praise Scotch. That Dr. Beattie was in this unfortunate position and communicated his error to Mrs. Siddons is thus shown by Mr. Chappell:—

"She loves music, and is fond of Scotch tunes, many of which I played to her on the violoncello. One of these, She rose and let me in, which you know is a favorite of mine, made the tears start from her eyes: 'Go on,' said she, 'and you will soon have your revenge;' meaning that I should draw as many tears from her as she had drawn from me by her acting. (Life of James Beattie, LL. D., by Sir W. Forbes, II. 139.) Dr. Beattie was evidently not aware that both the music and words of She rose and let me in are English (the words being by Tom D'Urfey and the music by Farmer). Again, in one of his Essays,—'I do not find that any foreigner has ever caught the true spirit of Scottish music;' and he illustrates his remark by the story of Geminiani's having blotted quires of paper in the attempt to write a second part to the tune of The Broom of Cowdenknows. This air is, to say the least, of very questionable origin. The evidence of its being Scotch rests upon the English ballad of The Broom of Cowdenknows, for in other ballads to the same air it is not so described; and Burton, in his Anatomy of Melancholy, quotes 'O the broom, the bonny, bonny broom,' as a 'country tune.' The frequent misapplication of the term 'Scotch' in English songs and ballads, has been remarked by nearly every writer on Scottish music, and this air is not upon the incomplete scale which is commonly called Scotch. I am strongly persuaded that it is one of those ballads which, like The gullant Grahams, and many others, became popular in Scotland because the subject was Scotch. The Broom of Cowdenknows is in the metre of, and evidently suggested by, the older ballad of New Broom on Hill. A copy of the original Broom on Hill may even yet be discovered, or at least an earlier copy of the tune, and thus set the question at rest."

This part of the history we rather indicate than dilate upon, leaving Mr. Chappell to contend with the northern lion as well as he may, and prove that it roars an' it were any English nightingale. The professed imitation of the Scottish dialect in popular English songs seems to have begun with the mission of the Duke of York (afterwards James II.) to Scotland, when the northern phraseology was eagerly adopted by the royalists.

After the reign of Queen Anne, political songs were the only kind of poetry that found general favor, but in the time of George II. the old tunes were once more brought into vogue with those ballad-operas, of which the "Beggars' Opera" was the first and the most durable. For six consecutive years scarcely any other kind of drama was produced on the stage, and even for the booths in Bartholomew Fair new operas were written.

With respect to the characteristics and worth of the popular English airs that survived so many social and political changes, and have sometimes acquired new vitality from their connexion with some event of importance, we may confidently say, that the most careless reader of music cannot glance over the airs collected by Mr. Chappell without arriving at the conclusion, not only that these tunes are eminent for those qualities which strongly affect the emotions of the multitude, but also that they have peculiarities of their own which distinguish them from the songs of other nations, in spite of the bold assertion of unpatriotic archæologists that the English are without a national music.

The characteristic airs of England are divided by Mr. Chappell into four classes, which he thus describes:—

"The first and largest division consists of airs of a smooth and flowing character—expressive, tender, and sometimes plaintive, but generally cheerful rather than sad. These are the ditties, the real pastorals, which are so often mentioned by our early writers, and in which our poets so constantly expressed their delight. The second comprises airs which breathe a frank and manly spirit, often expanding into rough jollity. Such were many of the songs of men when not addressed to the fair. The third consists of the airs to historical and other very long ballads, some of which airs have probably descended to us from the minstrels. They are invariably of simple construction, usually plaintive, and the last three notes often fall gradually to the key-note at the end. One peculiar feature of these airs is the long interval between each phrase, so well-calculated for recitation, and for recovering the breath in the lengthy stories to which they were united. They were rarely, if ever, used for dancing; indeed, they were not well suited to the purpose, and therein differed from the carols, and from the ditties, which were usually danced to and sung. Ditties, when accelerated in time to fit them for dancing, would fall under the denomination of carols. In the fourth class may be comprised the numerous hornpipes, jigs, rounds, and bagpipe-tunes. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, when villagers assembled every holiday, and on Sunday evenings after prayers to dance upon the green, every parish of moderate population had its piper. "The constable ought not to break his staff and forsake the watch for one roaring night," says Ben Jonson, "nor the piper of the parish to put up his pipes for one rakish Sunday." "It was not unusual, I believe," says Mr. Surtees, "to amuse laborers on bounty days with music; a piper generally attended on highway days." He quotes the following entry in the parish registers of Gateshead, under the year 1683:—"To workmen, for making the streets even, at the King's coming, 18s. 4d.; and paid the piper for playing to the members of the highways five several days, 8s. 4d." Milton, in his speech upon unlicensed printing, says, "The villagers also must have their visitors, to enquire what lectures the bagpipe and the rebec reads, even to the balladry, and the gammuth of every municipal fiddler, for these are the countryman's Arcadia, and his Monte Mayors."

Various, and doubtless to a great extent unfathomable, are the causes that produce that fitness of an air to a national humor, which is expressed by the term popularity. The songs introduced in the lighter French vanderbilts, and sung by actors who are not professedly vocalists, seem utterly meaningless and trivial to the English ear, whether cultivated or not; yet they must appeal to some sentiment in the French people, or they would not be repeated year after year, with fresh words written on the occasion of every revival. Of the vitality of certain English tunes we had a striking instance in the "Beggars' Opera," which is almost a thesaurus of national melody, and we have more modern proofs in the burlesque entertainments produced at our theatres during the holiday seasons, and consequently exhibiting the union of airs composed before the memory of man with words hastily scribbled down by the young poetasters of the day. Tunes go on for centuries, words become stale in a twelvemonth. Martin Parker by his Cavalier verses gave indeed a new popularity to the old melody; but we question whether a single reader would now be moved by the words of "The King shall enjoy his own again," whereas the tune would be found as soul-stirring as ever if associated with some new national event. Nor can we reasonably doubt that the lively air of Lillibulero had a great effect in giving currency to the rubbish with which it was associated about the time of the Revolution.

Impossible as it may be to trace all the causes of popularity in music, some influence may be safely ascribed to the character of the instruments in use among the people. The airs of Spain—the land of guitars—are generally destitute of sustained notes; the songs of the Swiss mountaineer are suggestive of the mountain-horn. Armed with the fact that the instruments in use among the English from the earliest times were the harp, the fiddle (including the crowd), and the pipe, with or without the bag, the curious may, if they please, endeavor to find the traces of these instruments in the abundant specimens of English melody collected by Mr. W. Chappell. These are upwards of four hundred in number, and it can be proved that at least two hundred were in vogue before the time of the Commonwealth. We can scarcely over-estimate the industry and zeal shown by Mr. Chappell in his valuable and interesting work. He has produced not an essay, not a history, not a music-book, but something that combines the nature of all these at once. The order of the work is chronological; every tune is printed with a bass accompaniment by the accomplished musician, Mr. G. A. Macfarren; its vicissitudes are described, the words that belong to it are given entire or in part, and everything that can be found in the way of historical fact or contemporary allusion is brought to bear upon its illustration. The portions of the work to which we have referred are merely the introductions to the several sections. The main body of the book consists of a mass of erudition, no less copious than well digested, that can only be appreciated by a careful perusal.

Late as it comes, Mr. Chappell's work is the only one of its kind. Years have elapsed since the superficial Dr. Burney directed his energies to the depreciation of English music, and the exaltation of everything foreign. The task of vindicating the musical character of our countrymen, by whatever expedient zeal could suggest and erudition supply, was reserved for Mr. Chappell—an archæologist of the middle of the nineteenth century. His delightful volumes are a perfect treasure to every person who loves an English tune or an English song, as well as to all who take an interest in tracing an important department of popular literature, or the changes of national tastes and customs.

The Same to the Same.

Milan, November 21, 1772.

We are, heaven be thanked, as well and lively as fishes in water; for during the last week it has rained frightfully. To-day is the anniversary of our marriage. It is now, if I mistake not, five-and-twenty years ago since we had the happy idea of getting married, to say nothing of the years we thought about it beforehand; good things require time.

The "primo uomo" M. Rauzzini has arrived. The work goes on increasing. We shall have also our little comedies to go through, as is justly expected when theatrical affairs are in question; but such things are mere trifles. The figs which Wolfgang carried away with him from Salzburg were as miraculous as the loaves and fishes in the Gospel; they have lasted until now.

Yes! yes! we have a mighty deal to do; when we are not working there are still all sorts of arrangements to see to.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—I thank you, dear sister, you know for what I cannot write to M. de Heffner. If you see him make him read these lines; I beg him to remain content therewith for the present.

I bear no grudge against that rare friend for not having answered me. As soon as he has more time, he will find a time, no doubt, although I doubt, to answer me punctually.

Milan, December 5, 1772.

My bad pen does not prevent our being in good health. Yesterday only did the De Amicis arrive. The poor tenor, Cardoni, has fallen so sick that he cannot come. They have sent for some one to take his place to Turin and to Bologna. He must be not only a good singer, but a good actor, with an imposing appearance, to represent with honor the character of Sylla. These are the two principal causes which have retarded the composition of the opera. Now it will proceed at a sound pace.

P. S. from Wolfgang.—Fourteen pieces more to do, and I shall have finished. It is true that the duo and the trio may count for four pieces. Can't possibly write you at any length, for I know nothing—first reason; second reason, I don't know what I am writing, my head is so full of the opera; I am in danger of sending you an air instead of words. I have learned a new game here which is called Mercante in fieri. We will play it as soon as I come back. I have also learned of a lady a new tongue which is easy to speak, difficult to write, but useful nevertheless. But it is a little—childish, although excellent for Salzburg. My compliments to our pretty Nandl and to our canary, for those two creatures and yourself form the most innocent part of the household. Your chapel master Fischietti will, no doubt, soon begin working at his opera buffa—that is to say in Germany, at his foolish opera.

The Origin of "Hail Columbia."

In the "Recollections of Washington," just published, occurs the following anecdote:

The song of Hail Columbia, adapted in measure to the President's March, was written by Joseph Hopkinson, of Philadelphia, 1798. At that time war with France was expected, and a patriotic feeling pervaded the community. Mr. Fox, a young singer and actor, called upon Mr. Hopkinson one morning and said, "To-morrow evening has been appointed for my benefit at the theatre. Not a single box has been taken, and I fear there will be a thin house. If you will write me some patriotic verses on the tune of the President's March, I feel sure of a full house. Several people about the theatre have attempted it, but they have come to the conclusion that it cannot be done. Yet I think you may succeed." Mr. Hopkinson retired to his study, wrote the first verse and chorus, and submitted them to Mrs. Hopkinson, who sang them to a harpsichord accompaniment. The time and the words harmonized. The song was soon finished, and that evening the young actor received it. The next morning the placards announced that Mr. Fox would give a new patriotic song. The house was crowded—the song was sung—the audience was delighted—eight times it was called for and repeated, and when sung the ninth time the whole audience stood up and joined in the chorus. Night after night "Hail Columbia" was applauded in the theatre; and in a few days it was the universal song of the boys in our streets. Such was the origin of our national song "Hail Columbia."

A Royal Artist.

William II., King of Holland, is by instinct a musician, and composes very remarkable melodies. At Wiesbaden, where he is just now, he possesses an elegant villa, and if not the actual ruler there, lives at least like a prince. He has a strong partiality for the place, because in its magnificent woods and mountains he finds his happiest inspirations. He is fond of going about the country alone on horseback; occasionally, however, he travels in a little droschky, where, with his head thrown back, attending the flitting clouds and the smoke of his regalia, he gives himself to his musical studies, and in this way composes, as the case may be, sylvan, amorous, or impassioned melodies. Inspired with the ideas natural to an earnest votary of revery and solitude, this artist king no doubt often imprecates the high position which confines him to his native dykes and prevents his going over distant seas to unexplored countries. Those who have heard his music, describe it as full of soul and modulation, capable of powerful sympathy and of communicating strong emotion. He arranges it for himself, quite often extemporaneously, but never takes the trouble to write out the tunes, which of course would be lost when once sung, were it not for a precensor who, passionately fond of his sovereign's music, always stenographs it.

This singular faculty of the king of the Netherlands is all the more surprising in that he is really inexperienced, possessing but very little skill, being ignorant of the rules of composition, and even of musical terms. A walk, a hunt, anything emotional, in fact, inspires him, and then he commences by uttering the words, which he sings to himself, and which, though simple and unmeasured, shape the sentiment of the music. He then calls the precensor and makes him sit down at the piano; but, instead of telling him in what octave he wishes to be accompanied, he tries the instrument himself and says to his attendant: "Hold! accompany me from this side of the board—no, wait! from that side, then this way. Ah! it is this, that, and the other." He then sings the written words, which are sometimes in French, sometimes in Italian, and at other times in Dutch. When the air is sung, he repeats it, and, in so doing, occasionally corrects it. Then, when he has completed it, he says to his companion, "Well, my dear sir, how do you like that?" "Ah, sire," he responds "it is admirable, magnificent. You have never done better. But it is singular. I know not how you do it; for this does not resemble music, and still it pleases. When the chorister is highly delighted, the king makes grimaces; when he merely approves, his majesty smiles and rubs his hands."

CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Orphéonist Festival commenced on the 25th of June, and was continued on the 26th and 28th. The "Orphéon" is an amateur choral association of some standing in France. Its central head is established in Paris, with branches extending into all the departments of the country. It is stated that there are now 800 societies, and more than 30,000 members, and there is hardly a commercial or manufacturing town in France that has not some "Société Musicale" in union with it. This association is evidently on a much larger scale than any existing in England, for though we have choral societies by the thousand, including almost every village in the country, there is no connection between them. The Orphéonistes combine charity with music, and during the last five years they have handed over a large sum of money to various charitable institutions. In this respect it is easy to see the advantage that might be derived from combination. No doubt there are innumerable charities forwarded and assisted by the efforts of musicians in England, but a combined society extending throughout the country would have considerable power in collecting charitable contributions. The anniversaries of the Orphéonistes have been events of national importance, and have always excited immense interest in Paris and in the larger towns of France. The 3000 singers who made their appearance at the Crystal Palace are selections from these various societies, and are composed, we are told, of the commercial classes—shopkeepers, clerks, artisans, and others; indeed, it was evident from their general appearance that the artisans were in considerable force, which proves how much the study of music is extending in France.

The programme on Monday commenced with "God save the Queen," sung in very intelligible English; the harmonies, it is true, were much altered, and not for the better, but the good-will with which the National Anthem was sung made up for any defects in the execution. The next piece performed was a hymn, "Veni Creator," by Besozzi, and very correctly and smoothly it was sung; other slow and solemn music was included in the day's performance, and though well sung there was nothing distinctive about the style. It was, however, in the characteristic French music that the great effect was produced. The striking beauty of the piano passages, the distinct enunciation of the words, and the neat and crisp execution of the quick passages, were exceedingly good. There is no great power in the forte passages, not like the depth of sound produced, for instance, by a few hundred of our North-country chorus singers, but there is a smoothness and precision which is extremely pleasant. We may also add that there is a certain amount of trick, that is decidedly effective; we allude particularly to a chorus called "La Re traite," in which the sound of drums, imitated by the voices, is first heard in the distance, then a chorus advancing and subsequently receding into distance, so as to become almost inaudible. This was remarkably good, and without speaking of it as fine chorus singing, it would be well worth imitating. Another excellent chorus was "France! France!" composed especially for this festival by Ambrose Thomas. The spirit and vivacity with which this patriotic song was given produced an immense effect. Several others of the same class, which we have not space to mention, were equally good.

The programme each day was varied, and the performance gave universal satisfaction. At the conclusion of the music the audience rose en masse, and with waving of hats, and every demonstration of good feeling, called vociferously for the French National Melody, whereupon "Partant pour La Syrie" was given with hearty good-will by the singers. The band of the Guides, who have accompanied the Orphéonistes, and who performed at the Crystal Palace each day, were in London in the year 1855, when they delighted every one with their music. It is indeed a perfect band, their wonderful precision and neatness of execution are above all praise, and the subdued smooth quality of tone produced from so many brass instruments is perfectly wonderful. Their solo performers, also, are remarkably fine, and, taken as a whole, we have no regimental band in this country to equal them. There are reports (and we are sorry to say, that they are not without foundation) that the treatment of our musical neighbors was not such as they were entitled to expect upon their first arrival, but we trust that the hearty welcome given them by the public, and the enthusiasm displayed, will prove to them that the English public, at any rate, have not been to blame, and that they will return to France with a favorable impression of their reception in this country.

The Orphéonistes were invited by the Sacred Harmonic Society to a concert at Exeter Hall, on Friday evening. The performance consisted of selections from several oratorios, the choruses being chiefly of a loud character. Miss Parepa, Madame Sainton Dolby, and Mr. Sims Reeves were the solo singers. Our foreign neighbors were also invited on Thursday, by Mr. Leslie's Choir, to hear a performance of glees, part-songs, &c., in St. Martin's Hall.—Musical Times, July 1.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The first performance for eleven years of Cimarosa's best known, if not best, opera, Il Matrimonio Segreto, which took place on Saturday, was a decided success; far greater, indeed, than we anticipated from the rather unfavorable reception it met with in 1849, when revived both at Her Majesty's Theatre and the Royal Italian Opera. The little favor a work once so popular obtained then was the more unaccountable, as the cast at both theatres was extremely attractive; that at the elder house comprising the names of Mesdames P'arodi, Giuliani, and Albani, Signors Calzolari, Lablache and F. Lablache; at the new house, Mesdames Persiani, Grisi, and Angri, Signors Mario, Tamburini, and Tagliafico. The opera, nevertheless, ran but a few nights at either place, and may be said thenceforward to have been entirely shelved, as no attempt has been made to reproduce it since. The principal cause of its revival at Her Majesty's Theatre is doubtless to exhibit Signor Ciampi in one of those parts in which he had earned his continental reputation. The character of Geronimo is beyond the grasp of ordinary artists; and, indeed, no singer since Lablache, excepting Tamburini, had attempted it at all. Signor Ciampi created a highly favorable impression in his new essay, proving himself an artist of rare intelligence and rare endowments. His comedy is a very happy combination of art and instinct; his humor is natural and entirely his own, so that originality may be added to his other qualifications. His make-up of the character is extremely skillful, and throughout the entire performance he never forgets that he is personating an old man. If we miss the oily humor of Lablache, which seemed to ooze out at every pore, or the consummate tact of Tamburini, which threw an intense reality about every thing he did, we must remember that Signor Ciampi is at an age when it is impossible, even by the aid of the highest genius, that art could reach maturity. Signor Ciampi is twenty-one years old, at which age, we have no doubt, both Lablache and Tamburini were serving their apprenticeship to singing and acting. Nevertheless, estimating the new buffo's performance irrespective of all such considerations, we must allow it to have very great merit. The audience, indeed, seemed strongly of our opinion, since they applauded Signor Ciampi to the echo in every scene. With so powerful and splendid an organ we shall look by-and-bye for finer vocal results. Signor Ciampi, in singing, should adhere more to the notes, and speak less. The frequent use of the parlante, however agreeable to Italian ears, is not liked by English audiences, more especially in good music. With this exception we can praise the new Geronimo's singing unreservedly. He possesses the true instinct for time and rhythm, and in that respect invariably satisfies the most scrupulous ear, and is always just in his intonation.—Musical World, June 30.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The performance of Gluck's Orfeo e Eurydice, on Wednesday evening, which had furnished a topic of conversation to musicians for weeks previously, did not attract a large attendance of the general public. Nevertheless, almost every connoisseur in London was present, and excitement and curiosity were carried to an unusually high pitch. It had been announced that Orfeo e Eurydice would be "illustrated by costume, scenery, and decoration," whence, naturally, it was inferred that Gluck's great lyric work would not be presented in a dramatic form, but as a pictorial concert entertainment. It turned out, however, that the announcement was supererogatory, since Orfeo was given as an opera proper, with all the accessories of stage effect and action. The advertisements, therefore, intimated more than was required. The director was determined that the old German master should not suffer for want of attention. The cast of the principal personages were perhaps as strong as it could be made in the present time. Mad. Caillag sustained the part of Orpheus, Mad. Penco that of Eurydice, Mad. Miolan-Carvalho that of the Happy Shade (L'Ombra Felice) and Mad. Nantier-Didiée, L'Amore. Nearly the entire weight of the performance falls upon Orfeo, who is rarely absent from the scene. Mad. Caillag, however, to her other estimable qualities, adds that of great sustaining power, which enables her to go through the longest and most exciting opera unfatigued. In such a part as Orfeo this is absolutely requisite, and without it the best powers, natural and acquired, would be of little avail. Mad. Caillag, as she had already demonstrated in Fidèle, possesses amazing energy, and has the finest tragic instincts. Her intensity and passion in Beethoven's heroine could hardly be surpassed, and these qualifications were again exhibited in Gluck's opera. Her greatest effects were produced in the grand bravura, "La speme in son ritorno," and in the scene with Eurydice, in which, after his wife is a second time snatched from him by death, just as he had recovered her from Hades—a scene of wondrous beauty, somewhat spun out, notwithstanding—Orpheus sings the well-known air, "Che farò senza Eurydice." On both occasions Mad. Caillag proved herself no less a consummate vocalist than tragedienne, and was overwhelmed with applause. We might cite many other points in her performance, but the above suffices to indicate in what estimation we hold Mad. Caillag, and what were the feelings entertained by the public of her very rare merits.

The other characters, comparatively subordinate, were most ably supported. Mad. Penco's Eurydice was thoroughly artistic. Even her death was remarkable for the natural manner in which it was accomplished. Her vocal displays were restricted to the long (somewhat too long) duet with Orpheus, when Eurydice issues with him from the infernal regions, of which she made the most. Mad. Carvalho gave the single air of The Happy Shade, "Questa prato sempre ameno"—a pastoral of infinite beauty—with great charm of voice; and Mad. Nantier-Didiée, by her singing, dress, and manner, gave due effect to the impersonation of the God Cupid, who, in the end, is the means of rendering the lovers happy, whereby the author of the libretto is at odds with Heathen Mythology.

The scenery, more especially the view of Elysium, is very beautiful. The ballet of the Happy Shades was received with unbounded applause. Of a very different character is that of the Furies in the opening of the second act; which, if not so attractive, is far more vigorous and picturesque.

On Thursday, the first performance of Norma this season, and the last appearance but one of Mad. Grisi in the part she has made so peculiarly her own, with the additional attraction of the second act of Fra Diavolo, drew together one of the most crowded and fashionable audiences ever assembled in this theatre. Every part of the house was filled to overflowing, and scores of "La Diva's" admirers were disappointed in not being able to procure even standing room. The Queen and suite occupied the royal box, and the whole performances elicited a series of "ovations," for, evidently affected by the brilliancy of the audience and their enthusiastic reception of her, Mad. Grisi exerted herself with even more than her wonted fire, and "barring" the natural vocal deficiencies, the entire personation of the erring Druidess was one of the most effective we ever witnessed, even in the palmiest days of the great queen of Italian song.

The Prophète, long expected, is at last promised, and Signor Tamberlik is announced to make his first appearance this year as Jean of Leyden.—Ibid.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—The great attendance a month ago at the performance of Elijah, induced the announcement of a repetition, which took place on Friday the 22d inst., and demands a word or two on account of some new features. The severe illness of Miss Parepa prevented her appearance; and Mad. Rudersdorff sang the principal soprano in a manner that leaves room for little but approbation. She has the requisite dramatic capability; and this can be said of but few of her contemporaries. Her "Hear ye, Israel," was an unimpeachable performance. Mr. Santley's singing of the Prophet decidedly gains upon us. It was always sung well; never with sufficient histrionic effect. It is in the latter qualification that the improvement is visible. Mr. Patey should remember that when he joins in quartet with such artists as Mads. Rudersdorff and Sainton-Dolby, and Mr. Sims Reeves, it is unpardonable to attempt to gain notice by singing too loudly. Among the numerous audience were numbers of the chiefs of the Orphéonistes, who were much delighted with the performance; and, with the characteristic impressionability of their race, were raised to rapturous wonder at Mr. Sims Reeves' marvellous singing of "Then shall the righteous," and were greatly moved at Mad. Sainton's "O rest in the Lord," which is the climax of pathetic expression.—Ibid.

EXETER HALL.—A performance or prize-glee, madrigals, and part-songs, by Mr. W. G. Martin, was given on Thursday the 21st, under the direction of the composer, the gentleman who so honorably officiated in the conductor's desk at the two recent juvenile choral exhibitions at the Crystal Palace. The chorus, we believe, was formed of Mr. Martin's classes, and numbered about one thousand voices. To vary the part-music, Mr. Sims Reeves sang "Adelaide," and a new song by Mr. Balfe, "I love you;" and Miss Arabella Goddard played two popular morceaux—Ascher's fantasia on airs from Diurnah, and Thalberg's "Last Rose of Summer." Mr. Sims Reeves created a perfect furor in Mr. Balfe's new song, which was encored with thunders of applause. We have not for a long while heard a more charming song than "I love you," and never heard more exquisite singing than that of Mr. Reeves. How the great tenor sings "Adelaide," and how Miss Arabella Goddard accompanies him on the piano-forte we need not say. The fair pianist created the accustomed sensation in both her pieces; the Irish fantasia exciting the audience to absolute enthusiasm, which compelled Miss Goddard to return to the platform and bow, although she declined (as usual) to repeat the performance. The execution of the glees, madrigals, and part-songs was for the most part excellent; of some, indeed, deserving of the highest praise. We may mention the part-song "The Evening Star," ditto "Our Saxon Fathers," both encored; prize-glee, "Mock Twilight," for eight male voices, and part-song, "The Hemlock Tree." These were all admirably sung, and elicited loud applause. In the prize-glee, "The Merry Month of June," for soli and chorus, the voices were occasionally unsteady and not always in tune. The exceptions were, however, rare, and the general performance must be pronounced excellent. The attendance was immense.—Ibid.

FLORENCE, APRIL 27.—Ten days has Victor Emanuel sojourned in Florence and environs, and it is yet three days more before he leaves for Bologna. Ten days have we prostrated ourselves at the altar of pleasure, undergoing every manner of discomfort for a glimpse of each fete and a sight at the King. The royal entrée into the city, the fireworks upon the Arno, the illumination, opera, balls, races, Corso, have well nigh turned the heads of most people, especially those of the petty merchants who close their shops, positively refusing to satisfy customers, depriving themselves of a living for the sake of indulging in enthusiastic shrieks in behalf of their new monarch. My last experience in festivity was at a late concert given in his Majesty's honor in the great Hall of Palazzo Vecchio. A description of it will serve to illustrate the tenor of all the fetes. When told that he was "down" for an Accademia, our honest King resolutely declared that he could not and would not attend it, that he detested music, save the cannon's, and it was madness to suppose it possible for him to undergo such torture. "But you must," was the inexorable reply, "the people expect you and they cannot be disappointed." "Well, if I must, I must," sighed anti-musical Victor Emanuel, "but let the concert be very short," and it was short. At noon, the world-renowned Cinque Cento saloon, animated by at least two thousand persons, (the majority of whom were gaily dressed ladies,) festooned with garlands of natural flowers, beautiful, gigantic bouquets in every corner and Savoy crosses in red and white camellias starting out from the walls, created impressive effect upon all present, every moment adding to suppressed enthusiasm, which burst forth most gently but most rapturously as the hero of Palestro and suite entered, amid the clanging of much abhorred instruments. "Long live the first soldier of Italy," shouted a voice from afar. "Evviva!" one and all responded, ladies furiously tossing their handkerchiefs. Quickly walking up the aisle, the King seated himself immediately in front of orchestra and chorus. By his side sat his cousin, Prince Carignano, Lord Lieutenant of Tuscany; behind him stood Ricasoli, the man to whom Tuscany owes her redemption—Gen. Fanti and many deputies of the Italian Parliament, all of whom had been invited to attend Victor Emmanuel in his tour through the new provinces. What a hideous looking man for a King! is the first exclamation; but after all, though he be short and very stout, with an undeniable pug nose, rolling, unquiet gray eyes, hair cropped as short as any Zouave's, and a moustache as upturned as his nose, that looks as if the sheared hair of the top of his head had been grafted on to the small shoots growing above his upper lip; although nostro re has a very red complexion, and is not an Apollo nor a scholar, nor in appearance a gentleman, yet there is a great deal of determination and daring in his face—a something which prevents his being considered a fearfully ugly man. His organization is essentially that of a soldier. He possesses all the fiery valor necessary to inspire the admiration of his army and the confidence of his subjects.

How every eye took note of every gesture made by Victor Emmanuel, entirely overlooking tall, genteel, amiable Prince Carignano, who was the observed of all observers until the King's advent:

"So doth the greater glory dim the less
A substitute shines brightly as a King.
Until a King be by; and then his state
Empties itself as doth an inland brook
Into the main of waters. Music? Hark!"

and such music! It was supposed to be a symbolical cantata after the manner of those used in the XIV. century to celebrate national feasts. If so, let us thank Heaven that we did not live in that age; for of all ridiculous, incomprehensible symbols, this cantata is their chef d'œuvre. The librettist, Fioretti, acquaints us with the startling intelligence that the Prologue takes place in Heaven, while the action lies in Florence: we are introduced to various spirits elect who in some inexplicable way glorify the Cross of Savoy and Victor Emanuel as early as the XIV. century. The music by Mabellini, a very ambitious composer who is said to have written some good works, though I very much doubt it, is quite as pretentious and unmeaning as Fioretti's poetry. The whole concert did not occupy more than half an hour; but even then it was too long, as Barbieri Mini, the prima donna, a fearfully ugly woman, and once a great singer, is at present passée. The other executants were worse. Of course the orchestra was fine, but everything failed to overpower the King, whose prisms it was sounding. His eyes wandered everywhere but in the direction of the prima donna; he talked to cousin Carignano, moved uneasily in his chair, thumbed the programme until we all rose at the finale, which reads thus:

"Long live King Victor! Mid waving of banners,
The drums' rattapans and the trumpets huge clangors,
The dark race of Latin repeat his great fame;
Behold our new Queen in fair Italy's dame!
To whisper his name through this land of the South
Is the signal of union—'war' breathes from each mouth—
Fear seizes the tyrant and stranger as we sing,
Long, long live our valiant, magnanimous King!"

There was something really inspiring in this shout of everything and everybody, and the simultaneous flutter of a hundred little flags. Victor Emanuel's countenance lighted up; whether it was at the sound of kettle drums and war trumpets, or at thought of his agony being at an end, I know not. He seemed very much pleased, and left us as he came, amid rapturous applause.—Corr. of New Orleans Picayune.

In Zwickau, the birthplace of ROBERT SCHUMANN, they have lately celebrated the fiftieth birthday of the lamented master. The celebration consisted of the inauguration of a medallion-portrait of Schumann, modelled by Rietschel, and put up above the portal of the family mansion. There were two concerts, at which only compositions of Schumann were performed. Dr. E. KLITZSCH conducted. The programme included the first Symphony (B flat), Requiem for Mignon, the Quintet for piano and strings, the first string quartet, the first trio for piano and strings, the Andante and Variations for two pianos, and various songs and minor pieces. Among those present were noticeable FERD. DAVID, GRUTZMACHER, TH. KIRCHNER, LISZT, R. POHL, BRENDL, HARTEL and others.

Organ for St. Paul's Cathedral Church, Louisville, Ky.

Our enterprising friends, Messrs. Simmons & Willcox, have just completed a fine organ for this church, which we had the pleasure of hearing one afternoon this week to the best advantage, under the skilful hands of Mr. Willcox. It is a work in every way creditable to the builders, and the Church cannot but be well pleased that it should have entrusted the commission to their hands. The diapasons are round, of rich, pure tone and full volume. The swell, it will be observed, runs through the full compass of the organ, and is of unusual power, not lacking, either, in the softer stops, that as solos, tickle the ears of most congregations. Among the finest stops is the "German Gamba," which is a fine specimen of this most beautiful and effective stop. Like a reed sound, or rather, of a string tone, yet not a reed stop, it is one of the most fascinating and charming of all the so-called fancy stops, and is constructed with entire success by these accomplished builders. The "Flûte Harmonique," also, is an admirably toned stop, giving great brilliancy to the general effect, or serving a valuable purpose as a solo. And so we might go on enumerating many beauties, would space allow us; we give below the contents of this instrument, of which Mr. E. Gunther will be the organist, who is well known as an accomplished artist, every way competent to do it justice.

There are Three Manuals extending from C, 8ft. to g8—56 notes.

Compass of Pedal, from C1 to d—27 notes.

Clippings from the German Papers.

Spohr, in his autobiography, of which the first instalments have just appeared in print, tells the following amusing story of Clementi. The time is his (Spohr's) first excursion to St. Petersburg, about the year 1800. Says Spohr:

"There were then many anecdotes afloat with regard to the singular avarice of the rich Clementi, which in later years, when I met him again in London, had increased considerably. It was reported that Field was kept very close by his master, and had to undergo many hardships for the privilege of enjoying his instructions. I had myself a taste of the real Italian mode of economizing, which Clementi lived up to, for one day I found teacher and pupil, with tucked up sleeves, at the washtub, cleansing their stockings and linen. My entrance did not disturb them at all. Clementi advised me to do the same, as not only the price charged at St. Petersburg for washing was very high, but that they had a way of doing it, which would wear the clothes out very quick."

How poorly Beethoven was appreciated by musical notabilities in Berlin, even as late as the year 1803, Spohr tells us in the following anecdote:

"I delivered my letters of recommendation, and soon received invitations to musical parties. First I played in the palace of Prince Radziwill, himself an excellent performer on the violoncello and a talented composer. I met there Bernard Romberg, Möser, Leidler, Semmler, and other distinguished artists. Romberg, then in his prime, played one of his quartets with violoncello obligato. I had not heard him before, and was charmed with his playing. When, after this, I was asked to play, I thought that nothing could be more appropriate to offer to such artists and connoisseurs than one of my favorite quartets of Beethoven (opus 18) with which I had so often delighted my Brunswick audiences. I was soon aware, however, as before in Leipsic, that my choice had been an unfortunate one, for the musicians in Berlin knew as little of these quartets as the musicians in Leipsic, and could neither play nor appreciate them. After I had finished they complimented my playing, but spoke very deprecatingly of the composition, which I had chosen. Romberg asked me directly: 'Pray tell me, dear Spohr, how you can play such eccentric stuff?'"

It is very amusing, as well as instructive to read, at the present day, the criticisms which great works called forth at the time of their first appearance. A Berlin paper, in 1809, which then enjoyed considerable reputation, wrote thus of Beethoven's great Overture to Leonore (the third):

"All connoisseurs and musical persons agree, that another piece of music so incoherent, disagreeable, confused, ear-irritating has not yet been written. The most cutting modulations follow each other. The harmony is really horrible. A few small ideas, which take away all semblance of grandeur, for instance, a Posthorn Solo, intended, we presume, to indicate the arrival of the governor, finish the disagreeable, stupifying impression of the whole." This very Overture is now acknowledged as one of the sublimest works of Beethoven! Schicht, a renowned composer of church-music and musical director at the Thomas church in Leipsic used to call Beethoven literally a "musical pig," but changed his opinion when he heard Fidelio performed. Zelter, the illustrious friend of Goethe, says in one of his letters to the poet: "There are two young composers, Cherubini and Beethoven, who are not without talent, but they have got into wrong roads." When Beethoven had published his first works, a Vienna musical paper advised him to stick to the career of a piano-virtuoso, as he had not the least talent for musical composition. The "Cecilia," a Mayence musical gazette, edited by Fink, said of Beethoven's third symphony, the Eroica: "It is the production of a madman; and its composer is perfectly ripe for a lunatic asylum."

Musical Chit-Chat.

CAMBRIDGE.—The Inauguration of the new President of Harvard College, C. C. Felton, L.L.D., took place on Thursday of this week. The music of the occasion was the grand Choral by Martin Luther; "A strong castle is our Lord," a "Domino salvum fac," by Mozart, and Jackson's To Deum in F., which were well sung by a large choir of male voices made up from the present and recent members of the College choir and members of the Harvard Musical Association. The musical part of the services were under the direction of Mr. L. P. Homer, the instructor of Music in the University; Mr. John H. Willcox presiding at the organ, a poor instrument in the most skilful of hands.

The annual Commencement exercises at the Academy of the sisters of Notre Dame, Roxbury, were held on Thursday, the 12th inst. The attendance was quite large, and the entertainment was one of great excellence throughout. The musical portion of it merits particular mention at our hands. The pupils have evidently been subjected to the most rigid musical discipline, and the system of constant surveillance kept up with unflinching severity. The result is a rare perfection of drill. This was most noticeable in the pieces for two, three, and four pianos, in which no teacher took any part whatever, but which, nevertheless were played with a sweetness and uniformity in time and expression, as if Zerrahn's bâton had been in sight all the time. The first Piano part had, in most cases, been allotted to Miss Doniphan, who acquitted herself of her difficult task to everybody's satisfaction. The musical part of the programme consisted of the Gazza Lndra Overture for six performers on three pianos; the Coronation Duet, (Herz) for two performers on two pianos, which won the heartiest applause; the first grand concertante Quartet for four players on four pianos, by Czerny, the best piece on the list; and Dresel's effective arrangement of Weber's Invitation to the Waltz, for four players on two instruments.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—It was our privilege to be present, on Sunday, June 24th, at the new chapel, corner of Clinton and Court streets, to hear the farewell sermon of Rev. Samuel Longfellow, brother of the distinguished American poet. Mr. Longfellow alluded, in expressive terms, to his past connection with the church, and enunciated in a very distinct manner, the outlines of the doctrines he had aimed to set forth. While his doctrines may be cavilled at by many, the devotion and single-heartedness of the man can hardly be questioned; and his bijou of a chapel and its service are a complete model by themselves. The part that music plays in the internal arrangements of the new chapel, are worthy of all praise and imitation by Protestant churches. Here we found the choir and organ in their proper places, though it be but an old idea newly inaugurated in this country. Certainly the questionable plan of putting the choir and organ at such a distance from the preacher, as that he, in common with all the congregation, shall be listeners and critics, instead of singers and worshippers, is fast dying out; and the example set at the new chapel in Brooklyn is doing much toward convincing that "City of Churches" that music, as well as religion, will not suffer by this beautiful and truly effective reform.—N. Y. Musical World.

OPERA.—The word Opera, used to express a drama sung instead of spoken, is a special use of a common word. It means simply Work. When music was first joined to the drama as an integral part of the performance, the piece was simply called a tragedy or comedy; but, by-and-by, as the music became more and more the speciality of the performance, terms were chosen to express more clearly the nature of the work. They were all works, and thus the term Opera was chosen, with a word following to describe it. Opera regia, comica, tragica, scenica, sacra, &c., were the terms used, and if it was also musical, the words per musica were added. By-and-by these became shortened into opera musicale; and finally opera alone was used to designate a musical work, and the primitive terms, tragedia and comedia retained for purely dramatic compositions. Though the word has no special reference to music, and is equally applicable to a poem or a painting, it has received a special signification by long habit, and expresses, in one word, the lyric drama.—Musical Times.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.—Mr. Gilmore's band of instrumental musicians inaugurated the fourth season of their pleasant Promenade Concerts on Saturday evening, July 7, in a highly successful manner. The band is in excellent condition, giving evidence of careful training on the part of their accomplished leader, and of diligent practice among themselves. The improvement they have made since last year is manifest to the most careless listener, and the energy and industry, of which their increased excellence is the happy result, is most creditable. The selection of music for performance at these concerts is generally very judicious. Mr. Gilmore remembers, as he ought, that people want nothing heavy in hot weather. Light books, light clothes, light wines and light music always find a ready market from July until September. Nothing should be permitted to change so laudable a taste.

We hope these concerts will meet with that success to which they are entitled, for there can be no pleasanter way of passing an evening under cover than in listening to enlivening music, and meeting pleasant people. Mr. Gilmore desires that the public should gather about him and enjoy themselves, but we are pleased to learn that it is his intention to frown upon the slightest demonstrations of rowdyism of any kind. Before the season closes the band is to be augmented by the addition of reed instruments. Concerts are given on Wednesday and Saturday evenings, and on Saturday afternoon.—Ibid.

THE DRAMA.—At the annual meeting of the Boston Theatre Corporation, on the 9th inst., the old board of directors, consisting of Messrs. John S. Tyler, A. H. Fiske, John E. Lodge, E. C. Bates, Gardner Brewer, W. W. Tucker and Thomas W. Pierce, was re-elected. The theatre, we are rejoiced to learn, will once again be under the exclusive management of Mr. THOMAS BARRY, whose record as actor, manager and man, through a long series of years passed in the service of the public, will bear the most critical scrutiny. His experience, ability and taste have been often and successfully tested, and the fact that he is at the head of a dramatic establishment is a sufficient guaranty that it will prove worthy the liberal patronage of a cultivated community. Mr. Barry has already made arrangements for a period of thirty weeks, and we look forward with interest to the commencement of his dramatic season, which we feel sure will go far to make up for the lamentable theatrical entertainments of the season just closed.—Ibid.

MUSIC COMMITTEES IN CHURCHES.—One reason for the difficulty which churches meet with in their music, is the fact that it is intrusted to the hands of incompetent committees. We do not know why it is, but the music committee of a church almost invariably contains one man who cannot tell "Old Hundred" from "Yankee Doodle." If a parish can find a man who is utterly stupid and stolid—a man who has no music in his soul and none anywhere else,—they will be sure to put him upon the singing committee. There is nothing which assees feel themselves so competent to manage as church music. Such men and such committees are always disgusting singers, making trouble in choirs, introducing the most senseless changes, and raising a row generally. The best singers in a congregation make always the best and the only competent singing committees, and the further the number on such a committee is raised above one, the worst for all concerned.—Springfield Republican.

THE SONTAG VERSION.—The admirable and much regretted Sontag substituted a phrase at the close of the Masked Trio in Don Giovanni, in the place of Mozart's. Her example was soon followed, and all the singers of Europe adopted in this place Mme. Sontag's invention.

One day at a rehearsal in London, a celebrated leader hearing this bold innovation at the close of the trio, stopped the orchestra, and addressing the prima donna, said: "Well, madam, what does this mean? Have you forgotten your part?"

"No sir; I am singing the Sontag version."

"Ah! very well! but allow me to take the liberty of saying, that though you may prefer the Sontag version to the Mozart version, the latter is the only one we have anything to do with here."—H. Berlin.

THE FLAGEOLET WORSHIPPER.—There was an excellent musician, who was so entirely enamored of the flageolet, which he managed finely, that he was forever playing it, though the instrument had no part in the score. He doubled with the flute, or the oboe, or the clarinet; he would have doubled the bass-viol rather than remain silent. One of his brother musicians ventured to say, that it was strange he should allow himself to play in a Beethoven symphony. "You mechanize my instrument," said he, "and pretend to despise it!" Fools! If Beethoven had heard me, his works would be full of flageolet solos, and he would have made his fortune. But he never heard me; and he died in a hospital.—H. Berlin.

Spohr was one day met in the street on his way to the opera, where he had to conduct the opera in honor of the birthday of the Elector. He was clothed in a heavy winter mantle, although the weather-glass stood eighty degrees above zero. "Are you sick?" asked the man who met him. "No," replied Spohr, throwing back his mantle and showing his breast covered with orders, "I am only ashamed to go thus through the streets."

SAN FRANCISCO.—An opera company, made up of Mr. Escott, Mr. Squires, Mr. Leach and others have been singing here in English opera, and have given "Lucia," "La Traviata," "The Rose of Castille" and "Ernani." They have met with good success and crowded houses, as we learn from the San Francisco Herald.

SIGNORA GUERRABELLA.—This young American lady has been making a great furor in Italy as a dramatic singer. The Italian papers and private letters give most enthusiastic accounts of her reception at Turin, Milan, etc. Signor Guerrabella was not originally intended for the stage. She is an only child, and it was only by insistence on her part that her parents consented to let her make a more extended use of the gifts with which nature had endowed her. She is thoroughly devoted to her profession; and, although only two years have elapsed since she began her career, she has sung in some of the best Italian theatres with unqualified success. At Bergamo, during the carnival, her appearance in Pacini's opera, "Stella di Napoli," caused immense excitement, the audience testifying their delight by calling the favorite over and over again before the curtain. A correspondent tells us of an adventure which happened to La Guerrabella after the ovation at Bergamo. On returning to Milan, she was engaged, as the contract showed, at the chief theatre in Trieste. On her arrival at Venice, to embark for Trieste, in the evening, Signora Guerrabella was accosted at the railroad by the secretary of the director, who expressed his regret that they could not secure the theatre at Trieste, and begged that she would open the opera at Venice. The lady immediately saw through the ruse, and positively refused. The secretary offered her any terms, and told her that if she would consent, the Governor of Venice, Count Toggenburg, would come and ratify any proposition she chose to make. The signora persisted in her refusal. The secretary followed her to the hotel. After re-perusing her contract, to be certain she had made no mistake, she laid it by her side, and the Secretary then seized it and tore it up. Next morning La Guerrabella returned to Milan. On her arrival, Count Correr, President of the Committee of Venetian Emigration, and Count Meroner called to thank her in the name of the Committee for her noble and courageous conduct. The resolution by the Italians not to support opera in the kingdom of Venice, was an expression of national grief for the situation of the unhappy Venetians; hence the sympathy of the Milanese, hence the desire of the official to force attendance by means of a powerful attraction. Thus the young cantatrice found herself suddenly looked upon not only as an operatic but a political star. She was offered a diploma as citizen of Venice; congratulations poured in from all sides, and her reception that night at the theatre was a triumph. As her fame has spread, engagements have poured in, and some of the most profitable proposals come from Constantinople.—Horne Journal.

THE MYSTERY OF EDITING.—The world at large do not understand the mysteries of a newspaper; and, as in a watch, the hands, that are seen, are but the passive instruments of the spring, which is never seen, so, in a newspaper, the most worthy causes of its prosperity are often least observed or known. Who suspects the benefit which a paper derives from the enterprise, the vigilance, and the watchful fidelity of the publisher? Who pauses to think how much of the pleasure of reading is derived from the skill and care of the printer? We feel the blemishes of printing, if they exist, but seldom observe the excellences.

We eat a hearty dinner, but do not think of the farmer that raised the materials thereof, or the cook that prepared them with infinite pains and skill. But a cook of vegetables, meat, pastries, and infinite bouillons, has a paradisaical office in comparison with an editor! Before him pass in review all the exchange newspapers. He is to know all their contents, to mark for other eyes, the matters that require attention. His scissors are to be alert, and clip with incessant industry all the little items that together form so large an interest in the news department. He passes in review, each week, every State in the Union, through the newspaper lens; he looks across the ocean and sees strange lands, and following the sun, he searches all round the world for material. It will require but one second's time for the readers to take in what two hours' research produced. By him are read the manuscripts that swarm the office like flies in July. It is his frown that dooms them. It is his hand that condenses a whole page into a line. It is his discreet sternness that restricts sentimental obituaries, that gives young poets a twig on which to sit and sing their first lay.

And the power behind the throne, in newspapers as in higher places, is sometimes as important as the throne itself. Correspondents, occasional or regular, stand in awe at that silent power which has the last chance at an article, and may send it forth in glory or in humility. And, in short, as the body depends upon a good digestion, so the health of a paper depends upon that vigorous digestion which goes on by means of the editor.

Ought they not to be honored? And since little fame attends them, they should at least have their creature comforts multiplied. From that dark and dismal den in which they have so long had purgatorial residence, they are at length translated!—Henry Ward Beecher.

MYSTERIOUS MUSIC.—The mystic music sometimes heard at the mouth of the Pascagoula river, on a still night, is one of the wonders of our coast. It is not confined, however, to the Pascagoula river, but has often been heard at other places. At the mouth of the Bayou Coq del Inde and other inlets opening into the Gulf along the coast of our own country, the curious listener, lying idle in his boat, with lifted oars, when every other sound is hushed, may sometimes hear its strains coming apparently from beneath the waters, like soft notes of distant Æolian harp.

We have always supposed that this phenomenon, whatever its origin might be, natural or supernatural, was peculiar to our own coast. It appears, however, from Sir Emerson Tennant's recent work on Ceylon, something very like it is known at Battialloa, in that island, and it is attributed to rather less poetical and mysterious origin—that it is a peculiar species of shell-fish. They are said to be heard at night, and most distinctly when the moon is nearest the full.—Mobile Herald.

THE FLIGHT OF SOUND.—M. Montigny, in a note addressed to the Academy of Belgium, questions the rate at which sound travels laid down in the books. He states that in a storm in September last, he, while at a distance of three miles from where the lightning struck, could count but two seconds between the lightning and the thunder. Had the rate of travel of the sound been no more than 1,100 feet per second, as is generally supposed, there would have been an interval of fifteen seconds. Another gentleman, situated at nearly a similar distance in another direction from the place struck by the lightning, could perceive no greater interval than M. Montigny. Many other facts are noted by M. Montigny, all tending to prove that the rate at which the sound of thunder travels, is much greater than 1,100 feet per second. In the meeting of the British Association for the Advancement of Science of 1858, it was shown that the sound of a cannon travels faster than the sound of the human voice.

EXPERIMENTS ON THE QUALITY OF SOUND.—M. Scott is the originator of a very ingenious apparatus, by means of which some interesting experiments have been made in reference to the different qualities of sound, and the cause of such difference. The apparatus consists of a tube spreading out widely at one extremity like a trumpet, and closed at the other end by a thin, stretched membrane, to the middle of which is attached a very light pencil. The tube concentrates the sounds which enter by its base, and the vibrations of the membrane thus produced are written by the pencil upon a paper coated with lampblack, which is uniformly placed under the pencil by clock-work. The traces thus produced may be copied and preserved—magnified, if necessary—by photography. When the common accord is sounded on different instruments, the figures formed are very different both in form and dimensions, according as wind instruments, stringed instruments, or the human voice are used. The same differences are seen when the record of singing is compared with that of unmusical noises. M. Scott establishes this curious fact, that the series of vibrations formed by the sound of an instrument or voice is more regular, even, and consequently more nearly isochronous, in proportion as it is more pure and agreeable to the ear. In shrill cries and harsh sounds of instruments, the waves of condensation are irregular, unequal, and not isochronous.

THE SINGING OF CHILDREN.—There is something exceedingly thrilling in the voices of children singing. Though their music be unskillful, yet it finds its way to the heart with wonderful celerity. Voices of cherubs are they, for they breathe of paradise; clear, liquid tones that flow from pure lips and innocent hearts, like the sweetest notes of a flute, or the falling of water from a fountain!—Longfellow.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Moonlight beams are shining, love. Song and Chorus. J. P. Ordway. 25

A new melody by the author of so many pretty and widely known airs. It is pretty enough to outshine many a former song of this composer which made its mark at the time.

I love thee far more dearly. (L'amo a m'é piu cara.) Romanza from Bellini's "I Capuleti." 25

A most charming song whose melody every one will recognize as one long familiar by a host of piano-arrangements, easy and difficult. It is as striking and singable as "Vaga luna" (Katy Darling) and must quickly become a favorite song.

The Brook. Song. Dolores. 25

My Mary. Endersohn. 25

So long as my darling loves me. M. W. Balfe. 24

Three excellent new songs of English authors.

The Union. National Song. J. M. Deems. 25

Good, stirring words, and an energetic air. Could be made very serviceable at the present day.

My Eulalie. Song. G. W. Stratton. 25

Cora Lane. Ballad. Mark van Winkle. 25

Songs for young singers, easy and taking.

Instrumental Music.

Fair Emily. Polka de Salon. L. G. Caseres. 25

The author will be recollected in this vicinity as a clever pianist. This polka shows a fair talent for composition. It is a well written and effective piece.

Good Templars Grand March. G. A. Ingraham. 25

Rifeman's March. C. D'Albert. 30

Both good and spirited marches of medium difficulty.

Idylle. Op. 7. Fritz Spindler. 30

There is hardly one of the younger German composers so much in vogue at present as Fritz Spindler. He writes for great and small players with the same felicitous grace and fluency. The above is one of his loveliest inspirations, which deserves the heartiest recommendation.

Tyrolese Medley. C. Grobe. 50

The best of the Tyrolese mountain-songs have been made familiar here by the Rainer, Steyermarker, and other troupes, and will be gladly welcomed in Grobe's tasty pianoforte arrangements.

Books.

THE YOUNG FOLKS' GLEE BOOK. Consisting of nearly one hundred copyright Songs and Duets never before harmonized; and the choicest gems from the German and Italian. The whole arranged in a familiar style for the use of Singing Classes, Glee Clubs and the Social Circle. By Charles Jarvis. 1.00

Special attention is solicited to the general features of this work, as possessing universal attractions. The copyright songs, duets, &c., comprise the best pieces of the leading publishers, inserted here by permission and contained in no other book. Of the gems of German and Italian song, nothing need be said, as their beauties are universally known and admired; and their arrangement and collection in this form can not fail to be duly appreciated by every lover of a highly refined and classic style of music. Attention has been directed to the choice of words, and they will, in each case, be found elevated in sentiment and adapted to the great mass of the people.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

A Musical Instrument.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

What was he doing, the great god Pan,
Down in the reeds by the river?
Spreading ruin and scattering ban,
Splashing and paddling with hoofs of a goat,
And breaking the golden lilies afloat
With the dragon-fly on the river?

He tore out a reed, the great god Pan,
From the deep cool bed of the river.
The limpid water turbidly ran,
And the broken lilies a-dying lay,
And the dragon-fly had fled away,
Ere he brought it out of the river.

High on the shore sat the great god Pan,
While turbidly flowed the river,
And hacked and hewed as a great god can,
With his hard bleak steel at the patient reed,
Till there was not a sign of a leaf, indeed,
To prove it fresh from the river.

He cut it short, did the great god Pan,
(How tall it stood in the river!)
Then drew the pith, like the heart of a man,
Steadily from the outside ring,
Then notched the poor dry, empty thing,
In holes as he sate by the river.

"This is the way," laughed the great god Pan, (Laughed while he sate by the river!)
"The only way, since gods began
To make sweet music, they could succeed."
Then, dropping his mouth to a hole in the reed,
He blew in power by the river.

Sweet, sweet, sweet, O Pan,
Piercing sweet by the river!
Blinding sweet, O great god Pan!
The sun on the hill forgot to die,
And the lilies revived, and the dragon-fly
Came back to dream on the river.

Yet half a beast is the great god Pan,
To laugh, as he sits by the river,
Making a poet out of a man.
The true gods sigh for the cost and pain —
For the reed that grows nevermore again
As a reed with the reeds in the river.

Reissiger.

Charles Theophilus Reissiger, Kapellmeister of the king of Saxony, died at Dresden, November 7th, 1859. He was born at Betzig, near Rittenberg, January 31, 1798, and being the son of a musician was early initiated into the principles of music. He was sent in 1818 to the University of Leipsic, where he devoted himself for some time to the study of theology, which in Germany is the basis of all literary and liberal education. Assisted by generous friends, Reissiger, who was poor, took up with ardor the study of composition under the direction of one Schicht, who was a benefactor to him, and in 1821 went to Vienna, where he composed his first opera, which was never performed. In 1822, Reissiger left Vienna to go to Munich, to receive the instructions of the celebrated composer, Winter, author of the opera so well known in Germany, "the Interrupted Sacrifice." After having attained much success by the composition of an overture upon a theme of five notes given him by Winter, Reissiger left for Leipsic and Berlin, where the King of Prussia charmed by his talents, assisted him in making a journey to Italy. Reissiger came to Paris in 1824, and resided there during a year. He went to Italy, visited Milan, Bologna, Florence, Rome and Naples, and then returned to Berlin at the close of 1825, where he was charged with preparing the plan of a Conservatory of Music, which was proposed in the capital of Prussia. In the month of October, 1826, Reissiger was appointed director of music to the King of Saxony, in the place of Marschner who had been called to Hanover, which post Reissiger occupied until his death, at the age of sixty-one.

Reissiger was a composer more prolific than original. He has written five or six operas that has met with success, such as the Felsenmühle (the Mill of the Rocks) and especially Turandot, very popular at Dresden, a great number of masses and motets, and much instrumental music. Facile as an imitator, especially of Weber and of many other masters, Reissiger produced incessantly, and gave to the engraver all that fell from his pen. He is the author of that pretty waltz known every where under the lying title la dernière Pensée de Weber. Reissiger himself has claimed in the public journals the paternity of this happy inspiration. "La dernière Pensée de Weber" says Reissiger in a letter to a M. Charles Bansi, was composed by me in 1822, and sent the same year to a music publisher at Leipsic, who had it engraved at the end of my trio, Op. 26. I have played it often in public at Leipsic, and always with great success. I have communicated it to Weber, who was charmed with it and often played it. The waltz was published at Paris by a speculator under a title which has made it popular."

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS IN PARIS.

Among the interesting and profitable publications of the music trade of Paris in the year 1859, should be mentioned, especially the score of the Pardon de Ploërmel of Meyerbeer, published by Brandus, of which more than three thousand copies, (for voice with piano accompaniment) it is said have been sold. Gounod's Faust, edited by M. Choudens, is, after this new work of Meyerbeer, the best thing in the music trade of Paris. A success, and a durable success, not the result of a happy mise en scène only, is necessary in order that the publication of a dramatic composition can be a good speculation for a publisher, and nothing is rarer in our time than an opera that survives its first season.

The Singing Soul.

A LEGEND OF NORMANDY.

At the foot of one of the hills which bound the parish of Corneuil, there stood, a long time ago, a little cottage, nearly hidden by the trees which surrounded it. In this cottage dwelt a poor widow, to whom Heaven, during a life the length of which she counted by sorrows, had granted one sole source of great joy. This was Martha, her daughter, a maiden so lovely that nothing more charming could be imagined. She was cheerful and lively, and all who beheld her, beautiful as God had made her, would have longed to take her in their arms, had they not feared at the same time to destroy the lovely vision by so doing. Those who met her, few enough they were, to be sure, retained her image in their hearts, like that of a saint from heaven.

But the simple, humble maiden had, beside the charm of her beauty, still another gift, which was known only to herself, her mother, and the solitude around their dwelling. This was a voice so clear, so sweet, and of such compass, that no second one like it could have been found in the whole world. In the evening, after having performed her homely household duties, the good child would take her needlework, seat herself by the little lamp, and sing such beautiful and holy strains that the angels in heaven could not but rejoice at them. At such times her mother would sit motionless for hours, dropping her work, and listening to the melodies which swelled forth in endless interwinings, and surpassed each other wondrously.

"Sing, my child," the old woman would say, "as long as thou dost sing thou wilt be virtuous and therefore happy."

Alas, poor woman, she was mistaken!

Martha reached her seventeenth year, but she was too poor to marry. True, the youths of the neighboring village admired her beauty, but they would not venture to choose for the companion of their life of labor so tender a blossom, which the first storm would have withered.

One day her mother had gone from home. Martha had placed her wooden stool in the shadow of the trees before the cottage, and sat down there to spin. The air was soft and balmy, as it mostly was in May, and while the girl gladly breathed the fragrance of the flowers, she sang her sweetest lays. With every verse the power of her voice increased, and its compass seemed incredible.

But how great was her surprise, when she suddenly saw herself surrounded by glittering knights who, attracted by the lovely sounds, were now devouring the poor girl with their gaze. Martha's surprise soon changed to alarm, as she recognized among the listeners the Count of Corneuil, her own master, who was known as one of the most terrible and hardhearted knights in the country.

Awed by him, his companions preserved a timid silence, but he cast upon the poor songstress a glance which made her tremble. She sang no more on that day. In the evening, when her mother returned, she inquired why she was silent.

"Dear mother," said she, with a tender embrace, "I am afraid!"

She would not, however, tell her mother the cause of her fear, in order not to alarm her, but it would have been better if she had done so, for the next morning, at the same hour, two liveried servants came to summon her to the castle.

"My gracious lord," she cried with tears, as she saw the Count approaching her, "save me, protect me!"

"Thou art in a safe place here, my charming nightingale, and I willingly take thee under my protection." In saying this, he beckoned to the servants, and they liberated the maiden; but when she looked around, the drawbridge was raised.

"Be kind, gracious Sir, send me back to my mother!"

"Willingly, my gentle dove, but on one condition."

"No, no!" cried she, for she guessed his meaning.

She remained a prisoner. She was confined in a turret chamber, like a bird in its cage. At night the Count approached the door of her cell, full of evil desires. He thought to triumph over the weak girl who had no defence beside her prayers; but suddenly he remained rooted to the spot, and listened immovably to the entrancing strains in which his victim sent up her supplications to the Madonna. At last, as if the pious tones had laid the evil spirit which possessed him, he crept away, without having the courage to approach her. When Martha had finished her prayer, she opened the window, and saw, by the bright moonlight, an old woman standing on the edge of the moat which surrounded the castle, and stretching out her arms towards her.

"Mother!" she cried, and her heart was full of sorrow.

And so it was the next day, and every day for several months. As often as the wicked knight would have approached the maiden, her pure and touching song drove away the evil desire of his heart. But one evening the old woman was missing from the site of the moat, and from that time grief consumed the heart of the good Martha. She faded visibly; the weaker her body grew, the more entrancing grew her song, and when her outward form had dwindled to a mere shadow, her voice had reached the highest perfection.

Meanwhile, her master, too, had grown better and purer under the influence of her singing; his love for the beautiful maiden had turned into reverence for her angelic voice, and he no longer denied her anything but complete liberty, because he could not live without her song.

One morning she was so weak that the Count did not venture to refuse her request that she might carry a garland to her mother's grave. She went, and after visiting the grave she entered the church, where service was being held. She mingled with the peasants, and joined in their hymns.

But by a strange miracle her voice had such a mighty effect upon the assembled people, that all were silent, and suffered the pious maiden to sing on alone. The last sound left her lips just as the priest elevated the host. Praying she sunk upon her knees, and when those around her tried to lift her up, she was dead.

But her soul has not yet deserted that region, for often, at midnight, glorious strains are heard in the church at Corneuil, and those who hear them, say; "That is the soul of Martha, the singer of the turret-chamber." M. A. R.

Early Development of Musical Genius.

Music, in its highest degree of endowment, produces effects in the human character, of which the least that can be said is, that they are as worthy of being studied as any other class of mental phenomena. One of the most remarkable circumstances attending the gift in its loftiest forms, is the absolute impossibility of repressing it. Even during childhood, it is quite in vain, in most instances, to attempt to impose upon it the least control. In spite of the injunctions, the vigilance, the tyranny of masters and parents, the "unprisoned soul" of the musician seems always to find some means of escape; and even when debarred from the use of musical instruments, it is ten to one but in the end he is discovered ensconced in some quiet corner, tuning his horse shoes, or, should he be so fortunate as to secure so great a prize, like Eulenstein, eliciting new and unknown powers of harmony from the iron tongue of a Jew's harp. Some curious examples of the extent to which this ruling passion has been carried, occasionally occur. Dr. Arne (except Purcell, perhaps our greatest English composer) was bred a lawyer, and as such articulated to an attorney; but his musical propensities, which showed themselves at a very early age, soon engrossed his mind to the exclusion of everything else. He used not unfrequently to avail himself of the privilege of a servant, by borrowing a livery and going to the upper gallery of the opera house, at that time appropriated to domestics. It is also said that he used to hide a spinet in his room, upon which, after muffling the strings with a handkerchief, he practised during the night: for had his father known what was going forward, he probably would have thrown both him and it out of the window. The latter, however, never appears to have come to a knowledge of those proceedings, and his son, instead of studying law, was devoting himself entirely to the cultivation of the spinet, the violin, and musical composition, until one day, after he had served out his time, when he happened to call at the house of a gentleman in the neighborhood, who was engaged with a musical party, when being ushered into the room, to his utter surprise and horror he discovered his son in the act of playing the first fiddle; from which period the old gentleman began to think it most prudent to give up the contest, and soon after allowed him to receive regular instructions.

Handel, too, was similarly situated. His father, who was a physician at Halle, in Saxony, destined him for the profession of the law, and with this view was so determined to check his early inclination towards music, that he excluded from his house all musical society; nor would he permit music or musical instruments to be ever heard within its walls. The child, however, notwithstanding his parent's precautions, found means to hear somebody play on the harpsichord; and the delight which he felt having prompted him to endeavor to gain an opportunity of practising what he had heard, he contrived, through a servant, to procure a small clavichord or spinet, which he secreted in a garret, and to which he repaired every night after the family had gone to rest, and intuitively, without extraneous aid, learned to extract from it its powers of harmony as well as melody. Upon this subject, Mr. Hogarth, in his popular History of Music, has the following sensible observation:—A childish love for music or painting, even when accompanied with an aptitude to learn a something of these arts, is not, in one case out of a hundred, or rather a thousand, conjoined with that degree of genius, without which it would be a vain and idle pursuit. In the general case, therefore, it is wise to check such propensities where they appear likely to divert or incapacitate the mind from greater pursuits. But, on the other hand, the judgment of a parent of a gifted child ought to be shown by his discerning the genuine talent as soon as it manifests itself, and then bestowing it on every care and culture."

A tale exactly similar is told of Handel's great contemporary John Sebastian Bach, a man of equally stupendous genius, and whose works at the present day are looked up to with the same veneration with which we regard those of the former. He was born at Eisenach in 1685, and when ten years old (his father being dead) was left to the care of his elder brother, an organist, from whom he received his first instructions; but the talent of the pupil so completely outran the slow current of the master's ideas, that pieces of greater difficulty were perpetually in demand, and as often refused. Among other things, young Bach set his heart upon a book containing pieces for the clavichord, by the most celebrated composers of the day, but the use of it was pointedly refused. It was in vain, however, to repress the youthful ardor of the composer. The book lay in a cupboard, the door of which was of lattice work; and as the interstices were large enough to admit his little hand, he soon saw that by rolling it up, he could withdraw and replace it at pleasure; and having found his way thither during the night, he set about copying it, and, having no candle, he could only work by moonlight! In six months, however, his task was completed; but just as he was on the point of reaping the harvest of his toils, his brother unluckily found out the circumstance, and by an act of the most contemptible cruelty, took the book from him; and it was not till after his brother's death, which took place some time afterwards, that he recovered it.

The extraordinary proficiency acquired in this art more than in any other, at an age before the intellectual powers are fully expanded, may be regarded as one of the most interesting results of this early and enthusiastic devotion to music. We can easily imagine a child acquiring considerable powers of execution upon a pianoforte—an instrument which demands no great effort of physical strength, and even pouring forth a rich vein of natural melody; but how excellence in composition, in the combination of the powers of harmony and instrumentation—a process which in adults is usually arrived at after much labor, regular training, and long study of the best models and means of producing effect—how such knowledge and skill can ever exist in a child, is indeed extraordinary; still there can be no doubt of the fact. The genius of a Mozart appears and confounds all abstract speculations. When scarcely eight years of age, this incomparable artist, while in Paris on his way to Great Britain, had composed several sonatas for the harpsichord, with violin accompaniments, which were set in a masterly and finished style. Shortly afterwards, when in London, he wrote his first symphony and a set of sonatas, dedicated to the queen. Daines Barrington, speaking of him at this time, says that he appeared to have a thorough knowledge of the fundamental rules of composition, as on giving him a melody, he immediately wrote an excellent bass to it. This he had been in the custom of doing several years previously; and the minuets and little movements which he composed from the age of four till seven, are said to have possessed a consistency of thought and a symmetry of design which were perfectly surprising. Mr. Barrington observes that at the above period, namely, when Mozart was eight years old, his skill in extemporaneous modulation, making smooth and effective transitions from one key to another, was wonderful; that he executed these musical difficulties occasionally with a handkerchief over the keys, and that, with all these displays of genius, his general deportment was entirely that of a child. While he was playing to Mr. Barrington, his favorite cat came into the room, upon which he immediately left the instrument to play with it, and could not be brought back for some time; after which he had hardly resumed his performance, when he started off again, and began running about the room with a stick between his legs for a horse! At twelve years of age he wrote his first opera, "La Finta Semplice," the score of which contained seven hundred and fifty-eight pages; but though approved by Hasse and Metastasio, in consequence of a cabal among the performers it was never represented. He wrote also at the same age a mass, Offertorium, &c., the performance of which he conducted himself. The precocity of Handel, though not quite so striking, was nearly so. At nine years of age he composed some motets of such merit that they were adopted in the service of the church; and about the same age, Purcell, when a singing boy, produced several anthems so beautiful that they have been preserved, and are still sung in our cathedrals. "To beings like these," Mr. Hogarth observes, "music seems to have no rules. What others consider the most profound and learned combinations, are with them the dictates of imagination and feeling, as much as the simplest strains of melody."

Mozart's early passion for arithmetic is well known, and to the last, though extremely improvident in his affairs, he was very fond of figures, and singularly clever in making calculations. Storace, a contemporary and kindred genius, who died in his thirty-third year, and whose English operas are among the few of the last century which still continue to hold their place on our stage, had the same extraordinary turn for calculation. We are not aware whether this can be shown to be a usual concomitant of musical genius, but, if it can, the coincidence might lead to much curious metaphysical inquiry. Certain it is that there exists a connection between that almost intuitive perception of the relation of numbers with which some individuals are gifted, and that faculty of the mind which applies itself to the intervals of the musical scale, the distribution of the chords, their effect separately and in combination, and the adjustment of the different parts of a score. It is by no means improbable, that, owing to some such subtlety of perception, Mozart was enabled to work off an infinitely greater variety and multitude of compositions, in every branch of the art, before he had reached his thirty-sixth year, in which he was cut off, than has ever been produced by any composer within the same space of time, and with a degree of minute scientific accuracy which has disarmed all criticism, and defied the most searching examination.

Nevertheless there is seldom anything wonderful which is not exaggerated, and many absurd stories have been circulated in regard to these efforts; among others, that the overture to Don Giovanni was composed during the night preceding its first performance. This piece was certainly written down in one night, but it cannot be said to have been composed in that short space of time. The facts are as follows:—He had put off the writing till eleven o'clock of the night before the intended performance, after he had spent the day in the fatiguing business of the rehearsal. His wife sat by him to keep him awake. "He wrote," says Mr. Hogarth, "while she ransacked her memory for the fairy tales of her youth, and all the humorous and amusing stories she could think of. As long as she kept him laughing, till the tears ran down his cheeks, he got on rapidly; but if she was silent for a moment, he dropped asleep. Seeing at last that he could hold out no longer, she persuaded him to lie down for a couple of hours. At five in the morning she awoke him, and at seven when the copyists appeared, the score was completed. Mozart was not in the habit of composing with the pen in his hand: his practice was not merely to form in his mind a sketch or outline of a piece of music, but to work it well and complete in all parts; and it was not till this was done that he committed this to paper, which he did with rapidity, even when surrounded by his friends, and joining in their conversation. There can be no doubt that the overture to Don Giovanni existed fully in his mind when he sat down to write it the night before its performance; and even then, his producing with such rapidity a score for so many instruments, so rich in harmony and contrivance, indicates a strength of conception and a power of memory altogether wonderful." In truth, Mozart's whole life would seem to have consisted of little more than a succession of musical reveries. He was very absent, and in answering questions, appeared to be always thinking about something else. Even in the morning when he washed his hands, he never stood still, but used to walk up and down the room. At dinner, also, he was apparently lost in meditation, and not in the least aware of what he did. During all this time the mental process was constantly going on; and he himself, in a letter to a friend gives, the following interesting explanation of his habits of composition.

"When once I become possessed of an idea, and have begun to work upon it, it expands, becomes methodized and defined, and the whole piece stands almost finished and complete in my mind, so that I can survey it, like a fine picture or a beautiful statue, at a glance. Nor do I hear in my imagination the parts successively, but I hear them, as it were, all at once; the delight which this gives me I cannot express. All this inventing, this producing, takes place in a pleasing lively dream, but the actual hearing of the whole is, after all, the greatest enjoyment. What has been thus produced, I do not easily forget; and this is perhaps the most precious gift for which I have to be thankful. When I proceed to write down my ideas, I take out of the bag of my memory, if I may use the expression, what has previously been collected in the way I have mentioned. For this reason, the committing to paper is done quickly enough, for every thing, as I said before, is already finished, and rarely differs on paper from what it was in my imagination."

Apart from his musical triumphs, the personal character of Mozart is deeply interesting. From his earliest childhood, it seemed to be his perpetual endeavor to conciliate the affections of those around him; in truth, he could not bear to be otherwise than loved. The gentlest, the most docile and obedient of children, even the fatigues of a whole day's performance would never prevent him from continuing to play or practise, if his father desired it. When scarcely more than an infant, we are told that every night, before going to bed, he used to sing a little air which he had composed on purpose, his father having placed him standing in a chair, and singing the second to him: he was then, but not till then, laid in bed perfectly contented and happy. Throughout the whole of his career, he seemed to live much more for the sake of others than for himself. His great object at the outset was to relieve the necessities of his parents afterwards his generosity towards his professional brethren, and the impositions practised by the designing on his open and unsuspecting nature, brought on difficulties. And, finally, those exertions so infinitely beyond his strength, which, in the ardor of his affection for his wife and children, and in order to save them from impending destitution, he was prompted to use, destroyed his health, and hurried him to an untimely grave.

Mozart was extremely pious. In a letter written in his youth from Augsburg, he says, "I pray every day that I may do honor to myself and to Germany—that I may earn money and be able to relieve you from your present distressed state. When shall we meet again and live happily together?" It is not difficult to identify these sentiments with the author of the sublimest and most expressive piece of devotional music which the genius of man has ever consecrated to his Maker. Haydn also was remarkable for his deep sense of religion. "When I was engaged, in composing the Creation," he used to say, "I felt myself so penetrated with religious feeling, that before I sat down to write I earnestly prayed to God that he would enable me to praise him worthily." It is related also of Handel, that he used to express the great delight which he felt in setting to music the most sublime passages of Holy Writ, and the habitual study of the Scriptures had a strong influence upon his sentiments and conduct.—Chambers' Journal.

The Definition and Description of the Organ.

WITH SOME ACCOUNT OF ITS MECHANISM.

The Organ is a wind instrument, with a key-board, the sounds of which are fixed, but capable of being sustained at the will of the player, especially consecrated to the service of the Church.

This definition makes the organ liable to all that may be expected of it by the laws both of art and religion.

On first looking at its case exteriorly, we are struck more especially with three things; with the immense size of its pipes in front, which we take to be the most powerful in the instrument, though they are, on the contrary, the least so; with the key-boards, which, though we should hardly have thought it perhaps, were we to put down the keys, would at once give utterance to those great pipes; and with a quantity of knobs or handles, which stand out from the case of the organ on two sides of the key-board, and carrying, each of them, the name of some instrument, such as the flute, the viol da gamba, the trumpet, and the like. But nothing of all this acts or speaks alone, for in order to this various parts of the organ must be joined together, and all these various parts do not at once meet the eye.

The organ has no voice, but by means of the wind inhaled by the bellows, and these are placed as near the main body of the instrument as possible, in order that they may send the wind the more directly into the pipes which rest upon it. Herein we may compare the instrument to a man, who would not be able to make himself understood without inhaling the air, which, after it has been equally distributed throughout his lungs, is driven out by them again through the vocal passages. The bellows, with its feeders, is as much the chest to the organ as the lungs are to the human frame. Put in motion by the blower, they fill themselves one after the other, and are emptied into a common channel placed near their extremity, and this is called the main wind trunk.

From this main channel other wind trunks branch off, as branches from the same common root, and carry the source of its sound into all parts of the instrument, as the branches of the tree carry the sap, or rather, as we have taken the human frame for our analogy, these smaller wind trunks are as the arteries, which, by means of the heaven-sprung system of the circulation, carry on the blood, which is pumped forth by the heart, throughout the whole of the body. The wind thus conveyed by one or many channels, gathers itself together and is compressed in a sort of chest or large hollow table, on which the pipes of the organ are placed, and is called the sound-board. The interior of the sound-board is but little less complicated than the vocal organ of the human body. It is from them that the compressed air has to escape by the pallets, and so to be transformed into distinct and varied sounds in the hundreds of pipes which bristle on the surface of the sound-board. This wind box, this transformer of the compressed air into sound, is, as it were, the centre of all the mechanical parts of the instrument, which are necessary for the production of sound; the place where they all meet together, and to which they all tend, and hence, perhaps, its name of sound-board. Here it is that we find out if the bellows are weak or strong, if the hand of the organist touches the keys with or without effect, if the pallets on being opened cause an harmonious sound, or merely a disagreeable cyphering, and thus the sound-board becomes the centre of all that is good or bad in the organ; it is, to continue our analogy taken from the human frame, as the heart, to which all the system of the circulation of the blood flows as to a centre; and as the throat, from whence proceeds the word, expressive of the inward soul.

But how is this mechanical contrivance, this magic air-transformer, to be itself made to act, for though we should fill all the sound-boards imaginable with wind, this alone would not be sufficient to create a sound, still less an harmonious sound. The instrument just turned out from the hands of the builder, and supplied with wind by the action of the bellows, is still only a dumb instrument. The mysterious power of giving speech to the organ is to be found in the organist, who after a preliminary operation, of which we will speak presently, places his hands upon the clavier or key-board, the true key to his mysterious power, as its Latin root clavis indicates, and it is then only that the instrument ceases to be dumb, and sings in accents of joy or sadness according to the genius of the man, of whom it may be said to be both slave and master.

Three things then concur for making the organ speak; a bellows, which may be called the starting point; the pipes, which are placed upon the sound-board, and may be called the end; and thirdly, the hands of the organist, which may be called the means, for it is to them that all the mechanism of the organ from the clavier to the sound-board is subject, and it is by their means that the passages for the air, which supplies the pipes, are opened or shut as the organist pleases.

†Note of Translator.—This refers to the more common way of making organ bellows in France, which is more old-fashioned than the English way.

Since the most interesting details of all this mechanism meet in the sound-board, as in a centre, we will briefly analyze its form and action. In doing this, we do not intend to give a formal list of its many component parts, but simply to give such a general account of them as may be sufficient for our present purpose. In building, especially, we want to see a great deal, to know but little.

The sound-board then, as we have already said, may be described as a long, square-cornered chest, six or eight inches in depth, the upper-board of which is pierced with as many holes as there are pipes to be placed in order, as an harmonious forest of trees, upon its surface. All the pipes which emit the same quality of tone are planted together in a straight line in the same row, and each row of pipes of the same quality of tone is called a stop. The hole in the foot of each pipe is in communication with the interior of the sound-board, but is separated from the wind by two obstacles, viz., a register and a pallet.

The register is a rule of wood, placed within the sound-board, exactly under the feet of the pipes, and sliding horizontally backwards and forwards, in a groove, as completely air-tight as it is smooth and even. This rule, so-called because it rules or directs the action of the wind, is itself pierced with holes exactly corresponding with those in the upper-board of the sound-board for the feet of the pipes, in such way that, as the rule is moved, the holes in the feet of the pipes and those of the rules are perpendicular or set the one to the other. When they are perpendicular to one another, the ruler, far from being an obstacle to the entrance of the wind into the pipes, is, on the contrary, its conductor, for then the foot of the pipes, by which the wind enters, is in immediate communication with the interior of the sound-board.

We will suppose, then, that the organist wishes to make that quality of sound or that stop which represents the trumpet heard throughout the extent of the key-board. Before putting his hands on the key-board, he places it on one of those knobs, which stand out from the case of the organ, which serve as places for inscribing the names of the registers, and, in this instance, he places it on that one of them which is labelled trumpet, and draws it out. No sooner has he done so than the wind before shut up within the sound-board, so far as this obstacle is concerned, is at once enabled to be in direct communication with the pipes of the quality of tone required, and the preliminary operation is thus far completed. The organist repeats this action for all the registers of which he intends to compose his orchestra. Thus, if he wishes it to be composed of a bourdon and flauto, as well as the trumpet, he draws the knobs which answers to those registers, he pushes in one of the three, and so of the rest.

But the second obstacle has still to be removed; the pallet must be made to open. The pallet may be described as a little door on a spring, occupying a lower region in the sound-board, a region which may be very properly called that of storms, inasmuch as a certain amount of force is required to overcome the resistance of the wind which rushes headlong from the action of the bellows into the space opened by the gaping of the pallet, and called a groove. The pallet is connected with the key by means of a tracker, which is sometimes of very considerable length, but however far removed the pallet may be from the key-board by the tracker, it is affected by the slightest action on the key, and that with greater rapidity according to the greater perfection of the mechanism.

There are as many pallets as grooves, as many pallets and grooves as keys, and often more pallets and grooves than keys for the bass notes, which being composed of larger pipes, require more wind, and consequently more openings by which to inhale it.

The bellows then being filled, and the registers drawn, as many notes will speak on the sound-board as there are keys put down by the fingers of the organist, for the wind must then of necessity pass from the sound-board to the pipes of which the registers and pallets are open, and is thus transformed, or becomes sonorous in accordance with a law of acoustics, which we shall have to consider later on. . . . Hence, before touching the key-board, the organist must always draw the registers, for if he did not do so, the keys would no doubt open a passage for the wind, but this wind would only strike against the roof formed by that part of the sound-board which is full of registers, without being able to transform itself into vibrating columns of air in the bodies of the pipes.

But in an instrument so vast as an organ, there is but one sound-board and but one key-board. The organ has but one soul, it is true, but this one soul animates several bodies. There are, in consequence, as many key-boards as there are principal separat-parts in an organ, but experience and the requirements of art have for the most part limited them to three or four at most.

Often an organ limited in extent from want of means or space, has but one principal part, but one body; when this is not the case, and it has more than one such part, that part which is the most largely developed and speaks the loudest, is called the great-organ. Immediately below this, as regards its power and volume of sound, is placed the choir-organ; while the swell-organ takes up an intermediate position between these two principal parts, and is destined to give effect to those phrases of music which require a more delicate and special handling, and for which the choir-organ supplies the proper accompaniment. Last of all comes the echo-organ,* emitting veiled and smothered sounds, as its name implies, though it must be confessed it does so more in name than reality.

These different parts of the organ may be all enclosed within the case, including the choir-organ, though this is very commonly placed in a case apart by itself, and brought in front of the great organ, so as, in appearance, to form an organ in miniature. It was so placed, almost without exception, in the older organs. All the keyboards, not excepting that of the choir, are placed in steps one above another, the first and lowest that of the choir, next above this that of the great organ, above this again that of the swell, and at the top of all that of the echo-organ.

We have said nothing as yet of a key-board which is placed on the floor at the feet of the organist, and forms quite a peculiar feature in his art. This is the pedal-organ, the keys of which are long and short like those of the manual, and have under their control a special sound-board of their own, which carries the pipes which emit the gravest sounds of the instrument. Without the pedal the concert of the organ is incomplete; with it the organist is possessed of a powerful foundation bass, but such that he may even raise it to the dignity of a solo instrument, by causing it to take a special and independent part of its own, a part, however, which should be always more or less grave and dignified in its character, enriched with passages of energy and rapidity according to the skill of the organist.

Seated then in front of these different key-boards, between the organ and the altar, the organist may be compared to the helmsman placed between the rudder and the masts of the ship, attentive alike to the signals of the captain and the motions of the waves. In his case it is the mighty flood of the peoples' song that the organist sustains with the majesty of his chords, while his signals come to him from the sanctuary, the ceremonies of which he follows, and by means of a mirror placed obliquely, he may even turn his back on the altar, and as in the ancient organs, see all that is done there as it were before his face, and join his intention with that of the priest who offers the divine mysteries.—London Musical World, June 30.

*Note of Translator.—This last is not found in English organs as at present constructed. In its place is found now either a solo, or what Mr. Hill has called a combination-organ in the Birmingham Town Hall Organ.

The Rain Concert.

Millions of tiny drops

Are falling all around;

They're dancing on the house-tops,

They're hiding in the ground.

They are fairy-like musicians,

With anything for keys,

Beating tune upon the windows,

Keeping time upon the trees.

A light and airy treble

They play upon the stream,

And the melody enchants us

Like the music of a dream.

A deeper bass is sounding

When they're dropping into caves;

With a tenor from the zephyrs,

And an alto from the waves.

O, 'tis a stream of music,

And Robin "don't intrude,"

If, when the rain is weary,

He drops an interlude.

It seems as if the warbling

Of the birds in all the bowers,

Had been gathered into rain drops

And was coming down in showers.

The Grand Opera at Paris.

WHO PAYS FOR IT?

The Grand Opera, since its foundation by Louis XIV., has constantly been—except during the reign of Louis Philippe and the ephemeral Republic of February—a strictly governmental establishment, founded and sustained to advance national musical genius, and, perhaps it should be added, to attract and retain strangers in Paris. Louis XVIII. is reported to have said to one of his courtiers who remonstrated with him on the enormous amount of money annually expended on the Opera, "Do you think that the receipts of the Opera are taken in at the door? No, they are received at the frontier." The royal remark was just, for it is these intellectual appeals which allure the roving traveller, who, after "doing" a score or so of cathedrals and museums, is but too glad of a decent excuse for retiring from sight-seeing and closing his "Murray" forever. But accustomed to our paltry appropriation bills, it is rather difficult to suppress a stare, when we learn that this decoy duck requires annually sums varying from a hundred to a hundred and fifty thousand dollars above the receipts at the door. Even after we are told that there is an orchestra of eighty performers, some seventy choristers, eighty dancers, seventy machinists, and we know not how many supernumeraries, all living on the opera-house treasury, it is hard to avoid resorting to the use of the pedagogue's safety-valve, and relieving our astonishment with a deep-fetched "Prodigious!" The keeping of a white elephant is a trifle by the side of the alimony of this svien.

All this, however, is the business of the tax-payers on the other side of the ocean, and is of no more concern to us than the tortures of the man who roasts hours, salamander like, in a red-hot oven, or of the beast tamer mangled by his pet lion or darling tiger. We may have our private opinion on the matter, but so long as the eleemosynary hat is not obraded into our face,—play, opera! roast, mountebank! bleed, tamer!

THE CLAUQUEUR.

Those enthusiastic Herculeses who sit under the chandelier, and occupy the best places in the pit, rough as their dresses may be, (they always are attired as for popular storms) stand very well with their bankers, and have their stockbroker and "rentes." Although Addison immortalized "a large black man whom nobody knows," but who "is commonly known by the name of the Trunkmaker in the upper gallery," "claqueurs," or applauders, are unknown in our theatres. They are conspicuous and important in all the Paris theatres, and especially at the Grand Opera. The fly of the fable was not more self-sufficient at the coach's journey-end, than are these lousy commendators when a new opera by Rossini or Meyerbeer commands the applause of the crowded house. They strut and swell, "Heavens! what a triumph 'we' had yesterday!" And they look down with inexpressible contempt on all persons who purchase, and are not "paid" their seats; the world, if they may be believed, would be waxing towards the devoutly-wished millennium, when the sword should be turned into the ploughshare, and the lion and lamb lie down together, if "those blackguards who buy tickets" were to run out to extinction with the Dodo and the Maltese poodle, or to disappear with the lost tribes and the lost Pleiad.

These "claqueurs" are terrible fellows. No needy gazetteer or Scotch freebooter ever loved heavier black-mail than these chartered applauders. No one connected with the opera is exempt from their begging-box. The most brilliant "star" of the lyrical and terpsichorean horizon never rises without assuring them of the tenacity of her memory by some valuable consideration. No trembling candidate for choreographic or musical honors adventures on the maiden "pas" or quaver without propitiating their kind favor by a roll of bank-notes, thickening according to a well-established sliding scale with the new comer's ambition. No actor whose talents linger painfully near the verge of mediocrity, ever sees the end of his engagement at hand, without appealing to their good taste by arguments as irresistible and as weighty as he can rake and scrape together from old stockings, savings-banks and usurers, to give him those zealous, hearty, repeated rounds of applause which managers mistake for fame. The authors of new works,—the Scribes, Rossinis, and Meyerbeers,—themselves paid tribute to these gods of success.

These discounters of the public applause weigh rather heavily upon the manager, it being the custom to give them a hundred pit-tickets the night of first performances, forty or fifty when the opera has sustained slight success, and twenty when the most popular opera is performed,—no small usury, for the price of pit-tickets is never less than a dollar! They are well organized into ten divisions, each commanded by a lieutenant, who sees that the signals given by the chief are faithfully obeyed. The chief, of course has the lion's share of the profits, which generally ranges from six to eight thousand dollars a year. In deed, he is the only person the manager knows, and the subalterns hold their seats entirely at his good pleasure. None but the lieutenants receive pecuniary rewards. The others are presumed to be remunerated by the pleasure they receive in hearing fine music and seeing long dances and short petticoats gratuitously.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

We shall not describe the performance of an opera or a ballet; our object is to initiate the reader into the mysteries of the Grand Opera—to carry him behind the scenes, into the green room, up to the loft, down to the cellar, and to exhibit the physiology of fabric and inhabitants.

Knock at this door, leading from the opera-house to the stage, and show this bit of paper, your "open sesame" to the stage, else you could not pass that threshold; for sillon as are the porter's manners, official claws are concealed beneath such softness, which is indeed the oft-vaunted "suaviter in modo, fortiter in re," and unless one has an especial "laissez-passer" or is enrolled on the book he holds in his hands, and which contains the list of the favored mortals entitled to ingress, egress, and regress from, in and to, the stage of the Grand Opera, he had better go his way—"there's no use knocking at that door."

Were you ever behind the curtain? Then don't go, if you have never been. Don't tearwig actors and newspaper editors for an initiation into those mysteries of canvass and paint, spangles and paste, rouge and pomatum, if you would retain one jot or iota of romantic delusion, the least vestige of youth, secure from the attrition of those terrible bronze effacers, the "bills payable," "protests," "due-bills" and "account-current" of life, which seize us at the threshold of existence. Shun the "slips" as you avert your eyes from the skeleton of the beauty, last night danced with, and loved to-day, as you would shun the shambles where bees enter on the first stages of the process which gives us noble sirloins, as you would shun the compost heap which paints on the tulip its most gorgeous colors.

THE STAGE.

The stage of the Grand Opera is not unlike some vast ship leaving port, whose "confusion worse confounded" has not been reduced to order. Ropes, blocks, hatches, broken canvass, unwieldy scenes, keel-long grooves, balance-weights, lamp-racks, curtains, clouds, gothic cathedrals, public squares, grove of trees, broad oceans, bed-chambers, light houses, palaces, cloisters, cemeteries lie or stand jumbled up together in "most admired disorder," which is heightened by screams, orders, counter-orders, "ayes-ayes," from upper, nether and surrounding voices. Here men sweep (what a cloud of dust they manage to raise!) and water the stage floor; scene inspectors cry and push to keep the stage clear, and bellow their eternal "take-care," to warn actors and the curious of impending dangers; singers and songstresses in costume, trill and quaver, to be ready for the "call;" dancing girls are bounding about in every direction, practising their steps; firemen, with sponges, or wet blankets, or buckets of water, are standing everywhere, to wage war on fire, if that terrible mar-all should show its least sinister glance; and machinists are running, like sailors, up and down the ropes. There's a fellow making thunder by beating a suspended bass-drum, and there's another burning licopode powder, to imitate lightning, while, hard by, a party is tossing rapidly large plates of sheet iron on each other, to represent the striking of the bolt, and their neighbors are whirling watchmen's rattles, with wonderful energy, to persuade the audience that a terrible "fusillade" is going on in the streets.

THE SINGING GREEN-ROOM.

It is not so much the stage as the "green-rooms" of the Grand Opera which the astute pleasure-seeker tries to attain. There are two green-rooms, the singing and the dancing, both popular, but the dancing green-room is incredibly so, "why," we shall, perhaps, enable the reader to understand. Very thin partitions divide the feminine corps of singers and dancers, but they are separated from each other by a different physiology, a different constitution, we had almost said, a different conformation. This difference is visible even in their respective green-rooms. The singing green-room, which occupies the old "salon" of the Hotel Choiseul, is decorated with the universal white and gold, the alpha and omega of French architects, and is of aristocratic spaciousness. A piano stands in the centre, surrounded on every side by benches. It is used as the audience-chamber, where actors and choristers give touches of their quality when they seek an engagement.

THE REHEARSALS FOR OPERA.

There it is the actors and choruses study the scores of new operas. At the first rehearsals the composer himself presides at the piano and points out the time of the part-pieces to the singing-masters and artists. And here the leading actors study separately with the composer the airs, duets, trios, they have to sing. When one act has been mastered, the quatuor rehearsals commence under the supervision of the leader of the orchestra, where all of the stringed instruments successively execute the score. And as soon as the whole work,—words and score,—is known by the chorus and actors, the general rehearsals of the orchestra begin. All the singers rehearse sitting. During these three or four rehearsals (they rarely exceed this number) the mistakes of the copyists are corrected, and the whole of this arduous, severe, and long labor (six months at least are required to perfect the studies of a grand opera,) is ended by new quatuor rehearsals (with a piano to accompany the recitative) with the scenery, and at last by rehearsals with full orchestra, lights, scenery, and costume. The singing green-room is a place of study. It is consequently calm and tranquil. The songstresses are obliged to pay a constant attention. They are never seen extravagantly dressed, nor full of noisy coquetry. Most of them go to the theatre in over-shoes and with umbrellas under their arms, and are proverbial for their punctuality and zeal. Some of them are married and live modestly; some of them are excellent musicians, and eke out their scanty pay by giving music-lessons; and those who "love" do love, and do not make their heart a pretext for amassing money by illicit means.

William W. Story and his Cleopatra.

The last number of the Dublin University Magazine, in an article entitled "American Imaginings," gives us so generous and glowing a tribute to the genius of our countryman, WILLIAM W. STORY, that we are tempted to copy it for the gratification of his many friends who know him, and for the benefit of the many who do not. In mentioning Hawthorne's Marble Faun, the writer in question says:

He has a chapter in his first volume entitled Cleopatra; in his preface he has righteously restored what there be styles, in simple preface prose, this "magnificent statue," to its real, living, flesh, and blood designer, William Story. The fitness of the epithet is such that we who are ready to vouch for that fitness, doubt not, for our part, that Mr. Hawthorne weighed before he penned, the very word "magnificent." We who know the statue and the designer well, know, not only that the "obiter dictum" of Mr. Hawthorne's preface may be allowed, but that Mr. Story's Cleopatra, in her actual marble, may bravely stand the test between herself and her counterpart in the romance. We cite her, not to confirm or controvert, in this place, our writer's aesthetic appreciation, but rather as an excuse for entering her modeler's studio, thence to illustrate and enlarge our remarks upon the strange promise which the training of American realism is making to the ideal, in plastic no less than in poetic and other fictive art. Rebel at home against American monotony, the American artist will not, even in Rome, wear the shackles of conventionalism. Fee there, among his earlier efforts, a wolf, which is not the savage nurse of Romulus, but the familiar terror of our nursery days, eyeing Red Ridinghood herself—hungry, scarcely glistened over with dewdrops of flattery. Then there is Hero, still in girlish form, lifting a torch, which shows an agony in the sweet eyes of the watcher, whose dainty naked feet are set upon the sand of that cruel Hellestone. Draped severely, in the close bodice and skirt of a German maiden, lifelike in the play of her delicate fingers, plucking the divining-flower of lovers, ghost-like in the pendive droop of her eyelids and the slim outline of her shadowy frame, Faust's injured Marguerite stands innocent as yet. Heavy fall the mallet strokes on chisels, searching out the tawny terrors of the Egyptian's panther-beauty from the marble block:—that is the Cleopatra, whom our author has shown to you. Now push open the little swinging door that guards the inner studio. You shall almost start and draw back your foot before the towering height and passionate energy of her who lifts one hand to heaven for help, and in the other grasps a scimitar. She is no Greek; you see it by one glance at the bold arch under which quiver nostrils breathing vengeance. Clytemnestra prayed not so when Agamemnon was to strike. She is no Roman either. Lucretia looked not up, but down along the sword, shame blending with savage indignation before she buried it hilt-deep in the breast a Tarquin's touch had soiled. The widow of Mannaseh knows nor Clytemnestra's willing nor Lucretia's forced ignominy. Hebrew Judith looks up and prays before her woman's arm deals the dread execution—how upon the tyrant, drunk with wine, and lust, and blood. Now this William Story, to whom a few short years in Italy have furnished time to master so much of that hard craft which teaches artist-fingers to give substance to the visions of an artist brain; this William Story, "whom," his countrymen is not too bold to say, "his country and the world will not long fail to appreciate"—he is not only a graceful poet and literary critic—such accomplishments are helps, not hindrances, to development of an artistic power—but he is, in all sober seriousness, a New England barrister! An only son, he inherits from his father more than a mere name illustrious in the annals of jurisprudence. If his early successful career at the bar be no fallacious token, the fascination of the artist power and life has robbed the American bench of a second Justice Story. He fills up still a portion of his laborious life with editing the judgments and decisions of his honored father's admirable legal science. His is, beyond a doubt, a mind and temper in that revolt of which the critic speaks; but mark the significant circumstance. True to an English origin, true to the United States: man's political tradition, the disloyalty of such a rebel is loyal, after all—loyal in the word's truest sense—never lawless, even in full rebellion. Is not this symptomatic? May not this be the complex characteristic of a whole order of imaginative, ideal, poetical, artistic minds, wherewith it may be designed that America shall yet enrich most bountifully the life-blood of the nations? Unless a man have a very narrow, bigoted nationalism in his soul—a prejudice, not a patriotism—must he not wish it may be so? The least attractive of American peculiarities are often justly said to be exaggerations of our own; and, beholding them, we may righteously take no little of their shame to our own selves. Shall we not, then, righteously count it as an honor and a joy to us if, out of what are some of our own intellectual and mental deficiencies, we shall see spring up, in spite of, nay, almost in virtue of, repression and discouragement, bolder, grander, fuller, more varied, developments of æsthetic taste and power?

Reception to William Vincent Wallace.

A very agreeable ovation was tendered to this estimable gentleman and composer, at the music rooms of Wm. Hall & Son, Broadway, on the evening of July 11th. A pleasant gathering of artists, critics, and connoisseurs were present to welcome Mr. Wallace. Selections of choruses from "Lurline" were sung by members of Mendelssohn Union and others with excellent effect. Mrs. Cooper, Miss Hawley, Messrs. Geary and Werneke sang the incidental solos connected therewith in a most creditable manner. Mrs. Mozart gave the Troubadour song, which was encored. Mrs. Brinkerhoff sang the "Spell" from "Lurline," and "Scenes that are Brightest," from "Maritana." Mad. Bouchelle sang Wallace's "Cradle Song." Mr. Millard was warmly applauded in a tenor song, likewise Mr. Simpson. Mr. Massett sang one of his own compositions, "You'll remember Me." The accompanist, Messrs. Bergé and Schmidt, lent their effective aid. There was but one feeling in regard to the music of "Lurline"—it was pronounced to be Mr. Wallace's most popular opera. A handsome collation was provided to which the guests did ample justice. Capt. Vine Hall, of the Great Eastern, who had been present, was called for, but had left the company a short time previous. Mr. James Hall responded for him, and made some interesting remarks in regard to Mr. Wallace's career in this country since his first visit, which was some twenty years ago, when music was less appreciated than at present. Want of space prevents our giving Mr. Hall's sentiments at length, but we cannot forbear placing before our readers this pretty toast to "Lurline"—

There is one who appears to have been forgotten on this occasion; yet her praises are on every tongue. It is a lady, whose sweet voice has, during the last few months, charmed many thousands, from the Prince to the peasant, and whose song is echoed from the throats of many a fair warbler over the whole world of music.

Meyerbeer kept his "Prophet" caged for years, yet Wallace, whose gallantry has been the theme of many a song, with cruelty more refined, kept "Lurline," a water nymph of surpassing beauty, whose soul was song, chained in darkness for ten long years. Even now his unrelenting hand holds in bondage the fair maid of Zurich and the chaste and lovely—the person's daughter falsely accused as the Amberwitch.

Let us hope that justice may be speedily done this fair daughter of his genius—Lurline.

Mr. Wallace, with considerable emotion, thanked those present and absent for the many kind expressions of regard he had ever received in this country; and which he expected to leave again in a few days, to be absent for some time; his passage being already taken in the Persia for Europe—his wife and family remaining with us. Mr. Wallace has our best wishes for his health and success.—N. Y. Musical World.

Musical Correspondence.

SAN FRANCISCO, JUNE 20, 1860.

J. S. DWIGHT, Esq. — To you in Boston, that "best of all places to emigrate from," as Daniel Webster said of New Hampshire, and yet the place of all others dear to the exiled Bostonian's heart, to you, I say, in the name of the former Athenians now in our far western city, I declare that "we still live." That fact may not possess any great amount of value to you, but to us, it is one of great interest. Now we are always delighted to hear any news from Boston and know that some Bostonians are glad to hear from us, which leads us to like to inflict long letters on them at times. I some time since wrote you about some sport which we had occasionally, but wrote but little about music, in a serious strain. That you may know upon what and whom we have to rely, permit me to give you a list of some of our prominent musicians. And first comes to my mind, our old friend Trenckle, who is esteemed by all, and holds already a very high rank as a musician. It would be hard to say that he is the best musician amongst us, but none stands higher. His very genial gentlemanly manner has made him many warm friends. It is needless to speak to Bostonians of his excellencies, for who know him better?

Before the arrival of Trenckle, Herold was regarded as the best musician here. Most certainly he is a thorough master of his art, and as a conductor ranks at the head. He is at present conducting a German society called the "Cecilia Club," which is now rehearsing "Elijah." His excellencies are many.

Mr. Geo. F. Pettinos is considered to possess the finest pianoforte touch of any of our musicians. He is also a thorough musician and having been here for a number of years, has hosts of friends, by whom he is highly esteemed. He is originally from Philadelphia.

Mr. Charles Stadtfeldt is quite a young man, but has shown much talent. He has charge of a flourishing German Glee Club called the "Eintracht," which is formed after the style of the "Orpheus," and his drilling of them shows the musician. I have heard them sing many things in a manner that the "Orpheus" could not excel, which I esteem high praise. Among their number were many fine voices among which may be particularly mentioned that of Jacob Stadtfeldt, a brother to the above, who possesses one of the richest and most powerful baritone voices, to which it was ever my lot to listen, either on or off the stage, having a compass of nearly three octaves, and pure and sweet throughout the entire range. Were he to pay the attention to its cultivation that many would do, he might make a stir in the world.

Of Mr. Gustave A. Scott, I have spoken in a previous letter. As an accompanist he is very superior, and as a florid executant, he cannot be surpassed.

Young Rasché, who plays the organ at Trinity Church, where Mad. Biscaccianti sings, is considered to possess talent of a high order. This he certainly has, if we may judge from a "Te Deum" of his composition, which was sung at Trinity Church on Easter Sunday. Being very modest, he does not thrust himself forward, but true merit will make itself known.

Mr. Geo. F. Evans is the organist at Dr. Scott's, where is the finest organ in the city. He is a very talented fellow, and has most perfect control of his instrument. His style does not suit all, as he loves to make the organ show all of which it is capable, but of his talent there can be no question. As a pianist he is said to be equally fine, though of that I can say nothing, never having heard him in that capacity.

The lack of a good vocal teacher is much regretted here. Would a really excellent teacher come out, there is but little doubt that he or she would find abundance of employment. I wish we might notice the arrival of a good exponent of Bassini's system, which in my mind, is the finest ever yet brought before the public. These are but few, however, besides Bassini himself, that appreciate the system sufficiently to teach it properly. One young lady there is, in Boston, who, at the time I left, was succeeding finely with it. If she proves as fine a teacher as her friends believed her to be, California would offer a fine field for her to work in.

The Lucy Escott troupe are now here, comprising that enterprising lady herself, Misses Rosalie and Georgia Hodson, Messrs. Squires, De Haga, Leach, &c. They have rendered "Lucia," "Lucrezia Borgia," "Ernani," and "Traviata" in Italian; "Maritana," "Marriage of Figaro," "Enchantress," and "Rose of Castille" in English. They have not yet given us anything in German, though from the versatility already displayed we might almost expect it. Mrs. Escott and Squires have taken the city by storm by their excellent singing, and the lady has shown powers as an actress which have astonished many who remembered her at home. De Haga has disappointed the majority. He sings terribly out of tune and his voice is much choked up. Leach has done finely, being very reliable and though most of the daily papers seem inclined to deprive him of his laurels, the audiences have appreciated him. He is an artist, and is always up to the mark.

We have also had Chinese opera, which certainly succeeded in creating a sensation. The newsick proved of such a satisfying kind, that one hearing was generally sufficient. A little went a great ways.

But enough for the present. We hope that it will not be many years before we may be able to produce as much music of the right kind, here, as in Boston. May that day soon come.

Since writing the above I have been informed that Mad. Biscaccianti joins the Opera troupe to-day. This will be an acquisition indeed. PHÆLIX.

BOSTON, JULY 28, 1860.

The Sixty-seventh Annual Festival of the Boston Public Schools.

We wish that we could daguerreotype for our readers, the beautiful scene presented in the Music Hall, on Tuesday last, at the Festival of our Boston Public Schools. Three years ago the City Government abandoned the old fashioned plan of dining the medal scholars in Faneuil Hall, and wisely substituted the musical ceremonies that have constituted the Festival of the children since that time.

The arrangements and decorations of the hall this year were generally the same as they were described by us in our account of the last year's festival. An immense stage had been raised from the permanent platform of the Music Hall, rising in a hexagonal form to the top of the doors of the upper balcony, and opening back to the organ screen where the statue of BEETHOVEN appeared to view, crowned and wreathed with bright flowers, and seeming to smile benignantly upon the scene. This stage was filled from top to bottom, from front to rear, by the children of the schools who were to take part in the singing, a perfect array of little singers, twelve hundred strong, bright, happy, smiling and well dressed, the girls all in white, and the darker dresses of the boys relieved and set off by the blue ribbons from which the medals were suspended. The orchestra occupied the centre of the stage between the conductor, CARL ZERRAHN and the organ. The balconies too were filled by the children and their friends, and every nook and corner of the hall and corridors was packed by those who had been fortunate enough to obtain tickets of admission. As soon as the vast audience was quietly seated, which occupied some time, in consequence of the difficulties experienced in effecting an entrance into the Hall, the exercises began.

ORDER OF EXERCISES.

1. Voluntary on the Organ, by J. O. D. Parker.
2. Prayer.
3. The Lord's Prayer: A Gregorian Chant, sung in unison by twelve hundred children of the Public Schools.
4. Addresses.
5. Choral. Winchester. To be sung by the children, with organ accompaniment.
6. Addresses.
7. Selected Piece. To be sung by the Girls' High and Normal School.
8. Choral. "Sleepers, Wake! A Voice is calling."—Mendelssohn. To be sung by the children, with organ and orchestral accompaniment.

9. Gloria, from the Twelfth Mass.—Mozart. With full orchestral accompaniment.

10. Address and Presentation of Bouquets to the Medal Scholars by the Mayor. During the presentation, music will be performed by the Germania Band.

11. The Old Hundred Psalm.

12. Benediction.

The speakers were introduced to the assembly by the Rev. J. C. Southbridge, Chairman of the Committee of Arrangements in a short speech from which we present the following appropriate extracts:

But another art comes upon the stage to-day to contest the palm with eloquence—Music; the music of the human voice in the grand old chorals to which you will soon listen, the music of the organ, whose praises the poet Dryden has so eloquently sung, the music of this, perhaps as perfect orchestral accompaniment, as has ever appeared in public in this city, music is to make her appeal to you this afternoon. She comes with gentle winning grace to you at this hour, and while she would not depreciate her sister art, she modestly asks if she has not a place in your hearts. She tells you that

"From harmony, from heavenly harmony
This universal frame began.
From harmony to harmony
Through all the compass of the notes it ran,
The diapason closing full in man."

I know not but that she has too prejudiced an audience to which she makes her appeal. Who are these whose voices will shortly fill this vast space with melody. Though there will be a blending of these harmonious notes so perfect that it will seem as if, from this amphitheatre, there came but one gush of rich concordant sounds, yet the nice, the keenly delicate ear of father or mother will detect the well-known voice of son or daughter. As the thought, like a magnetic power goes all around this great throng, "those are the familiar tones of my child, heard at early morn, at noonday and at the twilight hour, heard in the merry song, heard amid the praises of the sanctuary of the Lord, heard when my own spirit is joyful, heard when it is sad," say, my [friends, will not music gain the victory over eloquence, and though oratory may make the birthday of our nation a glad municipal occasion, music, with her face all wreathed with beauteous smiles, will claim this festival as the glad municipal occasion, best honored, most beloved by the city where she has found so welcome a home,

And then how delightful all the associations connected with this Festival. Before you, in bronze, stands the statue of him who, by my honored friend and associate, Dr. Upham, was at our last Festival so well styled "the Great Master of harmony, presiding genius and High Priest of this Temple, standing never more appropriately than now, crowned and garlanded in the midst of this garden of fresh young life—the illustrious Ludwig Von Beethoven. We recall his boyish days, when impetuous and self-willed he would not submit to the demands of a tyrannical father. We think of him as we do of his great countryman Luther, escaping from the great discomforts of his home, and finding the wants of his nature met in the congenial family of the Von Brennings. We trace the early development of his musical genius to the time of his appointment at the age of 15 as organist in the chapel of the Elector of Cologne. We go with him to Vienna. We watch him as with the eccentricities of genius, he lives on year after year, gaining fame but not money, adoring his art, with the warm devotion of an enthusiast. We think of his want of sympathy with his more thrifty and worldly wise brothers. We think of his laconic sayings, and we stop to wonder whether it be true what he says "most people are moved to tears on hearing music, but these have not musicians' souls; true musicians are too fiery to weep." We feel for him as we feel for Milton when he could see no more the sweet light of heaven, that in the loss of the sense of hearing he had met with one of the severest trials that could befall a lover of music. But as in the case of the great poet, our sympathy becomes chastened, when we learn from his own pen that, though the visual organ had lost its power, there passed before the eye of his mind scenes of indescribable glory and beauty, so we rejoice that to the ear of the soul of Beethoven there were ever coming strains of marvellous melody; making the desolate chambers of his heart to resound with music such as might have been sung by angelic choirs. We can understand what must have been frightful to musical ears, though he was unaffected by it, how discordant were the notes which would come crashing from the piano, as all unconsciously to himself as rudely laid his left hand flat upon the keys, while with his right hand he was drawing forth the most exquisite music from the instrument,—and ca-pecially how shocking it must be to hear him improvising on stringed instruments, which, owing to his deafness he could not tune. Though the knit brow and the shrugging shoulder must have told him how painful was the performance to his hearers, yet to his mind all was pure and harmonious. We follow the artist through his years of suffering and comparative poverty, down to that 26th of March, 1827, when, as it was most fitting for a man who had encountered so many of the tempests of life, he passed away during a severe hail storm, in the fifty-seventh year of his age.

It may be well, moreover, to remind this audience that the music about to be sung by these twelve hundred chorister pupils, was the production of some of the greatest masters of the art of music. Luther, with his rough, honest Saxon face, will stand out before us, as this vast assembly joins in singing Old Hundred. When, too, the sharp, ringing forte, fortissimo notes of that fine old choral, "Sleepers, Wake! a Voice is calling," fall on our ear, we will remember Bartholdy Felix Mendelssohn, the wonderful composer and pianist, and when we listen to the sublime tones of the "Gloria," we will think of him, who ranks among the monarchs in the realms of music, Johann Chrysostomus Wolfgang Gottlieb Mozart.

The Right Reverend Thomas M. Clark, Bishop of R. I., then made a brief speech, and was followed by President Felton of Harvard University, from whose remarks we also quote.

I suppose I owe the invitation to be present on this beautiful and interesting occasion to my connection with the neighboring University. I thank you for recognizing that relation, and in giving me an opportunity to witness so delightful a spectacle. This hall is consecrated to music. There stands the statue of one of the greatest men who ever cultivated that noble art, the work of an illustrious American sculptor now no more. It is fitting that a festival of the schools should be held in such a place—in this beautiful hall consecrated to Harmony.

There is another reason which makes this a most appropriate place. Among the ancient Greeks—pardon me for recalling my old friends—music was not only a branch of general education, as it is with you, and in the judgment of the wisest men a most important branch on account of its mighty influence on the passions and the moral emotions, but it had a larger significance still, especially as used by Plato. It included in its meaning all that pertained to the culture of the muses; all that related to refinement, elegant letters, the fine arts. In Plato's conception, the musical man was the man whose moral and intellectual nature was developed in a well proportioned manner and in harmony with the world around him.

But after all, the warfare against Ignorance and Vice is as noble as any in which men can engage. In this contest, the city of Boston has always borne a foremost part. She has lavished her treasures won from the fields of commerce, in raising barriers against the invasion of those formidable enemies. The numerous schools which she has established, of every grade, from the Alphabet up to the Normal, the English High School and the Latin School, are her best securities. Her army of teachers are her best defenders.

What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlements or labored mound,
Thick wall or moated gate?
Not cities fair, with spires and turrets crowned;
No: men, high-minded men.

The object of our schools is to raise up a breed of men, high-minded men, such as old Alcæus, more than six centuries before Christ, described. Look to it, my young friends, that you do not disappoint the expectations we have a right to form after such labors and sacrifices as the city has borne in your behalf. Remember another saying of still more ancient wisdom, that the gods have placed labor before excellence, and that if you would attain the latter, in any position of life, you must comply with the inexorable condition laid down by the heavenly powers. If you would win, and keep what you have won, you must work for it. By work you make the best part of life, the life of the intellect, more intense, while you double your capacities without exhausting your energies.

Men talk of the shortness of life; and it is a most solemn and impressive thought that, in a few years more, we shall all be borne to the silent land. I know nothing so striking as the contrast between Pere la Chaise and the city of Paris, scarcely separated by the width of a street—the city of the dead by the city of the living; or Mount Auburn, with its beautiful woods, its hills, and vales, and lakes, and the silent multitudes that sleep in its sepulchres, contrasted with the busy, throbbing life of this city.

We are constantly passing from the city of the living to the city of the dead; but, while we abide here, it becomes us to waste no time in sloth or enervating indulgence.

Enchained by her heaven-bright hand,
On a rough steep does Virtue stand,
And he who hopes to win the goal,
To manhood's height who would aspire—
Must spurn each sensual, low desire.
Must never falter, never tire.
But on, with sweat-drops of the soul.

We prolong our life by filling our minds with new thoughts and precious truths. We prolong our life and enlarge our best enjoyments, by studying those literary works in which the most illustrious men of past ages will speak to us. We add to our acquaintance Homer and Æschylus, Plato and Aristotle, Cicero and Virgil and Horace, Dante and Tasso, Shakespeare and Milton. We may know them as intimately as if we had met them living in form in Ionia or Athens—in Rome, Florence or London. We lengthen out our days as it were, so as to include the ages in which they lived. My young friends, I hope you will all strive to be musical, not only in the sense of Beethoven, who looks down with such sweet gravity on this assembly—and well he may—but in the broader sense of Plato, by faithfully cultivating all your moral and intellectual power.

The speeches were judiciously brief and were attentively listened to.

The music was admirably given by the children. The Gregorian Chant was sung with the utmost perfection of time and perfect distinctness of enunciation. The second piece suffered at first from some misunderstanding, but after a false start, was given with a fine effect. Perhaps the most successful piece was the Chorale Sleepers, Wake! in which the vigorous boy voices told with wonderful effect and finely contrasted with the girls' more delicate tones. The closing note was finely sustained and made a very striking close. The chorus for female voices was very successful, and the Gloria so well sung that the audience would not be denied the repetition of it. Then came the distribution of the bouquets to the happy recipients, whose smiling faces as they crossed the stage, one by one, in front of the Mayor, who addressed them briefly and felicitously and took each by the hand, made not the least pleasing part of the Festival.

All then united in singing the Old Hundredth Psalm, after which the audience dispersed.

A serious drawback to the pleasure of this Festival was the bungling and shiftless arrangement, or rather want of any proper arrangements for the admission of the audience, and which the offered apology by no means explained. The audience was largely made up of ladies and children; the differently colored tickets entitled the holders to go to different parts of the Hall, and yet no indication was given at what door a certain ticket should be presented, and the crowd was ordered first in one direction and then in another, without any clear direction or assistance from any one in authority. Parties were thus separated from each other and from their escort, and much time that should have been given to enjoyment in the Hall, was, after a hot and alarming struggle, devoted to looking for lost friends and lost property. A few policemen or better, marshals, could have easily remedied or prevented this confusion. A longer time should be allowed for filling so large a Hall, and the plainest directions should be given as to the manner of entering it, with every courtesy and aid after entrance is effected. We hope to see these things better managed at a repetition of this Festival.

Aside from this, the occasion was entirely successful and delightful, and will be long remembered by those who took part in it, either as actors or spectators.

Musical Chit-Chat.

FREDERICK CITY, MD., July 23. — Mention was made in your paper several times of the performances of the blind negro boy "Tom," but I scarcely could give credence to them, until I was fully convinced by actual experience. "Tom" gave two concerts here last week, and an invitation being extended by his master to come upon the stage and play a duet with "Tom," in which he first would play the accompaniment and afterwards the melody, I accepted the invitation, and in both concerts was astonished to see with what correctness "Tom" would anticipate. He played both times the accompaniment perfectly when I repeated a part, and reproduced the melody to a wonderful degree of perfection.

He plays extracts from operas, which each would fill about eleven or twelve printed pages, and these with great expression. In the right hand he lacks power, but his scales are marvelously liquid and smooth, besides he has great execution in octaves, and an almost unerring certainty in skips, which extend beyond an octave.

His own compositions are all tending to — what we southerners call — plantation melodies, but even in these, as in his improvisations, there is a rich originality.

"Tom" does not know the name of a note, nor of a key on the piano, and his performance would do credit to a boy with good eyes with the advantage of a teacher from almost infancy, but how much more is due to a blind boy, reared in ignorance on a cotton plantation.

Though I would not have you believe that he is a Mozart, nor even an approach to him, yet could you hear him, you would be astonished, as I have been; although I doubt if you will have an opportunity in Boston, for "Tom" is a slave. I.

ANECDOTE OF ROSSINI.—A French paper states that a party of friends were recently assembled in the drawing room of Rossini, and were talking of the approaching production of "Semiramide" at the French Opera. Danton, junior, the witty caricaturist, began to rally the maestro. "Brave old Homer only nods now and then," said he, "but you, the Homer of music, sleep continually. You have no right to do so; for you are robbing the world of all the music you still have in your head and heart." "It is a good joke for you to complain, my dear Danton," replied Rossini, "everybody has a right to reproach me with my beloved idleness, you alone excepted. "Why so?" "Because you are as indolent as myself. I no longer write operas, it is true; but you make no caricatures either." "I could if I pleased." "I defy you." "If you defy me, I will make yours." "Do; and if you succeed, I will write an opera in return." "I take you at your word," said Danton, "so get ready to write your score. To-morrow you shall have your caricature." The next day the work was really finished, and Rossini showed it laughingly to his friends. The maestro is represented in the middle of a dish of macaroni which overflows on all sides. He is sleeping with folded arms, and pressing to his breast a lyro without strings. His slumbers are evidently occupied by harmonious dreams, and it is plain that he is singing sweet melodies to himself. A smile, at once benevolent and satirical, is playing about his lips. It is a caricature in which the characteristic features are so cleverly portrayed, that it is more like him than the best of portraits could be. It remains to be seen whether Danton will get Rossini's opera.

Musical Intelligence.

The New York Musical World, formerly edited by R. S. Willis, Esq., and the New York Musical Review, have been united and will hereafter be published by Mason Brothers as the New York Musical Review and Musical World. We wish our contemporaries all success in the new enterprise.

MONTREAL.—The prospectus put forth by the management to produce a series of Italian Operas, was carried out last night by the appearance at the Theatre Royal, of a Company very far exceeding in lyrical talent any combination we have ever had in Montreal. The house, we were pleased to see, was crowded in all parts. The Dress Circle was filled with all the refined and fashionables of our city. The whole Opera (Ernani) was given with great spirit and excellent taste; were we to select that which pleased us most, it would be the chorus of Elvira and Ernani in the second Act. The score offers fine opportunities for a display of a clear, full-toned soprano, like Signora Ghioni's. At other times, where vigor and intensity were exhibited, she moved her hearers like a great orator. Signor Sbriglia, the tenor, has a fine fresh and sympathetic voice, and makes his mark with an appreciative audience. Hearty applause greeted the baritone, Signor Ardaouni, whose full rich voice brought down the applause of the house repeatedly. Signor Mirandola, the bass, did full justice to his role, his deep sonorous voice aiding wonderfully in carrying out the strength of the concerted music. His solo, in the beginning of the second act, was finely given. The choruses were the best we have ever heard, and admirable taste and precision was displayed by Signor Francia, the conductor of the troupe, aided by our own admirable chef d'orchestre, M. Vaillant, and a fine orchestra.—Herald, July 17.

The Florence correspondent of the New York Times writes as follows respecting a musical entertainment given in that city for the benefit of Sicily:

The most respectable native talent was gratuitously contributed to render the enterprise successful as an affair of art, and the large attendance and increased prices must have added a handsome sum to the fund. Our country, also, as usual, was prompt to respond to the call for coöperation. Miss Abby Fay, of Boston, one of the gifted young American ladies pursuing musical studies here, sang with applause a cavatina from Rossini's opera of "Semiramide." The evidence of talent already given by this singer inspires confidence that still larger success is in reserve for her in her most difficult art.

A decision of some importance, musically speaking, has just been made in Russia, the Emperor having ordered that the diapason of the French commission shall be adopted in the orchestras of the Imperial theatres from the first of September next. A sum of 45,000 francs was awarded as an indemnity to the artists for changing the instruments according to this decision.

It is announced by the Havana papers that the Tacon theatre will be under new management next season. Among the engagements are those of Mr. Gottschalk as chef d'orchestre, and Ferri the baritone.

The Cortesi company have engaged three of the Cuban theatres; while the Havana Tacon is said to be secured by an association of artists, whose names are not given.

STELLA, of the Worcester Palladium, says in her last letter:

Three resident musicians have formed in this city a "Beethoven Trio Club," and are studying the trios of Beethoven and other composers, with profit to themselves, and we hope, sometime it may prove, to the public as well. We recall with pleasure an attendance upon one of their rehearsals one of these bright summer mornings—just the time to listen, to a work so full of fresh, enlivening beauty as Mozart's Trio in G, which we heard with several of Beethoven's—including a very beautiful one in E flat. In the range of trio-music the greatest composers gave utterance to some of their finest thoughts, and in their reading we trust our friends of the Club will find such treasures that they may be induced to lay them before the many friends of classical music in Worcester.

The fine young American cantatrice, Miss Hinckley, of Albany, New York, is said to have already made for herself quite a European reputation. She has sung with very great success in Amsterdam and many other cities. She is now at Bruxelles with the Merelli company, delighting the natives with her fresh American voice. Thence she goes to Durdon, Cologne, and Frankfurt. She has had an offer to sing at Berlin for the autumn and carnival. In fact she is engaged for over a year. A writer from over sea says: "I am delighted at her success for more than one reason; now she has to support partly, if not entirely, herself, mother and little brother. Her father died lately, leaving, I believe, very little property. It is truly a noble task for one so young as herself. Is it not?"

PHILADELPHIA.—It is settled at last—definitively—the Pavilion is erected. We are to have music at Fairmount Park, notwithstanding the objections repeatedly and persistently urged by Mr. Neal, of our city council. There are others of our city grandfathers, however, for whom the Heavenly Maid has not entirely lost her charms: her claims were allowed, the objections over-ruled, and—

Hark! through the shady avenues, and from over the shining Schuylkill bursts the glad Marche Triumphale.—Surely the music never sounded sweeter; and as the echoes of the melodies sing their way up through the silver maples and the great oak leaves, there seems to be a general rejoicing. The grave old statues that have gazed adown the green vistas these many years, look now more cheerful; the little marble boy (don't print it Faun, you thoughtless, novel-reading printer,) sitting under the sparkling spray of the fountain, peeps laughingly upwards as the drops dance around the green fringe beside him; and the giant pumps and piston-rods of the "wheel house," as they force the water to heights above, seem to have lost the old thundering roar, and the sound floats off with the mist and the music up the green hillside and away.

We can sit here under the shadows of the blossoming locust trees in time to come, and with our book beside us, read a passage now and then, and, listening to the music in the interval, while away the hours of summer in manner most delightful. O, the many pleasant hours at Fairmount Park, for those who know nothing of seaside or country sports. O, way-side joys and pedestrian rambles for the long hot months to come! Even the plodding laborer, enjoying the melodies, can rest beside the fountains, and feel

"On his heart the freshness of the scene
Sprinkle its coldness, and from the dry dust
Of weary life a moment lave it clean
With Nature's baptism."

Yes, this is our Villa Doria, our Villa Reale, our Bois de Boulogne, our Fontainebleau—our Corso in the future, where we shall hold the Carnival, and throw bouquets and confetti to the gayest of the throng flashing here and there in the scarlet domino.

"Wer liebt nicht Wein, Weib, und Gesang,
Er bleibt ein Narr sein Lebens lang."

Naughty Luther! Yet so sings the Manmanson.

Basle—is it? "Jephtha" in the minster? No. We are doing the German and not the Swiss festivals. And now that at Zwickau they will soon awaken a pleasant memory—a commemoration of Schumann; and from the garden of the Tuilleries the summer melodies arise; here, along the banks of the Wisahickon, this leafy month of June, you can listen to some grand old German music. All of the German "societies" are enjoying themselves "through the woods"—in their own peculiar way—as Germans only can.

Our city amusements are—what? Opera? No. Cortesi did not come, warble she could not—would not.

The Foyer is silent. No more

"Sly flirtations
'Neath the light of the chandelier."

The sweet charmers are away or on the wing. No more Germania rehearsals. Carl Sents has experienced the feeling of heimlich, and is bound for the fatherland. Several members of what is known as "our Germania" are discoursing sweet music at Ephrata Springs, up among the mountains of Pennsylvania, whose grand outline looks even bluer and more beautiful in the distance.—Corr. of N. Y. Musical World.

This is a class of music which is invaluable to the teacher, as it is not only very easy but at the same time well written, which, as musicians well know, is a weighty consideration. Since Osborn's little pieces which have been used too long and too often to be very palatable now, nothing so practicable has been written, except perhaps a series of easy arrangements in Rondo form by Rimbaud.

BERTINI'S SELF-TEACHING CATECHISM of Music, for the Pianoforte, together with Ample Explanations of the Science as applicable to every Musical Instrument. 25

This is a new and popular hand-book by the author of the celebrated Method of Piano Instruction. It is comprehensive in its style, attractive, and adapted to the capacity of the great mass of learners. An examination of its pages will convince any one of its remarkable excellence, and its use will soon prove it to be indispensable both to teachers and scholars.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

A Sermon to Organ Grinders.

Come, ye grinders! rim and weary,
Cease awhile your windy groans!
Cease your wallings sharp and dreary,
Listen to my dulcet tones!

Duo from La Favorita,
Waltz profane call'd Prima Donna,
Pray suspend, while I repeat a Few remarks in Virtue's honor.

Wearers of the velvet breeches!
St. Cecilia's humblest flunkys!
Don't you know the Scripture teaches
That you should not wallop monkeys?
Those who bring the pennies votive—
Those who jump and frisk so sadly—
Friends! pray what can be your motive
When you treat the wretches badly?

Exiled monkey! ah! once floated
All his days serene and silky;
Once to forest love devoted,
He asked why cocoa-nuts are milky?
Then his heavier labors ending,
Hopeless that great truth to know,
By his tail his form suspending,
Swung he swiftly to and fro.

Ended soon that season shiny—
That investigation juicy;
He must cross the billowy briny;
He must dance the Long Mile Lucy;
In his eyes the tears must glisten—
Milk of life grown sour and curdy;
And O, harder fate! must listen
To the strains composed by Verdi.

Now my Topic Two producing;
Very much I think you'd show
Christian virtue by vagabonding.
When you're asked, my friends, to go,
Though with rapture Biddy swelling
Drinks in Operatic joys,
Those who own the cook and dwelling,
May grow frantic at your noise.

Move like gentle grinders presto!
Cut your stick rapidamente!
Number Sixteen leave to rest! O
Leave to rest, too, Number Twenty!
Hearts will bless the good musician—
Gratitude your art inspire,
When they mark your transposition
Up the street, two octaves higher.

Tuscans! If so dear your art is,
You must either grind or die,
Seek some lonesome vale, my hearties!
There your cranks incessant ply!
Shun the city's strong temptations!
To some desert make your way!
'Midst congenial desolations,
Grind the death of Old Dog Tray.

One more word and I have done now;
You may then resume your tunes:
Really, breth'ren, there's no fun now
In the way you freeze to spoons.
O take heed if you love ranging;
Lest you meet a lowlier lot,
Sing-song into Sing-Sing changing,
And your organ gone to pot!

—Vanity Fair.

A Letter to the D—.

MY DEAR D.—In the halcyon days of simple childhood, when the youthful bosom beat high in sympathy with all that is great and good, it was one of my most signal enjoyments to gaze on, and follow, from street to street, the glorious cosmopolitan, perambulating drama of "Punch." Many and multiform were the endeavors of the eternal enemy of souls, to put an extinguisher on the innocently erring hero of the piece; Punch was so very little; the D— was so big, so black.—what wonder, then that the heart strings of infancy and nursery-maidenhood should throb in silent rapture, when Punch, after receiving some tremendous thwack, intended for a "death-blow," meekly raising his red-night-capped head, like a rain-laden-lily after the storm, cried out, in a mild and melodious counter-tenor, "Here we are again?"

Yes, my dear D—, "here we are again;" to me the off-quoted language of the above-mentioned ancient mystery, "why wouldn't you have let us alone?"

By the ninth symphony I swear, your artillery is too heavy to bring out against such an uncommonly light-brigade as mine. Facts against fiction? (and even facts, you know, are sometimes factitious.) I have published certain volumes of "Musical Legends, Fantasias, and Sketches," written by me in moments of inspiration, when, seeing on what a very inharmonious axis the musical world revolves, I resolved to moisten it with a little oil, expressed from the flowers of my fancy. Lest hungry scholars should come to me for dates, I did not christen the book, "Musico-historical anecdotes and facts," as I might have done. The word Mährchen, as a half-Germanized D—, like yourself knew long ago, leaves a very broad margin to the imagination. I hope to be read by three classes of readers; non-musicians, half-musicians, and musicians par excellence. As to the first, what do they care about musical dates? I wished to excite their interest in music and musicians in the most agreeable way; if they felt any curiosity about my heroes and heroines,—good! they would probably get biographies or cyclopedias, to verify or falsify my statements, and thus be led on to better beings. For the second class,—musicasters,—stelline della musica,—I will privately confess to several mischievously premeditated arabesques, "set down in malice," expressly in behalf of dilettanti, who have not yet discovered their own ignorance. And the musicians born and made, fishes, whose element is music, historical, practical, and theoretical, such people know by heart, just as well as you or I, facts like this for instance; that Piccini did not arrive in Paris until some months after the time I have made him shake hands with Gluck behind the scenes of the royal opera; but would they blame me for this effective and highly original anachronism, not to speak of others, more daring and dazzling? Far from it, no more than they would think of criticizing my great imitator, Shakespeare, for putting good British oaths into the mouths of his Roman and Grecian heroes, occasionally. People who have musical history at their fingers' ends, understand and appreciate intentional anachronisms.

Schroeder was undoubtedly not Beethoven's first "Leonora." That is a very well known fact: but, in my opinion, she ought to have been; and was certainly born twenty years too late. She agreed with me, I do not doubt, when she accepted the dedication to my second volume. All the world knows that Beethoven was a shortish, and by no means handsome fellow; nature, while framing two moulds, one of Belviderean beauty, and another of homelier cast, imprudently turned her head aside; at that moment, the soul of Beethoven, incautious as genius usually is, stumbled into the wrong case, while some fool, lucky enough to be close by at the time, got the one intended for B. Now, I, correcting the occasionally unjust dispensations of a mysterious Providence, gave to the "wonderful dreamer" a fine personnel, a giant form; this description my translator, otherwise tolerably correct, suppressed in toto, I regret to say.

You may one day commit the mistake of writing a book yourself, though, if the character Heine has given you be just, you are too much a man of the world to ink your fingers over "such stuff." Schindler, Ries, von Lenz, Oulibicheff, Marx, Fétis, Moscheles, Griepenkerl, Bettina, &c., ad infinitum, were pretty good in their way; possibly you think—there might be better. Perhaps so; perhaps not; but if you will make the blunder of a book, stick to facts. Don't let your imagination get the better of you, and pour itself out over the page in a gushing glow of molten gold and silver, (like mine); give us facts by wholesale; fire off your "grape shot" in its right place; tell us how much sugar the "venerated apparition" dissolved in his coffee on Sunday mornings; whether he liked Bretzel; what coat he wore when he first met Giulietta G.; whether he used Kathairon or Tricopherous to soften that lion's mane of his, or gave it up as incorrigible; and woe to you, if you diverge the hundredth part of a hair's breadth, from historical truth!

Most potent, grave, and reverend D—! remove your dear old American spectacles, when you review a German lady's "weak sentimentality." What she regards as childlike, a Yankee gentleman will probably translate—childish;—especially if he be addicted to "facts." There is a natural something connected with the expression of feeling and sentiment, that I am convinced only a native can understand. For example, I tried to appreciate some of what you evidently intended to be "points" in your Washington sketch (which I read with gratified attention, remembering the old adage "Parodies prove popularities"); would you believe it, they seemed to me far-fetched and flat, while they were no doubt overflowing with "American fun"?

Now, lastly, my dear D—. I have been faithful to the spirit, if not to the word of truth. Had I clothed in "facts," praises of "wiggle" voices without any medium register, over-reaching after effect, Welt-schmerz, future-music dreamery, be-pedalled pianoforte thumpery, "genial" nonsense talkery, ultra-classic pedantry, Verdi-opera screamery, or any of the thousand and one popular fallacies of the modern musical world, your heavy artillery might have been reasonably brought into requisition; but as I have done none of these things, positively, my dear D—. I scarcely think it was worth your while to expend powder and shot on a "tom-tit" like, Your very, obedient and obliged servant,

ELISE POLKO.

Madame Clara Novello.

We all remember the political disturbances that convulsed Europe in 1848; we have all had more or less opportunity of personally observing how every class of society, from the crown to the foot—from kings and emperors and the Pope himself to lazzaroni and chartists—was affected by them. Art was not uninfluenced, nor those who minister to its progress, by these terrible social distractions, and Mad. Novello, like her co-laborer in the cause of beauty, Mad. Sontag experienced their effects to such an extent as induced her to retrace her steps from the honored retirement of the privacy in which she had been living to the equally honorable activity of her public career. She re-appeared in Italy, Germany, Spain, and England, renewing everywhere her former success, and refreshing the memory which had never faded of her former merit. Her powers were in every respect improved by the maturity which her few years of absence from her profession had wrought upon her physical and moral nature, and all Europe has acknowledged her voice to surpass every other in power, purity, and brightness.

Mad. Novello is now about to secede, for a second time, from the exercise of her artistic functions, and her retirement from the public will now be positively final, as the circumstances of the noble house of which marriage has made her a member, having withstood the shock of the most recent and greatest troubles in Italy, are no longer dependent on the vicissitudes of political fortune, and could even her affairs be again involved in the troubles of the time, she has bound herself under a heavy penalty never to sing again in public after her coming farewell.

Mad. Novello is best known in the south of Europe as a dramatic singer,—best in the north for her excellence in the concert-room,—best here, her native home, for her interpretation of the works of the great sacred masters; but, were it not for her all-surpassing reputation in this highest branch of her art, the admiration she has won in England alone on the stage and in the concert room would be sufficient to prove her one of the most distinguished vocalists that have ever sung our language. The speciality of English vocal music consists in our ballads, which require certain peculiarities in the singer, and these of a refined, poetical, and truly exalted character that have scarcely, if ever, been displayed by foreigners; our English pride, then, in our English songstress must not be unmindful of her interpretation of such ditties as "John Anderson," "Auld Robin Gray," "The beating of my own heart," which last she was the first person who sung.

To give due resplendency to the setting of this sun of song, a party comprising the most attractive and most various talent of the day is engaged to accompany her on her farewell tour, and serve as clouds to catch and reflect the golden glory of her brightness. We are fortunately able to enumerate the purposed partners of her last adieu, and we cannot more appropriately or more interestingly conclude this account of her career than by giving the names of those who are to share the lustre of its close.

The cloud of first importance may be regarded as an electric cloud, in respect of its overpowering force, and of the brilliancy and the rapidity which are equally associated with our ideas of it. We need but to name Herr Leopold de Meyer, the thunder-and-lightning characteristics of whose pianism have been proved and acknowledged throughout both hemispheres, to establish the verity of our metaphor. Albeit his thunder, though it astounds, never shocks us,—his lightning, though it dazzles, never consumes. An esteemed cotemporary,—whose fiat, whether it condemn an emperor, approve a prizefighter, oppose a ministry, or applaud a pianist, is revered as an oracle no less at the antipodes than here,—has recently asserted the following judgment on this artist, "The instrumental selection comprised a grand fantasia for pianoforte alone, composed and performed by Herr Leopold de Meyer, pianist to the Emperor of Austria, and in his particular walk the most extraordinary 'manipulator' now before the public. This gentleman combines a force and vigor of hand which few have equalled with a delicate lightness of touch and liquid softness of tone that have never been surpassed. He brings these opposite qualities into play with marvellous address, blending or alternating them as the humor seizes him, and with such consistency that while the ear is always satisfied the taste is never offended. M. de Meyer's fantasia-playing, moreover—like his music—is quite as original as it is astonishing. He has a vein exclusively his own, and is indebted to no other source than that of his invention, whether for ideas or for the method of handling them. Making no pretence to be an exponent of what is conventionally termed the 'classical' school, he does not provoke criticism by an imperfect conception and execution of acknowledged masterpieces. He moves within the sphere most congenial to his artistic nature, and he does wisely, for in that sphere he stands aloof from competition. It is not intended by this to insinuate that M. de Meyer would fail if he ventured on higher and more intellectual ground; but at the same time, as sincere appreciators of his really exceptional talent, we should counsel him to leave the 'great masters' (and especially the 'old masters') to themselves; for, in order to ride comfortably over their domain, he would have to invent a new and peculiar bridle to retain his Pegasus within bounds." Herr Leopold de Meyer has not played in the English province since 1845, and thus, since his reputation has been constantly on the increase, his novelty will be no less an attraction throughout the tour than his talent.

A rain cloud of a chequered April in respect of its tears interwoven with smiles, may be considered the favorite interpreter of gaiety and pathos, Miss Eyles, who, when Mad. Novello had stamped success upon "The beating of my own heart" as a soprano song, sang it a third lower, as a contralto, and was encored in at every concert during a far-spread tour which lasted for ten weeks, and so universally proved her infallible power of pleasing the very various tastes that distinguish the different districts through which she passed.

We may regard as fleecy clouds the congregated members of the London Glee and Madrigal Union, each adding a share of beauty to the scene, and all combining in a general effect of harmonious softness; to wit, Miss J. Wells, a rising soprano, rising in esteem as much as in voice and in merit; Mr. Baxter, an alto, who does all that can be done to render his happily rare register of voice effective; Mr. W. Cummings, a tenor, who has been as successful in singing alone as in blending his voice with those of his companions; Mr. Lawler, a bass, whose broad declamatory style and fine sonorous voice have been too often heard to advantage at the concerts of our most important institutions to need any bush to recommend them; and Mr. Land, the organizer of the Union, who may therefore be regarded as the fatherland of the party,—whose sweetness of voice and mildness of manner prove him to be a Land flowing with milk and honey,—whose proverbial punctuality makes every one rejoice when he is a Land of promise,—who, were there a peerage of pianoforte accompanists, might well be created a Land lord,—whose merits make those who engage him well off when they become Land owners,—whose certainty is such that he nullifies the idea of the geological phenomenon of a Land slip, who bears so urbanely the blame due to others, that he may be not inaptly called a Land-scape of his friends,—whose ever-smiling aspect teaches us to regard him as a personification of the "Happy Land" celebrated in Dr. Rimbault's ballad,—and whom, having all these qualifications, we may be well satisfied to regard as our own native Land.

It is high time, however, to descend from the clouds, and contemplate the stern reality of Mad. Novello's departure. The country folks will not entirely have the advantage of us Londoners in hearing the last of this favorite vocalist; for it appears that the swan song of her professional life will be uttered here in town, or at furthest at Sydenham, which, as has been proved at the Handel festivals, is accessible to tens of thousands at a time who wish to hear her. Let us hope, too, that before her last adieu, the Sacred Harmonic Society may have the benefit of her singing, at least once, in Messiah, in Elijah, and in Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise—the unique beauty of her voice is in no instance heard to such infinite advantage as in the brief solo that sublimely heralds the words and the musical subject of the great chorus in this last-named work, "The night is departing," and it is only if we can preserve in our memory the gleaming brightness with which she sings this phrase, that we shall be able to avoid supposing the watchman's warning is fulfilled in her retirement; "The morning will come, but the night will come also."—London Musical World, July 14.

Madame Cinti-Damoreau to her Pupils in the Conservatoire.*

It is to you, my dear pupils, that I have resolved to dedicate this method, the fruit of my studies and my experience, and in which I think I have set forth the best principles and the best examples of the art of singing. Adhere firmly to these principles, and endeavor to reproduce faithfully the examples; this, in a word, is the great thing in a good system of instruction.

If I speak to you of my studies, it is because at the very apogee of my artistic career, I never ceased to study; it is only to assiduous labor, and the firm resolve of effecting every day fresh progress, that we owe the inestimable honor of obtaining and preserving the favor of the public. In order to prove to you all that may be gained by this determined application to study, I at first entertained the idea of prefixing my biography to this book, but I was afraid it would be too long, and I shall restrict myself to describing only that part of my career which is connected with my débuts at the Théâtre-Italien, the Opéra, and the Opéra-Comique. You must bear in mind, therefore, that, while speaking of myself, I shall not cease to think of you.

I was scarcely thirteen when I was introduced to M. C. Henri Plantade, a clever, talented, kind-hearted man, whose memory is still cherished by all those who have loved or cultivated musical art in France during the last thirty years. M. Plantade was assiduous in giving me lessons, with all the care of an excellent musical professor and all the tenderness of a father. My voice, which gave promise of becoming flexible, but which did not then possess much strength, struck him as completely adapted to the Italian style. I studied, therefore, under him, only the old repertory, beginning with Durante's Psalms. My masters allowed me to sing scarcely three or four French airs; among these latter were the airs of Montano et Stephanie, and Beniowski, true models of a style that is at once simple, expressive, and graceful. I mention this to you, my dear pupils, in order that you may not suppose that you sing well only when you have succeeded in singing with ease what is difficult. It is not enough, recollect, merely to utter notes and execute passages more or less difficult; besides doing this, you must give them color, you must animate and accentuate them, and for this purpose an artist must be impressed with the words, and with the spirit of the piece or scene he has to sing. His physiognomy, also, must, so to speak, reveal to the hearer the subject and character of what is sung. Is it necessary for me to add that his articulation and pronunciation must be irreproachable? Listen to Pouchard, and you will perceive how much charming effect is gained by not allowing a syllable to be lost by the auditors.

It is far more difficult to sing in French than in Italian. This is very easily explained. We French do not allow ourselves to take breath in the middle of a word, to repeat a syllable, to sing forte when the situation suggests that we should sing piano; lastly, we must not sacrifice the words to the notes, but, on the contrary, we must sacrifice the notes to the words. By working incessantly, by devoting yourselves exclusively to your art, you may succeed in identifying the former with the latter, and speaking in music.

*Preface to the Méthode d'Artiste, dedicated by Mad. Cinti-Damoreau to her pupils of the Paris Conservatory.

Such is nearly all my method, my dear pupils. I worked always and constantly, listening to others and reasoning on what I heard.

When I had attained my fourteenth year, M. Plantade said to me, "My dear girl, you cannot now do without me. Mark my words: you possess taste; you will adopt what is good in some and reject what is bad in others." But do not suppose from this advice, that you are to imitate servilely the master or the model you select. You must, as I cannot too often repeat, explain to yourselves the means of success peculiar to the artist to whom you are listening, and clearly comprehend by what art he has acquired grace, by what secret he has been able to charm you. You thus avoid the shoal of parody, and advance rapidly on the road that leads to success.

Before I was fifteen, I made my debut at the Italiens, as Lilla, in La cosa rara, a character left open by the departure of Mad. Fodor. Thanks to my extreme youth, and, above all, to the advice of my dear master, my success was a genuine one. The day on which M. Plantade's unconditional approbation confirmed the applause of the public was the happiest day of my life. After my successful debut, I had many annoyances and prejudices to overcome. I was French; this was almost a crime at the Théâtre-Italien!

I was not discouraged. I learned, in a very short time, nearly fifteen or twenty parts; I understudied (sometimes in a day) the parts of all the prime donne; in the ardor of my zeal, and with my incessant application, I was ready for every score. This, my dear pupils, is the proper place to inform you that, should you intend to go on the stage, you must not be contented with studying the part in which you propose to appear; you must comprehend and fully master all the other parts. By this plan, you seize better the purpose of a work, while engaging in a practice more calculated than any other to render your character supple. My adoption of this system proved, one day, highly advantageous to me.

Mad. Catalani was to appear in an extraordinary performance at the Opéra. The grand rehearsal was already somewhat advanced, when it was remarked that the great vocalist had not arrived. At the moment the ritornello of her cavatina announced her entrance on the stage. Barilli, our stage-manager, taking my hand, boldly presented me to the orchestra, to sing in the place of our celebrated manageress. Though greatly agitated at first, I felt afterwards very happy, for the orchestra applauded me very much, and it was the first time such an honor had been paid me. When Mad. Catalani heard of what I had been bold enough, or, rather, what my devotion to art had prompted me to do, she thanked me by an embrace, for she was always kind.

A short time subsequently (I was then sixteen), Garcia entrusted me with a charming first-rate part in his opera, Il Califfo di Bagdad. Yarat, who then heard me (alas! I was too young ever to have heard him), said, I sang insolently in tune (insolennement juste). This is, I think, the only defect on which I have had to congratulate myself in the whole course of my life; contrast this defect, my dear pupils; there can be no charm if you do not sing in tune. This quality is not one, I am aware, that is easily acquired, but, by working assiduously at the intervals of all kinds, slowly, and with the assistance of a master, you may sometimes succeed in singing in tune, even when you have not naturally a feeling for it.

When Rossini arrived in France, I received the valuable advice of Bordogni, whose colleague I afterwards became at the Conservatoire, and whose good taste is proved by the charming exercises of vocalization he has given us.

A short time afterwards, an extraordinary performance afforded me an opportunity of appearing at the Opéra, in Le Rossignol. As I had never previously had a chance of singing in French before the public who treated me already so kindly, I was in a state of intense anxiety. It was, however, the very success which attended this attempt which made me resolve to remain on the grand stage of the Opéra, for which a new destiny seemed then about to open. But, before I separated from the Théâtre-Italien, which had become endeared to me for many reasons, I determined to subject myself to another ordeal, more serious than that of Le Rossignol could be. The Vicomte de la Rochefoucauld (then Duke de Doudeauville), whose name all artists should remember with gratitude, was, at that time, entrusted with the direction of the Beaux Arts. I asked his permission to play Amazily, in Fernand Cortez, a delicious part, entirely dependent on expression, and, apparently, quite opposed to the nature of the style I had cultivated up to that period. The part does not contain a single roulade; it was impossible to succeed in it except by feeling and simplicity. This second bold attempt proved even more successful than the first. I became a member of the Opéra, therefore, exceedingly proud of having obtained the suffrage of so eminent a composer as Spontini, and of so dramatic a singer as Mad. Branchu, for whom he had composed this admirable part twenty years previously. Here begins the second, and not the least happy, period of my theatrical career.—London Musical World, July 7.

The Representative Art.

No art is worth anything that does not embody an idea,—that is not representative: otherwise, it is like a body without a soul, or the image of some divinity that never had existence. Art needs, indeed, to be individualized, to betray the characteristics of the artist, to be himself infused into his work; but more than this, it needs to typify, to illustrate the character of the age,—to be of a piece with other expressions of the sentiment that animates other men at the time. It must be one note in the concert, and that not discordant,—neither behind time nor ahead of it,—neither in the wrong key nor the other mode: you don't want Verdi in one of Beethoven's symphonies; you don't want Mozart in Rossini's operas. No art ever has lived that was not the genuine product of the era in which it appeared; no art ever can live that is not such a product: it may, perchance, have a temporary or a fictitious success, but it can neither really and truly exert an influence at the moment of its highest triumph, nor afterwards remain a power among men, unless it reflect the spirit of the epoch, unless it show the very age and body of the time his form and pressure.

All greatness consists in this: in being alive to what is going on around one; in living actually; in giving voice to the thought of humanity; in saying to one's fellows what they want to hear or need to hear at that moment; in being the concretion, the result, of the influences of the present world. In no other way can one affect the world than in embodying thus its ideas. You will see, in looking to history, that all great men have been a piece of their time; take them out and set them elsewhere, they will not fit so well; they were made for their day and generation. The literature which has left any mark, which has been worthy of the name, has always mirrored what was doing around it; not necessarily daguerreotypy the mere outside, but at least reflecting the inside,—the thoughts, if not the actions of men,—their feelings and sentiments, even if it treated of apparently far-off themes. You may discuss the Greek republics in the spirit of the modern one; you may sing idylls of King Arthur in the very mood of the nineteenth century. Art, too, will be seen always to have felt this necessity, to have submitted to this law. The great dramatists of Greece, like those of England, all flourished in a single period, blossomed in one soil; the sculptures of antiquity represented the classic spirit, and have never been equalled since, because they were the legitimate product of that classic spirit. You cannot have another Phidias till man again believes in Jupiter. The Gothic architecture, how meanly is it imitated now! What cathedrals built in this century rival those of Milan or Strasbourg or Notre Dame? Ah! there is no such Catholicism to inspire the builders; the very men who reared them would not be architects, if they lived to-day. And the Italian painters, the Angelos and Raphael's and Da Vinci's and Titians, who were geniuses of such universal power that they builded and carved and went on embassies and worked in mathematics only with less splendid success than they painted,—they painted because the age demanded it; they painted as the age demanded; they were religious, yet sensuous, like their nation; they felt the influence of the Italian sun and soil. Their faith and their history were compressed into The Last Judgement and the Cartoons; their passion as well as their power may be recognized in The Last Supper and The Venus of the Bath.

There is always a necessity for this expression of the character of the age. This spirit of our age, this mixed materialistic and imaginative spirit,—this that abroad prompts Russian and Italian wars, and at home discovers California mines,—that realizes gorgeous dreams of hidden gold, and Napoleonic ideas of almost universal sway,—that bridges Niagara, and underlays the sea with wire, and forgetful of the Titan fate, essays to penetrate clouds,—this spirit, so practical that those who choose to look on one side only of the shield can see only perjured monarchs trampling on deceived or decaying peoples, and back woodsmen hewing forests, and begrimed laborers setting up telegraph-poles or working at printing-presses —this spirit also so full of imagination,—which has produced an outburst of music (that most intangible and subtle and imaginative of arts) such as the earth never heard before,—which is developing in the splendid, showy life, in the reviving taste for pagantry that some supposed extinct, in the hurried, crowded incidents that will fill up the historic page that treats of the nineteenth century,—this spirit is sure to get expression in art.

The American people, cosmopolitan, concrete, the union, the result rather of a union of so many nationalities, ought surely to do its share towards this expression. The American people surely represents the century,—has much of its spirit: is full of unrest; is eminently practical, but practical only in embodying poetical or lofty ideas; is demonstrative and excitable; resembles the French much and in many things,—the French, who are at the head of modern and European civilization,—who think and feel deeply, but do not keep their feelings hidden. The Americans, too, like expression: when they admire a Kossuth or a Jenny Lind, a patriot exile or a foreign singer, all the world is sure to know of their admiration; when they are delighted at some great achievement in science, like the laying of an Atlantic Cable, they demonstrate their delight. They make their successful generals Presidents; they give dinners to Morphy and banquets to Cyrus Field. They are thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the age. Therefore they are artistic.

How amazed some will be at the proposition, amazed that the age should be called an artistic one, amazed that Americans should be considered an artistic nation! Yet art is only the expression in outward and visible form of an inward and spiritual grace,—the sacrament of the imagination. Art is an incarnation in colors or stones or music or words of some subtle essence which requires the embodiment. We all have delicate fancies, lofty imaginings, profound sentiments; the artist expresses them for us. If, then, this age be one that requires expression for its ideas, that is practical, that insists on accomplishing its designs, on creating its children, on producing its results, it is an artistic age. For art works; a poet is a maker, according to the Greeks; and all artists are poets; they all produce; they all do; they all make. They do just what all the practical men of this practical age are doing, what even the Gradgrinds are doing: they embody ideas; they put thoughts into facts. A quiet, contemplative age is not an artistic one; art has ever flourished in stirring times: Grecian wars and Guelphic strife have been its fostering influences. An artist is very far from being an idle dreamer: he works as hard as the merchant or the mechanic,—works, too, physically as well as mentally, with his hand as well as his head.

This is all statement: let us have some facts; let us embody our ideas. Do you not call Meyerbeer, with his years of study and effort and application, a worker? Do you not call Verdi, who has produced thirty operas, a worker? Do you not imagine that Turner labored on his splendid pictures? Do you not know how Crawford toiled and spun away his nerves and brain? Have you not heard of the incessant and tremendous attention that for many months Church bestowed on the canvas that of late attracted the admiration of English critics and their Queen? Was Rachel idle? Have these artists not spent the substance of themselves as truly as any of your politicians or your soldiers or your traders? Can you not trace in them the same energy, the same effort, the same determination as in Louis Napoleon, as in Zachary Taylor, as in Stephen Girard? Are not they also representative?

And their works,—for by these shall ye know them,—do they reflect in nothing this fitful, uneasy, yet splendid intensity of to-day? Can you not read in the colors on Turner's canvas, can you not see in the rush of Church's Niagara, can you not hear in the strains of the Traviata, can you not perceive in the tones and looks of Ristori, just what you find in the successful men in other spheres of life? Rothschild's fortune speaks no more plainly than the Robert le Diable; George Sand's novels and Carlyle's histories tell the same story as Kossuth's eloquence and Garibaldi's deeds. The artists are as alive to-day as any in the world. For, again and again, art is not an outside thing; its professors, its lovers, are not placed outside the world; they are in it and of it as absolutely as the rest. You who think otherwise, remember that Verdi's name six months ago was the watchword of the Italian revolutionists; remember that certain operas are forbidden now to be played in Naples, lest they should arouse the countrymen of Masaniello; remember, if you did not know, how in New York, last June, all the singers in town offered their services for a benefit to the Italian cause, and all the habitués, late though the season was, crowded to their places to see an opera whose attractiveness had been worn out and whose novelty was nearly gone. You who think that art is an interest unworthy of men who live in the world, that it is a thing apart, what say you to the French, the most actual, the most practical, the most worldly of peoples, and yet the fondest of art in all its phases,—the French, who remembered the statues in the Tuilleries amid the massacres of the First Revolution, and spared the architecture of antiquity when they bombarded the city of the Caesars?

Consider, too, the growing love for art in practical America; remark the crowds of newly rich who deck their houses with pictures and busts, even though they cannot always appreciate them: remember that nearly every prominent town in the country has its theatre; that the opera, the most refined luxury of European civilization, considered for long an affectation beyond every other, is relished here as decidedly as in Italy or France. In New York, Boston, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, there are buildings exclusively appropriated to this new form of art, this exotic, expensive amusement. These opera-houses, too, illustrate most aptly the progress of other arts. They are adorned with painting and gilding and carving; they are as sumptuous in accommodation as the palaces of European potentates; they are lighted with a brilliancy that Aladdin's garden never rivalled; they are thronged with crowds as gayly dressed as those that fill the saloons of Parisian belles; and the singers and actors who interpret the thoughts of mighty foreign masters are the same who delight the Emperor of the French when he pays a visit to the Queen of Great Britain and Ireland. Orchestras of many instruments discourse most eloquent music, and involuted strains are criticized in learned style, in capitals thousands of miles from the seashore. And there is no appreciation of art in all this! there is no embodiment of the love of the age for material magnificence, there is no poetry incarnated into form, in this combination of splendors rivalling the opium-eater's visions! The Americans are a dull, stupid people, immersed in business; art has no effect upon them; it is despised among them; it can never prosper here!

Soon after his arrival in England, Jullien was engaged to play the flageolet at the mansion of one of the principal members of the English peerage. His lordship, supposing that Jullien did not understand English, approached the accompanist and said, in a low voice, "Tell the gentleman not to play anything too long—I do not like long pieces." The accompanist did not know what to do; but Jullien said to him, with a smile, "Stop when I stop, and close the book." Every one was silent and listened. Jullien played twenty bars and stopped. The accompanist did the same. The audience were in raptures; and his lordship, running up and pressing the artist's hand, said, "Ah, monsieur, the piece you have played is admirable; but it is too short—you must give us another." "With pleasure, my lord, but you must pay me double." His lordship consented enthusiastically. Quietly opening the music again, Jullien went on from the passage where he had left off, and concluded the piece amidst thunders of applause.

Paris.

The changes and embellishments of Paris continue with undiminished energy and celerity. The city is on the point of contracting a further debt of one hundred and fifty million of francs, to carry on the work of regeneration and improvement, which must, in a few years more, render the French capital the most magnificent city the world has ever seen. Whichever way the pedestrian turns, he meets on all sides, armies of laborers, tearing down the narrow and ill-constructed buildings of the past, or swarms of artisans, rearing commodious and elegant edifices, more in conformity with the requirements of the age. The project of the new Grand Opera House, which is to be one of the monuments of the reign of Napoleon III., seems not yet to be definitively settled. It was supposed that a fine site, on the boulevard, opposite the beautiful Rue de la Paix, had been chosen, but none of the plans submitted for the new building has been accepted, as yet, and it is said that the location may possibly be changed to some spot more eligible in point of space. This rumor has been denied by the official journal, but all the statements of the Moniteur during the past few years have hardly been of evangelical veracity, and people persist in believing that the Imperial Academy of Music is to afford a golden occasion for speculation in real estate, in a quarter much nearer the Tuilleries than the site already named. Meantime, not the least of the new improvements is the demolition of several buildings on and adjacent to the corner of the Palais Royal, which is occupied by the Theatre Français. The space afforded by the removal of these buildings will clear the approaches to the Government Theatre, and aid the circulation in a part of the city which is always crowded, and stood vastly in need of this amelioration. The St. Honore front of the Palais Royal will now be freed of all incumbrances, and form an agreeable vis à vis to the extension of the Louvre on the other side of the broad square which separates the two palaces.—N. O. Picayune.

July 11.—Nothing of any commanding interest has occurred in the operatic world. At the Grand Opéra, Les Huguenots has been revived for M. Urcaut, the Belgian tenor of whom I wrote a short time since. He still maintains the favorable impression he created in William Tell, and people seem to think he will be permanently engaged. By the way, the "normal diapason" now established at the Grand Opéra does not work over well, and is especially obnoxious to the bass singers. The "Pif-paf," for instance, is, with the new pitch in some parts beyond the range of any but the most exceptional voices. The character of the music is also considerably modified by the change, and, in some instances, as for example, the air of the "Couvre Feu," loses not a little of its original color.

The manager of the Opéra-Comique has done a famous stroke of business for his establishment by the engagement of M. Roger, whose return to the scene of his early triumphs will no doubt be hailed with delight by the frequenters of this house. The round of characters he created here with such marked success, await his touch to revive with all their original freshness and charm, and after the Midsummer glories of the Grand Opéra, which some say he had better never have struggled for, he will glide calmly and gently into a sort of "latter spring." Mad. Faure (the wife of Faure now engaged at your Royal Italian Opera) and Mad. Ugalde are also re-engaged, but the presence of these ladies is too familiar, and their talents have been too exhaustively reconnoitred by the audiences of the Opéra-Comique, to cause the announcement to be received with much enthusiasm. Mad. Ugalde has already appeared in Galathée, and it is just to say that her reception was in the highest degree flattering. Mad. Faure will not make her re-entrée till next week, in Boieldieu's Petit Chaperon Rouge.

Among the small items of intelligence interesting to your musical readers, I may mention the engagement of M. Nilmann, the German tenor, for a short period at the Grand Opéra. He is engaged expressly to sing in the Tannhäuser of Richard Wagner. Mlle. Tedesco will return to the Opéra in September, and make her first appearance in Le Prophète. She is afterwards to play Olympia in Herculanum. I hear also that Meyerbeer is expected to arrive in Paris very shortly.

One or two letters which I have received from Italian correspondents enable me to furnish you with a few scraps of news as to what is going on at the principal theatres in the land of song. At Genoa there have been several performances for the benefit of the Fund in support of the Sicilian Insurrection. The last deserves especial notice as being signalized by the appearance of the celebrated Signor Tamburini. He sang the cavatina from La Sonnambula, the duo in Il Barbiere, and the air of Maometto. His reception was enthusiastic; the applause which greeted him being no less addressed to the patriotic Italian citizen than to the celebrated singer. His vocalization was marvellous, and took all by surprise, for the ear is no longer accustomed to such a deluge of trills and runs as was poured forth from the singer's throat with the most perfect ease. After the first effects of astonishment had subsided, bursts of applause followed one upon the other, and positively overwhelmed the last representative of the old florid school of Italian singing. Tamburini did not, however, exhaust the appreciative power of the audience, who in return awarded to Signor Agrone and to Signora Paroli, and to all the other artists and dilettanti, who contributed their services on the occasion, their due meed of applause. Signor Bottesini has been engaged at La Scala, in Milan, where he is to produce his opera L'Assedio di Firenze, and Mad. Fiorentini is engaged to play the principal part. The San Carlo, at Naples, is not in a very satisfactory condition. I Foscari, lately produced there with Guicciardi, met with a cool reception from the inferiority of the execution, and a few days after Don Pasquale encountered a complete fiasco.

The sisters Fenni have been giving a concert at Parma, where their admirable talents have been duly appreciated. The programme for the autumnal season at the Opera of Bologna contains the names of the following artists:—Mesda. Borghi-Mamo and Luigia Gavetti-Regiani, and MM. Lodovico Graziani, Antonio Morelli, Mario Ghidi. M. Rota is the ballet master, and the principal dansense Mlle. Adeline Plunkett. Signor Beneventano, the baritone, is engaged for the approaching season at Trieste.

Mlle. Kenneth, whom your theatrical readers will better identify as the daughter of "little Kenneth," erst the proprietor of the well-known "little shop," at the corner of Bow Street, where many dramatic wits and theatrical stars were once wont to lounge and exchange the newest coinage of the mint of mirth and fancy, has just returned from a successful engagement in Spain, notably at Madrid, where she sang with Tamberlik, and at Barcelona. Mlle. Kenneth has been trained in the traditions of the old Italian school of grand opera; her vocalization is excellent, and she possesses the power of dramatic expression.

I hear from Pesth that the Italian Opera has commenced there. Norma, with Mlle. Lagrusa as the Druid priestess, has produced quite a sensation. This lady is described as remarkably beautiful, and as possessing a voice of pure and rich quality, with a sympathetic character quite thrilling in its effect. Her presence is noble and graceful, and exactly suited to the heroines of the lyrical drama; and both by her acting and broad grand style of vocalising, exercises an extraordinary power over her audience. How is it neither Paris nor London have hitherto had the benefit of this artist's vaunted ability? How has she escaped Lumley the pearl-fisher? did he dive not deep enough, or too deep?

The Imperial Theatre of St. Petersburg has secured Signor Graziani, the baritone, for two years, commencing next season. The contract was only signed last Thursday. Mad. Rita Bernardi Fabricca, the wife of the Maestro Fabricca, an admirable singer, and moreover a very pretty person, is also engaged at St. Petersburg, for the third time. She is now in London, having left Paris a short time since. Mlle. Lotti della Santa has just passed through Paris on her way back from London to her country house in the environs of Milan. There is some talk of Mad. Miolan-Carvalho taking an engagement at the Royal Lisbon Theatre. Signor Fabricca's visit to London gives some color to this rumor, as he is charged with organizing the operatic troupe for the San Carlos at Lisbon.

I have the melancholy intelligence to record of the death of the pianist and composer, Gorla. It is reported that he has not left any money behind him. This is strange, for it is known that large sums were made by his compositions. One publisher confessed to realizing 3000 francs a year by one piece alone, and his nocturne and étude in E flat produced a profit of 30,000 francs—that is to say, the publishers! Sic vos non vobis! oh luckless herd of scribblers, whether musical or literary.—London Musical World, July 14.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Meyerbeer's grand opera, Le Prophète, was produced on Thursday night for the first time in the new theatre, with a splendor and magnificence that we believe has never yet been equalled. We must, for the present, be satisfied with announcing that Signor Tamberlik made his first appearance this season in the character of Jann of Leyden, that his singing was as much distinguished as formerly for correctness, vigor, and energy, and his impersonation of the mock prophet characterized by a manliness which invested the character of the impostor-prophet throughout with wonderfully sustained interest. "Tamberlik's John of Leyden"—says the Morning Post—"is well known to our public, who have long justly regarded it as one of his very greatest efforts; and never did he play the very arduous character more finely than on the present occasion. All the great 'points' of the part were 'taken,' as formerly, with an unquestionable appreciation of their merit; and the 'Ro del cielo,' in which the marvellous voice of Tamberlik, animated by truly heroic ecstacy, gives out those famous B and C naturals di petto, with a force which makes the 'vaulted roof rebound,' again created what the Italians would call a fuore, quelled only by the reappearance of the singer twice before the curtain at the end of the act to which the air in question forms the finale." Mlle. Csillag gives evidence of additional powers in every part she undertakes, and her delineation of Fides will place her in a higher position than she has yet occupied. To appear in a character which some of the most consummate singers of the day have stamped with their individuality, indicates no small ambition; but Mlle. Csillag has proved herself capable of grappling with the extraordinary difficulties of a very arduous task, and of

The "Philharmonic Problem" in St. Petersburg.

From the Signale of Leipsic, we extract some account of the way in which the Philharmonic Problem has been treated in St. Petersburg, feeling that it has not a few useful suggestions for us, here. There is one society it would seem, for all the branches of the musical art. How if all our local societies devoted to music were consolidated into one great, active, efficient body, uniting the resources, the zeal, the various talents of each; uniting their voices, the instruments, the libraries, the money, the professional talent, the business capacity, the enthusiasm and the general culture of the amateurs, and the higher special culture of the thorough artist? Is this altogether impracticable? Have we not the material for a great Musical Society among us, such as in this country, at least cannot be equalled? Might not some well considered plan be devised, which should bring all these elements together, and fuse them into one great and harmonious whole? But let us see how they do it in Russia.

Between the years 1840 and 1850 there was in St. Petersburg a Symphony Society, consisting entirely of amateurs, who, in playing and singing sought for a closer acquaintance with classical works. From various causes the meetings of this society were suspended in 1851, or rather postponed until favorable circumstances should make their revival possible. During the last years, by the exertions of the Count WIELHORSKY, RUBINSTEIN and others, members of the old society, the statutes were revived and the whole society remodelled. The name of the society is now: "RUSSIAN MUSICAL SOCIETY," and its object, the education and encouragement of national talent, the diffusion of musical culture by the best possible performances of works of all schools, all periods and all masters, more particularly of the classical school; the awarding of prizes for compositions of all kinds, to consist of gold and silver medals as well as money; to give beginners a chance to hear their compositions, and bring them before the public, to send young persons of musical talent abroad to perfect themselves in their art, at the expense of the society; the completion and enlarging of the library; subscription to all musical periodicals. Ordinary members, who pay fifteen roubles annually, have a free pass to the ten symphony concerts of the season, the right of using the library and reading-room, and of voting at the annual general public meeting. Regular members pay one hundred roubles per annum, have free admittances to all performances of the society, and a vote at the annual meetings. The directors, of whom there are five, serve for two years, after which two step out appointing their successors. There are five vice-directors chosen by the directors. Directors and vice-directors form the committee. All questions are decided by simple majority. There is, besides, a board of consultation, consisting of the best Russian resident musicians, which is to report on new compositions, award the prizes and assist the committee in fixing concert-programmes, &c. The society is to give annually ten grand symphony concerts, six soirées for chamber-music and two oratorio performances. Each concert must contain a piece from the pen of a Russian composer, and, if possible, a solo performance by a Russian artist. In the programmes, the year of the birth and death of the authors is mentioned. Words of vocal pieces are invariably given, translated into Russian, if sung in grasping the salient characteristics of the most original and masterly creation of the lyric drama. Berta was carefully performed by Mlle. Corbari. Signor Tagliafico looked as if he had stepped out of a picture by Velasquez, and sang unexceptionably the music allotted to Count Oberthal; and the three Anabaptists were admirably represented by Signors Neri-Baraldi and Polonini, and M. Zelger. The scenery, costumes, and mise-en-scène are even more splendid and complete now than when the original production of Le Prophète, eleven years ago, was the town-talk of the season. From the Cuyper-like beauty of the opening view to the massive grandeur of the cathedral interior—cleverly taken at the junction of the south transept and the choir, thus giving the effect of unlimited extent—each scene was exquisite in itself, and gained an effect by the constant changes of the crowd of auxiliaries, who always—and as if by instinct, so thoroughly were they drilled—formed into harmoniously-balanced groupings. The skating scene, of course, was the main feature of the scenic display, and the "Quadrille des Patineurs" was so exceedingly well managed that it was enthusiastically encored. The dancing of Mad. Zina in the pas de deux was absolute perfection. We have no doubt that, placed on the stage with such profuse magnificence, Le Prophète will now, after its five years' banishment, be a great and continued success.—Ibid.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The experiments now being made at both Italian houses to resuscitate the neglected works of acknowledged masters, are commendable or likely to lead to good results, if not to great successes. In all probability we shall hear little more this year of Orfeo e Eurydice, performed three times at the Royal Italian Opera, or of Il Matrimonio Segreto, performed twice at Her Majesty's Theatre, both of which were worthily and carefully put upon the stage; but we must not therefore conclude that nothing has been accomplished. It is something at all events for composers of the present day to gain some notion of what sort of music is calculated to please the public for whom they intend writing, and by what means popularity may be most surely achieved. It is something, too, even for the informed, to be reminded how old composers, like Gluck and Cimarosa, wrote in the olden times, and to contrast their compositions with those of the present day. When Oberon was announced at Her Majesty's Theatre, we entertained serious doubts as to its success; nor were these doubts entirely removed when told that the cast would include the names of Titiens, Alboni, Mongini, Belart, Everardi, Gassier, and others; that the spectacle would be dazzling and transcendent; and that the music would be enriched by additions from Euryanthe, and accompanied recitatives by Mr. Jules Benedict, the accomplished musician, and favorite pupil and friend of Weber. We could not help thinking that there must have been some powerful cause for the failure of the opera on its first production. Oberon was first performed on the eleventh of April, 1826, when Weber was in the height of his popularity, and when the public, enraptured with their new favorite, would have been but too eager to take advantage of any opportunity afforded them of exhibiting their enthusiasm. The opera, nevertheless, ran but a few nights, and achieved a moderate success only. No doubt a good deal was owing to the absurdity and unfathomable purpose of the libretto, of which the author, Mr. Planché, one of the most elegant and correct of our dramatic writers, appears now to be thoroughly ashamed, since he acknowledges in his preface to the Italian version, that "nothing but the genius of Weber could have preserved it from total oblivion."

Upon Mr. Benedict devolved the onerous and, however agreeable, not very grateful task of writing the accompanied recitatives and making such additions as were considered necessary to the success of the opera. This gentleman, perhaps more than any other living musician, was the most thoroughly competent to enter into Weber's notions and supply what was found wanting in the score. We cannot help thinking, however, that the interpolation of pieces from Euryanthe was a grave mistake, and by no means called for, notwithstanding the brilliant manner in which it enabled Mlle. Titiens to wind up the performance. Oberon is, or is not, a chef d'œuvre. If it is, it was sacrilegious to meddle with it. If it is not, no excerpts from other works could make it so. Moreover, the public were desirous to hear Oberon in its integrity, and wanted nothing else—not even that Mlle. Titiens should be conciliated.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—Here Orfeo e Eurydice has been repeated, after which Lucresia Borgia had been given with Grisi, Mario, Ronconi, and Didié. The Prophète was announced with Mad. Csilay, Mad. Corbari, and Tamberlik in the principal parts.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.—The last concert of the forty-eighth season—one of the most brilliant and successful since the Philharmonic Society was instituted—took place at the Hanover-Square Rooms on Monday evening, July 2, when the following selection was performed before a crowded assemblage of amateurs and professors of the musical art:

PART I.
Sinfonia in D, Op. 7. . . . . Mozart.
Recit. and Aria, "Tu m'abbandoni," Miss Louisa Pyne. . . . . Spohr.
Concerto, pianoforte, in G minor, Miss Arabella Goddard. . . . . Dussek.
Overture, "Nalades" . . . . . Sterndale Bennett.

PART II.
Sinfonia in C minor, No. 5. . . . . Beethoven.
Aria, "Quando lasciai la Normandia" (Robert le Diable), Miss Louisa Pyne. . . . . Meyerbeer.
Overture, "Jubilee" . . . . . Weber.
Conductor, Professor Sterndale Bennett, Mus. D.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—The Monday Popular Concerts, "The People's Philharmonic" as they have been not inaptly styled, came to a close on Monday night with a performance "for the benefit of the directors." It is well known that the managers of these entertainments are the Messrs. Chappell, who certainly need not be ashamed of the undertaking with which their names have for two years past been associated—for never was speculation, of which art was the medium, planned and carried out with more undeviating artistic worthiness. The first promise of the scheme has been verified to the letter; the public has been invariably dealt with in good faith, and it is now no more than the elucidation of a plain fact to state that an institution has been established, on the most legitimate principles and the firmest basis, alike honorable to its projectors and advantageous to those who support it. The programme of the final concert (the twenty-seventh of the second season), selected from the works of various masters, proved so attractive that St. James's Hall was hardly spacious enough to accommodate the crowd that besieged the doors. Those who take an interest in the musical progress of the masses (towards which poor Julien effected so much, and with such untiring zeal) may not be displeased to learn that nearly 1600 paid 1s. at the doors. On the other hand, the area stalls and the three-shilling galleries were crammed to suffocation. What sort of music these worthy people came to hear may be seen by the subjoined programme:

PART I.
Quartet in C major, stringed instruments. . . . . Spohr.
Song—"The Wanderer" . . . . . Schubert.
Harpsichord lessons, pianoforte. . . . . Scarlatti.
Heder Kreis, voice. . . . . Beethoven.
Prelude, Sarabande, and Gavotte, violoncello. . . . . Bach.

PART II.
Quartet, in E flat major, Op. 44, stringed instruments. . . . . Mendelssohn.
Song—"Zuleika" . . . . . Meyerbeer.
Suite de Pièces, in E major. . . . . Handel.
Song—"Il Pensier" . . . . . Haydn.
Song—"La Gita in Gondola" . . . . . Rossini.
Duet, for two Pianofortes, in D major. . . . . Mozart.
Conductor—Mr. Lindsay Sloper.

The players in the quartets were M. Sainton, Herr Goffrie, Mr. Doyle, and Signor Piatto, with whose respective merits our readers are well acquainted.

BUCKINGHAM PALACE.—A grand concert was given on Wednesday evening, June 27, by Her Majesty, to a select but illustrious party. The following was the programme: Aria, "Avvi un dio" (Maria di Rohan), Donizetti, Mad. de Paez; Fantasia, Flute (MS.), Koppitz, Herr Koppitz; Recit. and Aria, "Non più di fiori" (La Clemenza di Tito), Mozart, Mad. Kapp-Young; Air Hongrois, Violin, Ernst, Herr Becker; Air, "Vons pouvez soupier" (Marco Spada), Anber, Mlle. Artot; Fantaisie Originale, Pianoforte, L. De Meyer, M. Leopold De Meyer; Thema und Variationen, Proch, Mlle. Charlotte de Tiefensee. At the Pianoforte, Mr. W. G. Cousins. At the end of the performance, Her Majesty, after exchanging a gracious word with each of the other artists, conversed with Herr Leopold de Meyer for nearly a quarter of an hour, and requested him, the celebrated pianist, if not too fatigued, to play another piece, with which august "command" M. Leopold de Meyer complied, to the infinite delight of the whole assembly, among whom were the King of the Belgians and divers "Grand Dukes."

Letters from Havana say that Gottschalk, the pianist, has been dangerously ill, but that he is now convalescent, and that he is to make a professional tour through Central America and Venezuela. He will take charge of the orchestra of the Italian opera, next winter, at the Tacón Theater. The new impressarii, Raya & Co., are now in Paris, engaging artists for the season, which will commence in November.

a foreign language. A choral society is established as an integral part of the whole. The orchestra is selected and paid. Mad. NISSEN-SALOMAN, and Messrs. PICCOLI, LODI, and DUTSCH, are engaged to instruct young persons of limited means, who show talent for music, at the expense of the society. The society will try to establish an Academy of vocal music at Charkow. There are to be branch societies in the principal cities of the empire. Although the society professes to be national, new compositions of foreign artists, if approved of, are brought out at the regular concerts. Foreigners may also be engaged as performers.

The society has just finished its first year. Oratorio performances were not given. In the ten "Philharmonic" concerts, the following composition of Russian composers were brought out: Overtures "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka, "Cholmsky," "Life of a Czar" by Glinka, Piano Concerto with orchestra by Rubinstein. Wallachian dance from the opera "Gromoboi" by Werstofsky, scherzo for orchestra by Kui, another scherzo by Moussorsky, overture "Demon" by Fittinghof, and songs by various composers. The rest of the programmes was made up from the great masters. Here are a few specimens of them.

FIRST CONCERT.

Overture to the opera "Russian and Ludmilla".....Glinka
Chorus from the oratorio "Jephtha".....Handel Concerto for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment
.....Rubinstein
Finale from the opera "Loreley".....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven

SECOND CONCERT.

Overture to Anacreon.....Cherubini
Aria from the oratorio "Joseph".....Handel
Tersetto for soprano, tenor and bass.....Dargomijsky
Concerto for piano with orchestra.....Fr. Liszt
Romances for piano.....Dargomijsky—Wielhorsky
Symphony.....Fr. Schubert

The Buffalo Sængerfest.

We devote a good deal of space this week to the account of the proceedings of the German singing societies at their great high festival held at Buffalo during the last week. The elements of enjoyment were various, and all, it would seem, were enjoyed to the full, and the example of our German fellow citizens is well worthy of adoption and imitation by our native population. But it does not seem to be in the nature or in accordance with the genius of our people to enjoy themselves in this way, or indeed, to enjoy themselves at all in any way that shall altogether throw aside the conventional restraints of a somewhat cold nature, the narrow bonds of an awkward formality, and fairly to relax and expand in the free and natural manner that characterizes the observances of the holidays of people of European birth and descent. What are our holidays, and how do we observe them? There is the Fourth of July, that marks the grandest epoch in modern political history, and — what else? And how do we celebrate this great anniversary? Fireworks, processions of military, processions of fire companies, and an everlasting flood of speeches of every kind. We can do nothing without a "Chief Marshal" and "Aids." We need, it would seem, some stiffness, some formality, to make us believe we are having a good time. We cannot put off, as do our German friends, "the old man" of business, of care and anxiety, and be, as it were, children; we seem to have no true love for Nature, for open air and green trees, and the sports and pleasures congenial to such scenes; we cannot unbend as they do, and become children in our enjoyments, but seem to sigh for the deep platoons of a well-ordered procession, guided and governed by blue-ribboned and batoned marshals. There must be some work in all our pleasures, and indeed, compared with the free and natural jollity of these German demonstrations, it seems like the "all work and no play" that makes Jack a dull boy. We can hardly spare the time to play at all, and when we do, it still savors a little of work, or at least reminds us of the solemn gambols of an elephant, so unused are we to the thing, such awkward playfellows have we become from long disuse of the playing powers. We are a solemn people, it is to be feared, and when we are brought together in multitudes, do not know exactly what to do with ourselves, save to listen to an oration. We are not so in our families, among ourselves, with a little circle of friends, but when we all get together, we insensibly stiffen into ranks and fall into line. The Philadelphia Evening Bulletin has some sensible remarks apropos to our subject. After discussing some drawbacks in the German character; it goes on to say:

"They love music, and the music too not only of the home circle but of huge choirs and bands, more than any other nation. Now music is a great harmonizer, and large bodies of people assembled for the cultivation of the art are out of mischief, and likely to be very well behaved. Here then is a great good obtained—the people are gathered into large assemblies away from all private, secret haunts of vice and wickedness; and the very thing that calls them together, unlike the bull-fight, the low theatre, the cock fight and the prize fight, is almost as promotive of harmony as religion. How much nobler a spectacle was that presented at Buffalo the other day, where the German singing societies assembled for an exhibition, than that at Farnborough, where such a crowd of Englishmen, out of even the higher ranks, came together to see the great fight. Every nation must have its excitements; how fortunate are the Germans then, in finding so much of what they want in that way in the maennchor.

But it is something underlying the love of music that brings them together in such large bodies to sing; for we see the same disposition to fraternize on a large scale "cropping out," as the geologists would say, in other directions. They must have their resein in every department of effort or amusement. What pleasanter sight can one see than that picture in the Dusseldorf Gallery in New York, which represents the Dusseldorf Society of artists out together for recreation and artistic materials? What a generous rivalry is fostered, where artists are thus intimately associated, instead of glowering at each other from their opposite attics.

Then there are the Turner vereins. Much is said about their infidelity, but too little about that fidelity they show to so many of the injunctions of nature. Not many of the higher class of Germans reach this country, or if they do, take part in the various social gatherings mentioned; therefore, we do not see the German nature in its highest aspects; yet one who thoughtfully enters a Turner's Hall, cannot but observe much to admire. There is the gymnasium, and the lecture hall, and the garden. Now, this last may be a rude affair, simply a set of rough board seats placed around small trees; and underneath, instead of turf and flowers, there may be only gravel; but when it is considered that the affair is got up mostly by poor mechanics, who love so much to come together nightly and take each other by the hand, that they will draw largely on their scanty resources to pay for the gardened—the place becomes beautiful before you."

But we refer to the chronicle of the doings of the Sængerfest at Buffalo. May we not sometime hope to see this gathering in Boston?

M. R. T. has our thanks for the admirable Maxims of Robert Schumann translated for the "Journal." They have already been twice inserted in our former volumes, or they would find a place at this time. They can hardly however be made too familiar to musical students.

Musical Chit-Chat.

THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB gave a concert at Worcester during the regatta week. We find the following notice of it in the correspondence of the Traveller.

"The 'Harvard Glee Club' gave their much asked-for concert this evening, assisted by the 'Mendelssohn Quintette.' No weather could have been finer than that with which they were favored, the audience corresponded in brilliancy and size—upwards of a thousand people being present. The concert was given in the Mechanics' Hall, which is fully as large as the Tremont Temple, and the size of the hall prevented the 'Quintette,' in their earlier pieces, from being fully appreciated; but as the audience grew more quiet, they got to be well heard, and some of their performances were admirable and elicited great applause. Neither Mr. Schultze nor Mr. Meisel were present, however, Mr. Suck filling the place of the former gentleman very acceptably, and Mr. Coenen that of the latter in the same way. The 'Quintette Club' performed the overture to Stradella, a Scene and Aria from 'Le Pré aux Clercs,' and an Entree Act from "Robert." Mr. Fries also performed his famous solo on the 'Cello,' by Kummer, in which he imitates a banjo so curiously.

The Glee Club were, at first, evidently a little tried by the novelty of their situation, the hall being much larger than any they have been accustomed to, and a decided want of accuracy in time, and tune as well, was observable in the 'Cheerful Wanderer' of Mendelssohn, their first piece. After this, however, they steadily improved and were soon evidently free from embarrassment, acquitting themselves admirably and to the delight of the audience.

Mr. Howland of the Graduating Class sang the 'Penenti Nuni' from the Magic Flute, in superb style, overcoming the serious difficulties of the piece in a way that would have done credit to a veteran solo singer, and the 'Club' were never more successful than in their renderings of the 'Turkish Drinking Song' by Mendelssohn, and of Lenz's "Wanderer's Night Song." They were many times encored, and the enthusiasm which prevailed all through the evening, reached its climax at their rendition of the various College Songs—"Updee," "Integer," "Litoria," and others, all of which were given with the greatest spirit and sweetness."

The New York Christian Inquirer, in its account of the recent inauguration at Cambridge, speaks thus of the music of the day.

"We cannot omit mentioning the admirable character and the delightful effect of the singing by the Glee Club at the Inauguration. It was the only part of the exercises during which many wet eyes were seen, except, perhaps, during the President's tender and exquisite reference to young Wilkinson's character and loss. The Alumni dinner went off famously. Dr. Holmes presided to a charm, and unwittingly described himself under a pretended description of Mr. Winthrop. On the whole, Harvard never saw brighter days than those of the late Commencement week. May the dear old mother live a thousand years, and then another."

The New York correspondent of the N. O. Picayune writes as follows of Frezzolini:

The "Garibaldi Benefit" at the Academy of Music was a success, financially and artistically. The net proceeds amounted to about $1,500, which, considering that "everybody is out of town," is as much as could have reasonably been expected. The performance of the "Lucia," with Frezzolini, Musiani, and Ferri, in the leading parts, was all that could be desired. The great prima donna—"la reine du theatre" was most cordially received, and was called before the curtain at the end of every act. Her conception of the situations and the character of the heart-broken Lucia was thoroughly natural; while her rendering of every emotion was eminently artistic. Nothing could be finer or more satisfactory in action, intonation, costume and general effect. From the moment she enters the blushing garden, fragrant and dewy with "budding love," until she flies from her last scene, shattered and shivered with despair, all our sympathies cluster around that fair and beautiful victim of the love that fate forbids. The role of Lucia is exceedingly simple and very easily understood. It finds a ready interpreter in the hearts of all who have tasted the greatest of all sorrows—the sorrow of an overwhelming, involuntary, uncontrollable love. And who is there that has not, at some period of life, either in the freshness of spring, or the fullness of autumn, confessed himself a believer in that faith, "whose martyrs are the broken heart?"

Frezzolini, by her delicate organization and profound experience, is enabled to give utterance to every shade of sentiment, and to every tone of suffering. As Lucia, she loves with "a love that is more than love;" and her plaintive, prolonged cry for Edgar, so tearful and so tender, is a sound one can never cease to hear. It is like the melodious sigh of a lonely star bewailing the loss of some sister Pleiad. And yet there are ears, and even among our so-called critics, so long and so obtuse that the refined and subtle tones of Frezzolini cannot penetrate them! We commend all such obdurate "organs" to the special treatment of the celebrated aurist, Von Moschzisker. Such deaf and impenetrable critics as these may quite as well write their "musical notices" before the performance as after it, which was certainly the case with one of our leading musical journals, which highly compliments the singing of Mme. Colson, on the Garibaldi night, but who, in consequence of indisposition, did not sing at all! It is a disgrace to journalism, and an insult to the public, that such gross injustice should be permitted.

Did space allow I could say much in praise of Mme. Cortesi's Lucretia; and also of the admirable singing and acting of Musiani and Susini. With two such tenors as Musiani and Ernani, Brignoli will either have to change his terms or his manners. No artist for years, in New York, has feared competition less, or needed it more. He has had his own way in everything; and has become, as the French say, un enfant gâté. Ernani, who is engaged at the Academy for the next season, will be likely to "take the conceit out of him." On being invited to sing for the Garibaldi benefit, "the handsome tenor" refused, on the ground that he "could not compromise his family in Naples."

OHIO STATE MUSICAL CONVENTION.—A State Musical Convention will be held at Ashland, on the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th of August, under the direction of Prof. B. F. Baker of Boston, Dr. Clara W. Beames, of New York, and W. H. Ingersoll of Ohio. The Convention follows immediately on the close of the summer session of the Ohio Normal Academy of Music at Ashland. Every singer in the State is invited, and it is to be hoped that a vast attendance will be secured.

The Normal Academy of Music, Genesee, N. Y., has entered upon its second annual term with the most flattering prospects.

Principals.—T. E. Perkins, Professor of Elemental and Vocal Training. S. J. Cook, Professor of Harmony, Psalmody, and Violinist. J. M. North, Assistant Tutor.

Private Teachers.—C. Bassini, Professor of Composition and Vocal Training. S. N. Pychowski, Professor of Composition, Piano Forte and Organ. T. F. Seward, Professor of Organ and Melodeon.

Suitable buildings for its accommodation will probably be erected ere its third annual term shall commence—in the summer of 1861—so that all the necessary facilities for a thorough and finished musical education will be here enjoyed. The present statistics are as follows:

Prof. Perkins' and Cook's regular class pupils, fifty-five.

Prof. Bassini's private class pupils, forty five.

Prof. Pychowski's private class pupils, thirty.

Evidently Mendelssohn's music does not please every body, as will more fully appear by this notice from a Worcester paper.

"The singing was distinguished for precision and accuracy, and the pieces sung were of the best of the part-songs of Mendelssohn, which are unsurpassed in their way. This author is certainly original, though rather in the manner than in the matter. He seems studied and bears the marks of erasure and interlineation. Mozart, on the other hand, of whose genius there was presented one specimen, is spontaneous, new and perfect in the first conception. His elaboration is merely in details which are necessarily just what they are, and never could have been written otherwise or thought otherwise. The introduction of this divine master must have struck any musical sensibility as a recurrence to first principles after the somewhat labored strangeness of the others. Mozart's music sings and plays itself. It is of little consequence how it is rendered.

The voices were good, some of them excellent, but the manner of singing smacked too much of the baton. The time was too good, and the accent too monotonous. With many points of excellence there was something to criticize."

A friend of ours told us that once, when he was visiting Liszt, a fine gentleman from Boston was announced, and during the conversation the latter spoke with great contempt of Wagner (the new light) and his music. Liszt did not say anything, but went to the open piano and struck with grandeur the opening chords of the Tannhäuser overture; having played it through, he turned and quietly remarked, "The man who doesn't call that good music is a fool." It is the only reply which can be made to those who do not find that quintessence of things which we call Poetry in many passages of this work."—Conway's Dial.

The opera of "Les Rosieres," which the Théâtre Lyrique, in Paris, is going to mount, is unknown to our generation. It was first performed in 1817, and was the first opera by Herold, which had a great success. Its last performance took place in 1826.

Musical Intelligence.

The Sængerfest at Buffalo.

The great meeting of the various German singing clubs of the country took place at Buffalo during the last week. We glean from the papers of that city some accounts of the proceedings of the several days.

Yesterday morning opened the festival week of the North American Sængerbund. As our readers may be aware, this is an association of the German musical societies in the cities of the Northern States. Its principal object consists in the arrangement for a yearly convocation of the members of these societies and any song-union which chooses to attend the annual Fest may become a member of the Bund or confederacy. At present, we believe, twenty-five societies are thus allied. The Sængerfests, of which there have been eleven, the present being the twelfth, are designed, at once to heighten the standard of musical excellence, and to promote general good feeling and brotherhood, among the song-loving sons and daughters of "Vaterland."

St. James Hall is the headquarters of the Sængerbund and is decorated in a manner worthy of the occasion. Beautiful festoons of evergreens hang from the roof and around the gallery appear the names of the twenty-four Societies of the Sængerbund. These are as follows:

Orpheus—Boston.
Concordia—Preston, C. W.
Wyandot Sængerbund—Upper Sandusky, O.
Teutonia—New York.
Mænnerchor—Columbus, O.
Arion—New York.
Teutonia—Alleghany City.
Mænnerchor—West Cleveland.
Harmonia—Detroit.
Liedertafel—Buffalo.
Sængerbund—Toledo.
Mænnerchor—Rochester.
Germania—Dunkirk.
Frohinn—Pittsburg.
Sængerbund—Buffalo.
Eintracht—Newark.
Liedertafel—Akron.
Bruderbund—Tiffin, O.
Liederkrans—New York.
Mozart Quartette Verein—Sandusky.
Mænnerchor—Philadelphia.
Harmonia—Erie.
Liederkrans—Syracuse.
Gesangverein—Cleveland.

THE RECEPTION CONCERT.—This was the main feature of the day's festivities. The custom on these occasions is for the resident musicians to entertain their visitors by giving a Reception Concert, to open the ceremonies. In accordance with this musically hospitable idea, the United Societies of Buffalo gave at St. James's Hall, the first act of Von Weber's "Euryanthe," and Becker's "Gipsies." The Hall was crowded at an early hour, mostly with the visiting societies, among whom were many ladies whose gay dresses added largely to the beauty of the richly decorated hall. When the curtain rose, a charming scene was exhibited. Forty ladies, all in white, occupied the front of the stage, while behind them, rising in tiers, were some 75 gentlemen. The orchestra numbered 35 instruments, making a total of about 150 performers.

The overture to "Euryanthe" was charmingly given, the orchestra being remarkably well-balanced. The music of this opera, new to us, is of the Italian school, though of German authorship, and remarkably rich in pleasing melodies. But nothing ever given in Buffalo equalled the choruses. Some of these were remarkable in themselves as melodies, and they were rendered with a time like a drum beat, no drag, no hurrying, the orchestra and voices harmonizing to perfection, and all blending into one grand whole which realized our highest conception of what a chorus should be.

We have omitted to mention the fact that on the rising of the curtain, Prof. CARL ADAM made a Reception Speech. It was in German, and all we can say for it is that it was gracefully delivered, and from its frequent cheering we may conclude that its sentiments met the approval of the guests of Buffalo.

The first Concert was given in the Exchange Street Depot of the N. Y. Central Railroad, which was gratuitously furnished by the Company at a very considerable sacrifice of convenience. The building is 90 feet in width and 580 in length, and very lofty. Its numerous, yet easily guarded entrances, its coolness and comfort, the fact that the floor was on the level of the ground, and was therefore safe, made it perhaps the best room for such a purpose in the United States.

At the west end of the Depot were seats for the singers, consisting of fourteen ascending tiers, on which were placed more than 600 singers and an orchestra of 65 performers. In the centre of the platform was a dais, occupied by the Director, Prof. CARL ADAM, to whom was confided the mammoth task of governing and controlling the ocean of music which rolled in harmonies down the vast length of the building.

The following was the programme:

PART I.

- Overture to Tannhäuser.....Wagner.
1. Hymn, Chorus with Quartette.....Neithardt.
The Quartette by the Mænnerchor, N. Y.
2. The Eighth Psalm, Chorus with Quartette.....Schnabel.
The Quartette by the Gesangverein of Cleveland.
3. Goethe's last words, "Light, more light," Chorus with Quartette.....List.
The Quartette by the Arion of New York.
4. Pilgrim's Chorus from Tannhäuser, Chorus with Quartette.....Wagner.

PART II.

- Overture to Fidello.
5. God, Fatherland, Love. Hymn. Chorus with Quartette.....Tschirch.
The Quartette by the Teutonia Mænnerchor, N. Y.
6. Ode to the morning, Chorus with Quartette.....Kietz.
The Quartette by the Orpheus of Boston.
7. Hunter's Song, Chorus.....Schumann.
8. The Midnight Revue of Napoleon Bonaparte, Chorus.....Till.

It was supposed that some 8 or 10,000 persons were present. From the dais the scene was magnificent. The distance from the rear was so great that the crowd became an indistinguishable mass. Constant good order prevailed. Among the audience were thousands of ladies, and the only breach in the harmony of the night was a rush through the canvas which closed the east end, which was soon quelled by the active interference of the police under the personal supervision of Mayor ALBERGER, who was very efficient in preserving quiet.

In such a concert, multitude is the great feature. It drowned out every thing else, and noble as was the music, the sight of that grand gathering of humanity was the wonder of the night. We found that two-thirds down the room even the quartets were perfectly heard. At the rear, more more than 500 feet from the singers, these were mostly lost, though the choruses were full and effective even there. * * *

It is something to have seen and heard all this, a good deal more to have done it. All Buffalo is proud of this splendid achievement of our Teutonic cousins, and honors the labor which has been expended upon it. Prof CARL ADAM, who has had the Musical Directorship throughout, has discharged his onerous duties with an intelligent skill which satisfies all interested. His labors have been very severe, but their triumphant termination must repay him for all. On the part of the Local Committee, everything has been done with a system and capacity for generalship worthy of high praise. It was a great task to prepare the concert and to carry it safely through without accident.

THE PRIZE CONCERT.—The Prize Concert was, to the artistic ear, the finest of all the musical entertainments of the week. The competition was for the splendid silver goblet, manufactured by JUNGLING, and recently exhibited at the store of BLODGETT & BRADFORD. Its weight is equal to one hundred dollars, and the ornamentation upon it is of the most exquisite and emblematic character. Only eleven of the Societies competed for it, those of Buffalo being excluded by locality, and many others not caring to test themselves besides such clubs as the Arion, Liederkranz or Orpheus. The audience in attendance was immense, and composed of as many of the elite of Buffalo as could find entrance, hundreds being unable to get in.

The first great excitement was produced by the New York Liederkranz, who were enthusiastically encored. The next piece, the beautiful and stirring "On the Neckar, on the Rhine," by the Teutonia, of Alleghany City, was also charmingly given and warmly encored. Then came the "Vineta," of the New York Arion—magnificently led by CARL ANSCHUTZ. We can hardly say too much of this pleasing yet difficult melody, or of the perfect blending of its harmony. There seemed to be but one soul and one thought in the Arions. The encore which followed was tremendous. They responded only to be called out again, but the second encore was declined.

Closely upon the heels of the Arions came the Orpheus, of Boston. Mr. KREISSMANN, their leader, has one of the purest and richest tenors to which we ever listened. In arranging his club he exhibited some management, packing them in close order, instead of strutting them in line across the stage. He thus secured a more perfect time and more careful harmony. The "Night-song" is a musical gem. The piano passages were given with wonderful delicacy and feeling, but there was a lack in the forte which perhaps lost them the prize. Among the American portion of the audience the Orpheus was perhaps the favorite, though it was conceded to be a close thing with the Arion. The Liederkranz, which received three votes from the committee, was better appreciated by the Germans than the Americans.

The Committee of Judges appointed to award the prize was composed of the following gentlemen: Messrs. SCHUBERT, of New York; MARX, of Detroit; ADAM, FEDERLANDER, BROWN and BLODGETT of Buffalo. The judges were required to decide individually, without consulting each other's opinions, and each present the name of the Society in whose favor he pronounced, written upon a slip of paper, immediately upon the termination of the concert. This was done, and the opinions were announced as follows:

In favor of the Arion Society, New York. .... 4
" " Liederkranz Society, New York. .... 3

The announcement was received with applause and general satisfaction. We are inclined to fully endorse the decision, with a mental vote of thanks to the Orpheus. The strong vote for the Liederkranz is complimentary enough for them. But we should not omit to mention the Gesangverein of Cleveland, which under unfavorable circumstances, made an excellent impression on the audience.

A banquet, ball and pic-nic were among the pleasant features of this monster meeting. The pic-nic seems to have been unique in its character.

The Buffalo Courier says:

Not till then did our German friends begin to show us the gigantic scale upon which they do their merry-making on great occasions. The word "picnic" which with us suggests a quiet little gathering in the woods or fields, in which a few swings furnish the amusement, and a couple of hundred children, at most, the noise, gives no idea of the "doings" at Moffatt's Grove. To us it has nothing short of a national importance. We are not aware that ever before in this country has any nationality asserted itself in so strongly marked a manner as did the German in yesterday's pic-nic. It seemed really after a century in which the restraint of new world manners had been endured. In the exuberant joy of such a meeting, everything of the new world was forgotten, and everything of the old was revived under the maples of Moffatt's Grove, as completely as if the spot had been four thousand miles east of here, somewhere "on the Neckar or the Rhine." Germany—emigrated, modified, Americanized Germany—was its old self again and acted out all its old Teutonic pranks, just as if the Atlantic had never been crossed. We would like any one to show us in the annals of this country, another instance in which such a striking national phenomena has transpired. * *

We despair of giving any just idea of how things looked in the grove. Everybody to whom we spoke agreed that it was a sight to be seen once in a lifetime, and never to be described. The Bluffs, the beautiful little valley, the glades and meadows comprised in the grove, were strewn thick with the multitude. They gathered in groups, each group large enough to fill a large hall, at points where the various societies had made head-quarters, and around, the different dispensaries of lager beer and other good things. Everybody ate and drank and talked all at once, all the while. One or more of the splendid bands made the woods ring again, now on this side, now on that. A gun squad, with the "Lady Washington," added to the din, and at intervals the irrepressible song, with its strong, manly chorus, burst forth from throats that gurgled with that everlasting lager. Flags floated among the trees and in the air; crinolines on the swing, ditto ditto; a myriad of glasses clinked; uncounted pretzels and sandwiches and sausages disappeared; kegs of beer rolled in and beer kegs rolled out, toasts were given and responded to, and thus the Picnic began.

At the height of the festivities there was more demolition of lager, pretzels and rheinwein; more running to and fro in the wildest state of jubilant enthusiasm; more music by the hands; more singing and cheering; more firing; more clinking of glasses; more filling and emptying of lager drinking horns; in short, a grand, sweeping, universal, deluge of good feeling and animal spirits. The New Yorkers, who, according to an aged picnician, whom we overheard "sind der teufel," were foremost in inventing expression for the merriment. They dressed themselves up as mummers, in the most absurd costumes. They had a Japanese troupe with "little Tommy," a prominent character, and in the oddest of processions they marched through the grove to the extraordinary music of cornstalk flutes, making halts everywhere, and performing sundry side-splitting antics, to the infinite delight of the crowd. Others of the societies joined in the mummery; had mock music rehearsals, and wended in absurd state, amid the screaming multitude. For all the world the scene would remind one of Assumption Day in Paris or the Carnival at Rome. "Did you ever see anything like this?" inquired we of a venerable Teuton. "Ach, ja, in Deutschland!" quoth he. Certes, never in America was the match of the Sengerfest Picnic enacted.

And thus, till nearly sundown, the jubilation lasted; all the while, it must be said, without the first manifestation of anything but the broadest, kindest good feeling on the part of the Germans. The only attempt at a quarrel or threatening of a fight which we saw, originated among individuals speaking another tongue than the guttural Teutonic. Gradually, as we said before, the stream of vehicles turned city-wards, and the army of revellers, exhausted, but cheery and good-natured, went home. Surely the Picnic will forever live in their memories, as of all their lives,—

"The maddest, merriest day."
In the evening there was a grand ball at St. James Hall.

Yesterday the crowd went down to Niagara Falls, on an excursion.

Last evening a large number of the singers, including members of the Rochester, Syracuse and New York Societies, came down from the Falls on the 8.30 train. Some of the strangers stopped over, while others went on. More were expected down on the 12.50 train. The great Sengerfest of 1860 is ended.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Slightly glide the gentle Zephyrs. Song. A. Bell. 25

A very pleasing little Song suitable for young amateurs.

Uncle Watty and Aunt Matty. Scotch Song. John Wilson. 25

A quaint, charming ballad which will give much pleasure to that large class of musical persons who hold the vocal gems of Caledonia in high esteem.

Great talkers do the least. N. J. Spörle. 25

Don't come teasing me, Sir. J. L. Hatton. 25

Two capital Songs. For the last one we predict a great popularity with the ladies.

O cor amoris victima. Lambillotte. 75

From this author's celebrated collection of original occasional pieces for the use of churches in Catholic churches, entitled the "Saluta." As far as it is known, this composition has been a great favorite with the singers. It should be added by every Catholic Organist or Choir-leader to his library.

I would not to earth recall thee. F. Romer. 25

A pretty, sentimental ballad, well written and effective.

Instrumental Music.

Fountain Schottisch. J. B. Holmberg. 25

May Flower Polka. F. von Olker. 25

Snow Flake Schottisch. M. T. Summers. 25

Fair Dell Waltz. C. Meininger. 25

Apollo Polka. A. G. Pickens. 25

Marie Polka Mazurka. A. Cooke. 35

New Dance Music for the Drawing-room, of a pleasing and agreeable character.

Les Dames de Seville Waltzes. Four Hands. C. Schubert. 75

These Waltzes, long known in a solo-arrangement as one of the most taking sets, make a capital duet of very moderate difficulty.

Polonaise from Op. 42. Four hands. Beethoven. 40

A good teaching piece, as which it is known to most teachers. It is very pretty and taking, and not difficult.

Thrush Polka. H. Eikmeier. 25

Chiquito Polka. A. F. Little. 25

Pretty dance music, not difficult.

THE MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE ORGAN. A New, Progressive and Practical Method. In Three Parts. By John Zundel. 3.00

Mr. Zundel's long experience not only as an Organist but as a successful teacher is a sufficient guarantee of the excellence of this work and of its great utility. A slight examination even of its pages will convince any one of its rare adaptation to the wants of beginners, as also to advanced players. It embodies in plain language a great fund of practical information on points in organ playing of the utmost importance to all who would become thoroughly conversant with the capabilities of the instrument, but which are seldom so thoroughly treated and so masterly explained. This "Modern School" must become the Standard Method of Organ Study.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

The Diarist Abroad

UTILE ET DULCE.

On Monday—what was the date?—June 4th, I fell into a fit, and, though some weeks have passed, am hardly over it yet, to relieve your anxiety, a fit of enthusiasm. The great grandfather of Joseph Miller of facetious memory, once made a joke upon fit—nihil fit. I spare the infliction, for antiquated puns are nothing fit for a serious communication. As to the fit of enthusiasm, the way of it was this.

On that day I journeyed some hundred and forty English miles by railroad to Gratz, the capital of Steyermark or Styria. I had business, but such as cannot travel for pleasure, must get pleasure when they travel—must get the dulce when in pursuit of the utile. A good principle is this and one to be acted upon; so as I was to go to Gratz, I awaited a bright, beautiful morning, which promised a glorious day. The morning proved to be a thoroughly German one in this—it made its promise only to break it. You know the point of honor with us is truth—in Germany 'cuteness'. A German coolly tells you to your face, "that is not true—you are lying," and only smiles if you tell him so. But call him a "stupid boy!" (Dumme Junge!) and blood only can wipe out the insult—as if God had not made each man brilliant or stupid, while it depends upon each man himself to be above the cowardice of lying! I., now professor in an American college, can tell you how when ten years ago, my face flushed up and my eyes sparkled with anger at being coolly told by the student Hendschel that I was lying—the latter turned to him all surprised with the enquiry, what T. was so excited about! So the morning promised everything fair, and two officials of the railroad of whom I enquired, assured me that the car in which I had taken my seat went through to Gratz.

We ran along the beautiful plain, with the fine range of hills—outposts of the Styrian Alps on the right—past Mödling, and Baden, and Wiener Neustadt and many another pleasant village and small city, until the hills and mountains began to appear upon the other side, and finally close in upon us. And so we came to Glocknitz, where the word of the officials and the promise of the morning proved equally truthful, for the car went no farther, and I must leave my seat and find another as I could, in the midst of a dense rain; so I was forced into a crowded car, where pipes and cigars vied with the locomotive in defiling the sweet air. Hence, during our progress as far as the next station, I must confess that I did not feel at peace with all mankind. What use had my early appearance at the station been to me, in getting a seat by the window, on the left side of the car, that I might really see, what I went out for to see? But here, in the deep and ever narrowing valley, I began to forget my little annoyances, for from this point, Puthenbach or some such name, the pass of the Semmering may be said to begin. During the halt of the train I looked at the mountain across the valley, and wondered, whether that way, which passed along and up its side, with here and there a small house, and with the American telegraph accompanying it—whether that, rising upward at such an angle, and leading in nearly the opposite direction to that in which we had been moving—could by any possibility be a railroad whereon our train was to run! I could hardly believe it. Nothing hitherto in my experience warranted the supposition. We move onward again with slow but steady pace. The valley becomes narrower. We turn to the left, pass a lofty bridge, and our Behemoth moves up the ascent. In fifteen minutes I am looking down across the opening in the mountains upon Puthenbach far below. On and on, up and up, Behemoth gathering strength and laughing at his labor. On and on, up and up, Behemoth rushing over bridges and viaducts, and through tunnels, playing bo-peep with the mountain-peaks, which now hood themselves in mantles of mist and rain, and now rise in bald, bare, rugged pinnacles of rock, with here and there patches of evergreen, like the scattered locks on the head of old Time. Quick! during the moment, while we are passing the head of this mountain gorge, look away down a thousand feet below, upon that sweet little scene, now for the moment enlivened by a ray of the sun; upon the two rows of white cottages; the fields and gardens of deepest green; the road, dressed with limestone, and bordered with poplars, like a broad silver ribbon, edged with emeralds; the people reduced to pigmies. Behemoth sees them also, and, startling them with a shriek, plunges out of sight into a tunnel, whence he emerges with a "chah! ha! ha! ha!"—as the manner of the behemoths is.

No; I have not only never seen anything like this in railroad traveling, but nothing which gave me in my wildest dreams the conception of such a specimen of engineering.

And so we come to the station Semmering, where Behemoth stops to rest after his ascent of some two thousand feet from the plains below.

Again we wind along, pass through a tunnel, five minutes in the darkness, and then descend into the valley of the Murr, which opens into that of the Murr, the road running along the banks of those streams, giving us all the way scenery which, says red-bound John Murray "is most varied and charming, very picturesque and in places varied by old castles, churches and villages." Inclusive of the delays at the stations, a good half hour at the dining place, it is a ride of about nine hours—nine hours as full of enjoyment (had one only a companion of the right sort) as travelling can easily give. Here comes in a laugh, if you are disposed; for a very large, perhaps the greatest proportion of our countrymen, who leave Vienna for Italy via Trieste, leave in the evening train, crossing the pass of the Semmering in the darkness!

When the train at length emerged from the mountains, and leaped out upon the plain, Gratz, bathed in sunlight, for we had left the rain-clouds behind, lay smiling and beautiful before us. But where to select our lodging? I was advised to go to the "Kaiserkrone," unless inclined to choose one of the more fashionable hotels, and thither upon leaving the omnibus at the market, I bent my steps. The impression made upon me by the inn, in a narrow street, and with the great passage and court lumbered with vehicles, was not the best; but the good, well-furnished room to which I was taken improved matters, and on going down into the neat, clean, fresh dining-room, there was a sight, which at once removed all doubt.

You must know that just at this time some sort of a religious merry making was coming off in Gratz, and among my fellow passengers, were divers parish priests, steady old goers, with broad hats and shiny boots drawn over their trowsers. Five of these venerable fathers sat at a long table in the corner drinking beer, taking snuff, calling each other "Du," chatting, laughing, and having a jolly time generally. This sight I held to be positive prima facie evidence of six several facts, to wit; viz:

First, the house was a respectable one.

Item 2, That it sold good beer.

" 3, That it sold good wine

" 4, That the food and cookery would prove good.

" 5, That the beds would be good, and

" 6, That the bills would be moderate.

Whereupon a feeling of great satisfaction arose in the breast of the mild individual, who had thus ratiocinated—which is a more high sounding word than reasoned—and therefore (?) to be used by all newspaper correspondents.

From the banks of the river Murr, two or three miles from the last of the mountain ranges, rises abruptly a huge mass of rock, more than seventy fathoms high say the books, and, judging from the time occupied in walking around it, extending perhaps an eighth of a mile along the water. At its foot and around it lies Gratz, with its five thousand to six thousand inhabitants.

After supper I ascended it. Time was when it was a strong fortification. It is now a pleasure ground of the Gratzers. Beautiful shady walks lead up its various sides, and a place for refreshment is to be found on its broad top. What enjoyment in the mere luxury of looking! The city below, with quaint old church towers, completely surrounding this, the Schlossberg; the beautiful plain and exquisitely swelling slopes of the hills, dotted all over with villas, cottages, farm houses and villages, as in an American view; the river winding down from the mountains and passing with a rushing sound through the city, and under the four bridges, two of them, like malefactors in old times, hung in chains; in the distance, range after range of hills, one behind another, until the view ends with the snowy peaks of the Styrian Alps. Those with whom I had previously conversed had given me no conception of the beauty of the situation of Gratz, and the delight it afforded was all the greater in that it was not anticipated. No wonder that so large a number of pensioned generals and others, grown old in the military and civil services, should come here to spend their last years and their pensions!

I can but allude to the kindness with which I was received and treated during my few days stay, by the gentleman to whom I applied for aid in my researches; especially by that noble hearted man, whose right arm, thirty-three years ago, sustained the head of the dying Beethoven. What beautiful walks we took in the suburbs: what touching and pleasant reminiscences were related; and what quiet hours were those, when the whole family, even to the dear little grandchildren, sat in a humble "guesthouse" garden, enjoying nice coffee, fresh milk, and the light, pure, cool wines of the country. And the stranger was received as an old friend, and almost made to pledge his word again to visit them. Alas, and alack-a-day! will it ever be possible? Can the utile of another journey thither pay the expenses of the dulce?

Richard Wagner.

(Translated from the French of Louis Lacombe by ANNA M. H. BREWSTER.)

Men of superior talent awaken lively sympathies and arouse profound antipathies. They are praised, hissed, applauded and hooted at. Enthusiasm and detraction walk beside them, fondling and whipping them by turns. While hope is showing them a future, and they are earnestly asking to give a living form to some new conception, quick-footed hatred entangles them, and they hear behind them the biting and harsh laugh of bitter sarcasm. Those of whom we speak however, do not allow themselves to be hindered by this vain noise. Conscience says—Go forth, and they go, without disturbing themselves about praise or blame, knowing very well, that death alone can consecrate them kings.

In the midst of their struggles and sufferings, they feel within them a strange strength, a firm faith. They listen attentively to a secret voice which says to them, "All rules have not been made known; all thoughts have not been spoken. Write, paint, sing; strike out light from your own forehead, flame from your own heart; posterity shall gather that light and that flame, and while doing you justice will bless you."

The true poet obeys this divine voice joyfully, and is happy in yielding himself to the chaste caprice of the muse when she comes smiling with love to kiss his brow. But why must he quit heaven for earth; give up his dream to reality; confide to the crowd his most hidden thoughts, his dearest feelings? Why must he see others crush the beautiful lily that he looked upon as immortal and immaculate?

Why? Because, it is from the bosom of the worker, from the heart of the "laborer of thought," to use a beautiful expression of Victor Hugo, that the spring from which numerous generations shall drink, ought to flow, and no one has a right to let this spring dry up, or make use of it only for selfish satisfaction or purely personal profit.

Each being, each thing does a useful work in its own place. The flower gives its juice or fragrance, the sun its rays; the earth its shades; the sea lends its waves to different races, who visit each other to-day and to-morrow fraternize. The night sparkles with stars—those old guides of the traveller, placed in space by the hand of God. Humanity in fine mounts up to the Supreme Being, and the laborious hand of the thinker writes the history of the soul.

Man has a sacred duty to perform; and this consists in drawing from his intellectual or moral being, all that it can produce for the benefit of the present and the future. This difficult task may appear pleasant to some; and so it would be if the sculptor, the painter, the poet, and the musician above all, had only the ordinarily correct instincts of the people to deal with. But in civilized countries we find a battalion of critics, between the creator of a work and the public, who are not always disposed to receive innovators favorably.

Although like Voltaire they ask for the new, n'en fit il plus au monde, great care must be taken in presenting the new to them. Real individualities startle them, and the first impulse is to repulse them. We are from wishing to speak ill of our brethren of the press. Many among them have judgment, knowledge, sprightliness, grace, cleverness, wit, tact and loyalty. But how does it happen that once in a while they mingle with these noble and gracious qualities, partizanship, personal interest and malevolence? Do not prejudices, systems, comradeship, blind proselytism, and thoughtless enthusiasm by some chance play an important part in the contradictory judgments which come to us daily from the four cardinal points of journalism?

Regarding the works of others through our own lorgnette, without reflecting that passions and habit often take upon themselves the ordering of the glasses, each one of us is disposed to make of his own theories, or his own sensations an infallible and absolute law, by which the beautiful is to be judged. From this cause come those unheard of decisions, pitiless attacks against genius, incredible flatteries addressed to nonentities, whom their bad taste or partizanship would wish to elevate to the grandeur of colossals of art, and of whom time, which puts every thing in its proper place, makes ruins, or more properly speaking, rubbish—for ruins often possess majesty.

Notwithstanding this injustice, and these errors towards the living, whom he is called to judge, the critic exercises a considerable influence over the crowd, and it is not a rare thing to see really honest persons denying their impressions of the preceding evening, after having read their next morning's feuilleton. If the feuilletonist is one of reputation and authority, if he has really talent and cleverness he will certainly gain his cause, or that which he pleads, without the reader even perceiving that a change had been wrought in his opinions.

The public can only be guided by its instincts in its appreciation of Art, as all Art questions exact a special knowledge to be comprehended. Prove by A + B that the pleasure or weariness felt at seeing a certain play, looking at any one particular picture, or hearing an opera is all wrong and in bad taste, and we would wager much that the proof would be accepted immediately. The press has then in its hands a strength which it can for a little while at least make fatal to writers, artists and the public, by depreciating the beautiful and applauding the bad.

The instant a great genius appears for example, all the theories of the past are aimed against it, to prove that it ought to have presented itself in a well known way, that is to say that it should have renounced precisely that which constitutes its individuality. This individuality once established, they are eager to discuss it or to deny entirely its worth. To prove this we need not go back to Corneille, to whom were preferred, we know not how many tragic winters, famous in that day but now forgotten; nor to Racine, who according to Madame de Sevigné was to go out of fashion with coffee; to Molière so unworthily persecuted; to poor Rousseau; to Gluck, whose inspired songs did not possess sufficient melody; nor to Spontini who owed his Parisian applause to powerful protection; for we are able to cite striking examples of the unjust war the critics of our day have made against the most distinguished men.

Augustin Thierry wrote against Rossini's "Barber of Seville," an article, which out of respect to his memory we will refrain from quoting. The chief of our present literature, was for a long while a butt for the most violent attacks, and it was by fisticuffs that Ernani was judged in the parquette of the French Comedy. Ary Scheffer, Ingres, and Eugene Delacroix had to submit to criticisms which curiously resembled resentments. During twenty years Berlioz has been unacknowledged. Now Richard Wagner is rejected. Each one his turn.

Wagner was born at Leipzig, 22d May, 1813. Like Weber, this chief of the cotemporary German school, received an excellent education. We do not know who was his teacher of composition, but we do know that he made his first appearance as composer, at the age of nineteen, in a symphony written in 1832, while he was engaged in his philosophical studies at the University. This symphony which was an imitation of the first style of Beethoven, was performed by the Philharmonic Society at Leipzig, and obtained a flattering success for a debutant. Nevertheless that was not the vocation of the young master. He felt it, and the following year he wrote an opera called "The Fairies." In 1835 he composed and brought out the "Novice of Palermo."

The subject of the first opera, "The Fairies," was taken from a tale of Gozzi: the second was from Shakspeare's "Measure for Measure."—Wagner displayed in these two works, of which he was the author of both poetry and music, undeniable proofs of his double gifts as poet and musician. But in Germany as elsewhere one can go right straight into the alms-house with this double talent. However it is necessary to make a living. Richard Wagner accepted the place of leader of the orchestra at Magdebourg, where he remained from 1834 to 1836, when he repaired to Königsberg, where he filled the same office. In this last city, he married the principal actress of the theatre, and then went to Riga; tired of beating time, and wishing to put into execution his vast projects, he resigned his office and came to seek his fortune at Paris. For is not Paris the beloved dream of all who have faith in themselves, and believe in a future of fame? Fortified with a letter of recommendation from Meyerbeer to Maurice Schlesinger, Richard Wagner obtained from this celebrated editor,—imagine what? The favor of arranging movements from favorite operas for the cornet & piston! It was enough to make him lose his senses.

After having put the future prophet to such a rude use, Mr. Schlesinger, an excellent man at bottom, and who had the rare merit of coming promptly to the aid of his compatriots, open to the poet philosopher the columns of the Gazette et Revue Musicale, of which he was then director. Wagner profited by it. He prepared several articles, among which were particularly noticed those entitled "A Visit to Beethoven," and an "Analysis of the Operas of Weber." Consecrating his days to the critic's pen, the courageous artist devoted his nights to his "Rienzi," a lyric opera in five acts, which he completed in the midst of the terrible anguish which inevitably assails the poor men who dare to sacrifice the interests of material life to the act of bringing into being an idea.

"Rienzi" was accepted at the Dresden Royal Theatre, thanks to the warm interest of Madame Schröder-Devrient, the admirable tragic singer, of whose friendly influence Wagner was still ignorant when he set out for the capital of Saxony to direct in person the rehearsals and performance of his opera. The success was immense, brilliant, unheard of. The enthusiastic king offered to Wagner the place of first chapel master, just made vacant by the death of Morlachi, Wagner recalling probably with terror his arrangements for the cornet à piston, accepted the brilliant propositions which were made to him. Henceforth without anxiety for his future support, he thought only of pursuing his labors.

In 1845 he finished his Tannhäuser, which was immediately put into the hands of the musicians for study. Every one looked for a triumph, but the universal expectation was disappointed. Tannhäuser now so popular beyond the Rhine, was received with a marked coldness. An entire week passed between the first and second representations. What a torment for the author! In order to comprehend the grievous anxiety which he endured during the eight long days of this interminable week, we should read the species of manifesto which precedes the text of the "Flying Dutchman" "Tannhäuser" and "Lohengrin."

Lohengrin was finished in 1847, but it was not brought out until some time after, it appears, because the author was obliged to seek a refuge in Switzerland, after the events of 1849; and up to the present time he has never been present at any of the representations of this opera. Sad and curious fate! To know that his work was applauded, triumphant and not be able to hear it! It is like having beautiful children that we love, near us, and being deprived of their sweet caresses! What a cruel ordeal!

Richard Wagner not being able to return to Germany, returned to Zurich, where he lived in absolute solitude, meditating in the heart of that rich Alpine nature, working in the presence of these almost inaccessible mountains, where the eagle finds a retreat, and the poet his inspirations.

We have never read the literary and æsthetic essays, nor the history of the opera and drama which he published in 1850 and 1851. Their appearance raised up new tempests, and was the signal of a fierce battle between the reformers of art and their opponents.

He composed in 1853, the poem of the Nibelungen, a trilogy preceded by a prologue. The composition of this work which is not yet completed, was interrupted by a journey to London, whither he went in 1855, to direct the concerts of the Ancient Philharmonic Society. At last in 1857, he finished the poem of "Tristan and Isolde," the score of which is not yet completed.

The doctrines of Richard Wagner are but vaguely known in France. Truly it is difficult enough to render an account of them without having read his books. But a great many persons do not think this preparation necessary, and they strike first leaving the reason to come after.

Amongst us a witty saying goes faster in a dozen hours than an idea in ten years, and we meet every where, in the drawing-room and in the streets, this amiable gay coquettish young assassin, clever, mocking, fascinating, which is called a hit. Always clad in the last fashion, it is received with a smile, sent off with a laugh, and it is found charmingly useful in the highest degree, in flooring a new comer if not killing him.

The phrase or hit, consecrated to Mr. Wagner "Music of the Future," crossed the Rhine sometime ago. It has become the order of the day, enjoys a considerable credit, and all nervous composers large and small propagate it to the best of their ability, repeating it in the loudest and most intelligible voice, something like the Marquis in Molière's "Critique de l'École des Femmes," repeats his famous Tarte à la crème.

"Dorante.—'Well! what do you wish to say? Cream tart!'

"Marquis.—'Zounds! Cream tart! my lord.'

"Dorante.—'But what else?'

"Marquis.—'Cream tart!'

"Dorante.—'Tell us some of your reasons.'

"Marquis.—'Cream tart!'

"Uranie.—'But the thought ought to be explained it seems to me.'

"Marquis.—'Cream tart, madam.'

"Uranie.—'What do you fault with in it?'

"Marquis.—'I? Nothing. Cream tart.'"

In fact "Cream tart" is powerful, and the phrase "Music of the Future" has also merit; the one who made this "hit" should have supped with a good appetite on the day that the thought came to him. "Music of the Future" replies to every thing, like Harpagon's "sans dot."

We shall not explain in detail the origin of this phrase. We shall only say that it signified in the eyes of the inventor "incompréhensible music," but to the partisans of Wagner, who accepted it in ridicule of their adversaries, it reads "Music of which you are not a competent judge."

The Representative Art.

The stage, indeed, in its various forms, seems more fully to manifest and illustrate the artistic influence among Americans than any other art. It often addresses those whom more refined solicitations might never reach. Those who would turn from Church's or Page's pictures with indifference are frequently attracted by the representations in a theatre. The pictures there are more alive, more real, more intense, and fascinate many unable to appreciate the recondite charms of the canvas. The grace of attitude, the splendid expression, the intellectual art of Ristori or Rachel may impress those who fail to discover the same merits in colder stone, in Crawford's marble or the statues of Palmer; and they may sometimes learn to relish even the delicate beauties of Shakespeare's text, from hearing it fitly declaimed, who would never spell out its meaning by themselves.

The drama is certainly superior to other arts while its reign lasts, because of its verities, its actuality. He must be dull of imagination, indeed, who cannot give himself up for a while to its illusions; he must be stupid who cannot open his senses to its delights or waken his intellect to receive its influences.

Neither can a taste for the stage be declared one which only the ignorant or vulgar share. Though away in the wilds of California a theatre was often erected next after a hotel, the second building in a town, and the strolling player would summon the miners by his trumpet when not one was in sight, and instantly a swarm peeped forth from the earth, like the armed men who sprang from the furrows that Cadmus ploughed,—though the wildest and rudest of Western cities and the wildest and rudest inhabitants of Western towns are quick to acknowledge the charms of the stage,—yet also the most highly cultured and the most intellectual Americans pay the same tribute to this art. We have all seen, within a few years, one of the most profound scholars and most prominent divines in the country proclaiming his approbation of the drama. We may find, to-day in any Eastern city, members of the liberal clergy at an opera, and sometimes at a play. The scholars and writers and artists and thinkers, as well as the people of leisure and of fashion, frequent places of amusement, not only for amusement, but to cultivate their tastes, to exercise their intellects, ay, and oftentimes to refine their hearts. The splendid homage paid in England not long ago to the drama, when the highest nobility and the first statesmen in the land were present at a banquet in honor of Charles Keen, is evidence enough that no puerile or uncultivated taste is this which relishes the theatre. Goethe presiding over the playhouse at Weimar, Euripides and Sophocles writing tragedies, the greatest genius of the English language acting in his own productions at the Globe Theatre, people like Siddons and Keen and Cushman and Macready illustrating this art with the resources of their fine intellects and great attainments,—surely these need scarcely be mentioned, to relieve the drama from the reproach that some would put upon it, of puerility.

New York is, perhaps, more of a representative city than any other in the land. It is an aggregation from all the other portions of the country; it is the result, the precipitate, of the whole. It has no distinctive, individual character of its own; it is a condensation of all the rest, a focus. Thither all the country goes at times. Restless, fitful, changing, yet still the same in its change; like the waves of the sea, that toss and roll and move away, and still the mighty mass is ever there. New York, in its various phases and developments, its crowded and cosmopolitan population, its out-door kaleidoscopic splendor, is indeed a representative of the entire country. It has not the purely literary life of Boston, nor so distinctly an intellectual character; it is not so stamped by the impress of older times as Philadelphia; but it has an outside garb significant of the inward nature. It is like the face of a great actor, splendid in expression, full of character, changing with a thousand changing emotions, but betraying a great soul beneath them all. New York is artistic just as America is artistic, just as the age is artistic: not, perhaps, in the loftiest or most refined sense, but in the sense that art is an expression, in tangible form, of ideas. New York is a great thought uttered. It is like those fruits or seeds which germinate by turning themselves inside out; the soul is on the outside, crusted all over it, but none the less soul for all that.

And New York illustrates this idea of the drama being the representative art of to-day. The theatre there, including the opera, is a great established fact,—as important nearly as it was in the palmiest days of the Athenian republic, or on the road to be of as much consequence as it is in Paris, the representative city of the world. Fifty thousand people nightly crowd twenty different theatres in New York. From the splendid halls where Grisi and Gazzaniga and La Borde and La Grange have by turns translated into sound the ideas of Meyerbeer and Bellini and Donizetti and Mozart to the little rooms where six-penny tickets procure lager-beer as well as music for the purchaser, the drama is worshipped. And this not only by New Yorkers: not only do those who lead the busy, excited life of the metropolis acquire a taste, as some might say, for a factitious excitement, but all strangers hasten to the theatres. The sober farmer, the citizens from plodding interior towns, the gay Southerners, accustomed almost exclusively to social amusements, the denizens of rival Bostons and Philadelphias, all frequent the opera and playhouses of New York. When the richer portion of its inhabitants have left the hot and sultry town, or, in mid-winter, are immersed in the more exclusive pleasures of fashionable life, even then the theatres are thronged; and in September or October you shall find all parts of the country represented in their boxes and parquets—proving that this is not an exclusively metropolitan taste, that it is shared by the whole nation, that in this also New York is truly representative.

Boston typifies a peculiar phase of American life; it is the illustration, the exponent, of the cultivated side of our nationality; its thought, its action, its character are taken abroad as symbols of the national thought and action and character, in whatever relates to literature or art. The Professor said truly, Boston does really in some sort stand for the brain of America. Well the brain of America appreciates the stage. It is but a few months since the culture and distinction of Boston nightly crowded a small and inferior theatre, to witness the personations of the young genius who is destined at no distant day to rival the proudest names of the drama. The most brilliant successes Edwin Booth has yet achieved have been achieved in Boston; scholars and wits and poets and professors crowd the boxes when he plays; women of talent write poems in his praise and publish them in the "Atlantic Monthly"; professors of Harvard College send him congratulatory letters; artists paint and carve his intellectual beauty; and fashion follows in the wake of intellect, alike acknowledging his merits. Boston recognized those merits, too, when they were first presented to its appreciation; and now that they verge nearer upon maturity, her appreciation is quickened and her applause redoubled. It cannot be said that the taste or culture of the nation is indifferent to histrionic excellence, when absolute excellence is found.

No other art is yet on such a footing among us. Neither is this because of our partially developed civilization. It is equally so abroad; where the nations are oldest and best established in culture, there, too, a similar state of things exists. No school in painting, no style of sculpture, no kind of architecture has made such an impression on the age as its music, as its dramatic music, its opera. This speaks to all nations, in all languages. No writer, though he write like Tennyson, or Longfellow, or Lamartine, or Duvivier, can hope for such an audience as Verdi or Meyerbeer. No orator speaks to such crowds as Rossini; no Everett or Kossuth, or Gavazzi or Spurgeon, has so many listeners as Donizetti. For the stage is the art of to-day,—perhaps more especially, but still not exclusively, the operatic stage; the theatre in its various forms represents the feeling of the time so as Grecian and Gothic architecture and Italian painting have in their time done for their time,—so as no pictures, no architecture, no statuary can now do. Painting and statuary, when they do anything towards representing this age, incarnate the dramatic spirit; the literature that has most influence to-day is journalism,—the effective, present, actual, short-lived, dramatic newspaper, where all the actors speak for themselves: other literature has its listeners but it lags behind; other art has its appreciators, but it cannot keep pace with the march of armies, with the rush to California, with the swarm to Australia; there is no art on these outskirts but the dramatic. That travels with the advancing mass in every exodus; that went with Dr. Kane to the North Pole (he had private theatricals aboard the Resolute); that alone gave utterance immediately to the latest cry of humanity in the Italian War.

Neither can it be said that the theatre has no more consequence now than it has always enjoyed. At the time when Gothic architects and Italian painters expressed the meaning of their own ages, there was nothing like a real drama in existence, and the Roman theatre was never comparable with ours. The Greeks, indeed, had a stage which was an important element of their civilization, and which took the character of their time, giving and receiving influence; but their stage was essentially different from that of the moderns. Its success does not depend upon the individual performer; its pageantry was perhaps as splendid as what we now see; but the play of the countenance, that great intellectual opportunity offered an actor by our drama, was not known. In this see also a characteristic of the present age. Individuality is a distinctive peculiarity of the nineteenth century; it has been for centuries gradually becoming more possible; but every man now works his own way, acts himself more completely than ever before. Therefore appropriate is it that the drama should give importance to the individual, and allow a great actor to incarnate and illustrate in his own form and face feelings and passions that formerly were only hinted at; for remember that the Greek players usually wore masks, while there amphitheatres were so large that in any event the expression of the features was lost.

With this individuality, this opportunity for each to develop his own identity and intensity, the nineteenth century strangely combines another peculiarity, that of association. All these units, these atoms, so marvellously distinct, are incorporated into one grand whole; though each be more, by and of himself, than ever before, yet the great power, the great motor, is the mass. The mass is made powerful by the aided importance given to each individual. And you may trace without conceit a state of things behind the scenes very similar to this in front of the footlights. In the theatre, also, the many works contribute to a grand result. The manager would be as powerless in his little empire, without important assistants, as a monarch without ministers and people. What makes the French army and the American so irresistible is the thought that each private is more than a machine, is an intellectual being, understands what his general wants, fights with his bayonet at Solferino or his musket at Monterey on his own account, yet subject to the same control. And the theatre, with all its actors and scene-painters and costumers and carpenters and musicians, is only an army on a different scale. The forces of the stage answer to the generals and colonels, the marshals and privates, all marching and working and fighting for the same end. Those splendid dramatic triumphs of Charles Kean were only illustrations of the readiness of the stage to adapt itself to the times, to seize hold of whatever is suggested by the outside world, to appropriate the discoveries of Lavoisier and the revelations of Science to its own uses,—illustrations, too, of the importance of the individual Kean, as well as of the crowd of clever subordinates.

That the theatre feels this reflex influence, that it appreciates all that is going on around it, that it is not asleep, that it is penetrated with the spirit of the century, whether that spirit be good or evil, the selection of plays now popular is another proof. In France, where the success of the histrionic art now culminates, a contemporaneous drama is now flourishing, the absolute society of the day is represented. That society has faults, and the stage mirrors them. "La Dame aux Camélias," "Les Filles de Marbre," "Le Demi-Monde" reflect exactly the peculiarities of the life they aim to imitate. And these very plays, whose influence is so often condemned, would never have had the popularity they have attained in nearly every city of the civilized world, had there not been Marguerite Gautiers and Traviatas outside of Paris as well as in it. Another attempt, perhaps not an entirely successful one, but still a significant attempt, has been made in this country to produce a contemporaneous drama. "Jessie Brown" and "The Poor of New York," and other plays directly daguerreotyping ordinary incidents, at any rate show that the drama is an art that responds instantly to the pulses of the time.

But it is not necessary for the stage to daguerreotype; it mirrors more truly when it embodies the spirit. And never before was there an age whose spirit was more theatrical, in the best sense of the term; full of outside expression, but also full of inside feeling; working, accomplishing, putting into actual form its ideas; incarnating its passions; intellectual, yet passionate; lofty in imagination, yet practical in exemplification; showy, but significantly showy, theatrical. An art, then, that is all this, surely expresses as no other art does or can the character of the nineteenth century,—surely is the representative art.

The Lyric Drama.

(From Boston Musical Times.)

The difference of opinion pretty freely expressed regarding the merits and demerits of some of the prime donne, who have lately visited us, has suggested an inquiry as to what constitutes a first class artist, and what an opera really is. Some few are content with a performance which is purely musical, which gives evidence of musical culture and refinement alone; and they care but little whether this be accompanied with dramatic force or intelligence. Others insist that the dramatic spirit is the prominent point to be presented, and that the music is only the medium through which the spirit is made manifest. First music and then action, say the former. First action and then music, say the latter. The truth is, that the musical and dramatic requirements are both so imperative that no one is really a great artist, who is wanting in either. An opera is a drama sung instead of spoken, and if the spirit of the scene be not maintained in both the action which the words imply and in the words which the action accompanies, there results an incompleteness, an imperfectness, which does not satisfy the auditor. If the music only be thought of we can say this is a fine vocalist; if the action alone be well done, we can say this is a fine actor; but in neither case can we apply the name of finished lyric artist, where the performer is but half fitted to that position. No two people have precisely the same taste to gratify. Those specially affected by music, and music alone, are naturally careless of the qualifications which go to make a perfect performance. They do not think or care whether the musical exhibition is accompanied by power and vitalized thought. They watch the school the method, the style of musical utterance, and are satisfied if these evince study and elegance. In fact, they look upon the dramatic element as something rather below the artist, and as the peculiarity of those who cannot sing. Others consider the music as the uttered expressions of the emotions of the character represented, and do not think that character well portrayed or assumed if the sentiments appropriate to the scene be not conveyed more or less truthfully by the performer. And between the two extremes of these various opinions floats the public appreciation of the performance.

Our own impression is that an opera is a drama sung. The words are written to convey the sentiments of the characters; the music is written to express the words, and the performance of that music is successful in proportion to the truthfulness, the faithfulness with which those emotions are conveyed. A person may sing divinely, without embodying in the least the spirit of the character assumed. This may be very good vocalization, but it is not lyric drama. An apothetic or an unintelligent manner is not confined to physical gesture; it pervades the whole performance. Performers may from time to time lash themselves into a superficial passion, may rush to the footlights at the close of a scene with uplifted arms, may drop their heads on some neighboring shoulder at intervals; but this may all be without the slightest real assumption of character or conscientious fidelity to its import. The argumentum ad hominem is the best, and we can cite instances to exemplify our position. Mme. Laborde sang sweetly. It was a joy to sit and drink in the sweetness of her fluent warbling. But it was all but painful to witness the inefficiency of her dramatic efforts. Brignoli sings elegantly and gracefully; but he has not the slightest idea of the portraiture of a character, and enacts prince and peasant in the same stereotyped way. Gazzaniga, who is not to be named in the same day with Laborde as a vocalist, is so powerfully dramatic as to thrill her hearers; and Stizelli, whose voice is not so sweet as Brignoli's, completely carries away his hearers by the force and vigor of his personations. And this vigor of true, lyric artists, is not confined to mere physical demonstrations any more than the apathy of others. It pervades everything. It gives the accent to every word; it gives the weight to every phrase; it vitalizes the scene and changes the mimicry of the stage into the reality of life. Some Europeans who reside among us, and who are apt to depreciate the intelligence which a considerable portion of our audiences possess, are clamorous for European customs and tastes and traditions. They say that in Paris, or in Florence, or in Naples, or somewhere, people don't care for action and think only of the music. Putting aside for a moment the fact that it is of no importance to us here what people think on the other side of the water we might adduce many instances which do not substantiate any such idea. Ronconi, the baritone, is a remarkable one, his notorious faulty intonation being entirely overlooked in the graphic intensity of his histrionic power. Grisi herself, has swayed the world quite as much by the majesty of her dramatic, as the finish of her vocal efforts.

We would by no means be thought to depreciate the importance of the highest musical culture. We only desire to prove that an opera house is not a mere concert room; that when a vocalist puts on a garb and utters certain words which appertain to a supposed character, he or she has got something more to do than stand, a gentleman or lady on the stage, paying every attention to the emission of vocal sounds, and no attention whatever to the sentiments they ought to express. This does not satisfy an American audience, educated to a nice appreciation of the best acting of the time. However delightfully a vocalist may sing, the music becomes simply fluent sound, when not animated with intelligent expression. Not simply musical expression alone, but intellectual expression, springing from the active, thoughtful mind. And it is very certain that if this intelligence be not present, the performer will fail to impress the intellects around. There is a two-fold enjoyment of vocal music; one which springs from a sensuous delight at sweet sounds, and another from the mental recognition of the intelligence or depth of feeling which shines through them. These are exhibited in an extended form in the impressions produced by an operatic performance. If the sweetness of sound or intelligence of expression be absent or neglected, the effect produced is unsatisfactory. Therefore is a great lyric artist, one who combines both musical and dramatic ability, and it is vain to attempt to force upon us as great, what is only clever talent, cultivated in one direction only, and wanting in some of the fundamental qualifications of greatness.

We have heard and seen too much in this country to be any longer under the dictation of European minds. The cultivated amateurs of this country bring to bear upon their judgment of these things not only musical taste but a generally refined and educated intellect. The time has gone by when we must be supposed to accept as final the quoted opinion of Europe. Our preferences are as well founded as those of any other nation; with that nervous energy which characterizes the race we seize upon and explore a topic by the light of our generally diffused culture. Those who make music the sole study and occupation of their lives are unquestionably competent to judge of musical efforts; but they are not necessarily the best judges of dramatic power, nor necessarily appreciative of that profundity of expression or refinement of nature which are instinct in high-toned natures, and the absence or presence of which is discernible by kindred sympathies.

The artists who have achieved the greatest successes in this country are those who have evinced a combined musical and dramatic ability, and in practice as well as theory the energy of the actor added to culture of the vocalist is necessary to constitute a thorough lyric vocalist. CAROLUS.

The Old Pitch-Pipe.

We wonder how the fathers of New England contrived to pitch their psalm-tunes, during that long interval when no musical instrument was tolerated in the sanctuary. Perhaps the tempest and the war-whoop confounded their idea of harmony, and the pitch of their tunes was as little cared for as the water-mark on the beach. It was enough that amid hardship and privation they could still keep the quaint old melodies treasured like holy memories in their hearts, and let them ring out in the wilderness, as the spirit moved, in glorious independence of those rules and forms they had grown tired of beyond the sea. Perhaps their few simple tunes were so uniformly the outpourings of the heart in song that they pitched themselves, and rose or fell with the ebb and flow of emotion, and only ceased when this had spent itself.

But in course of time they missed the chorister as well as pastor they had parted from at Leyden; and in spite of their prejudices, there were seasons, we doubt not, when even the winds and waves awakened yearnings in secret to hear again the old majestic organ tones, that they had foolishly surrendered to the "man of sin." They called no man master, but by and by the schoolmaster came, and close upon his heels followed the singing-master. But with all his resources it puzzled him to find the "pitch." The harps were left hanging on the willows, after their owners had escaped from captivity; and for an hundred years they hung there, tantalizing the Puritan chorister in his dubious search for the key-note. The best disciplined and developed voice is of itself inadequate to such an emergency, and it almost instinctively waits for some artificial help at the start. On occasions, where entire accuracy of pitch seems superfluous, and the rules of rhythm and harmony are suspended, some one ventures to start a tune, and the rest follow his lead, growing bolder and more confident after surmounting the opening stanza, until it becomes a matter of indifference how they started and where they alight. But our forefathers were evidently cured of their unworthy prejudice against any instrumental accompaniment in the sanctuary by this one difficulty of "getting the pitch." They had enough ups and downs, hems, twists and turns, without going through the process in maintaining a mere prejudice, "more honored in the breach than the observance."

So one Sabbath there was stealthily introduced into the singers' gallery a little box some six inches long, four wide, and one thick, furnished with a mouth-piece and slide, on which were registered the letters of the octave. The minister gave out the psalm and gravely resumed his seat. A solemn pause ensued, during which the chorister is busy inaugurating a new era for church music in New England. Having moved the slide to the proper letter, he tremblingly applies his lips to the mouth-piece, and toots forth the key-note. But this simple sound, we are told, had to be made cautiously, and the pitch to the other parts carefully found and dexterously handed round, to prevent detection and consequent reproof from the fathers for sounding an instrument in the church!

Ere long, however, the pitch-pipe won its way to favor, as it only tooted the key-note and invaded the sanctity of the meeting-house no further. By and by it ushered in the flute and viol to accompany the voice through the psalm, and the sensibilities of the fathers survived even that shock. Following up the advantage, a big bass viol suddenly loomed up in the singers' gallery, casting almost as much of a shadow as a small organ. It threatened at first to throw the pulpit into the shade, and was watched suspiciously as some "infernal machine" of the adversary for sowing tares. But it did good service in more ways than one. It succeeded better than the tithing-man in stilling the boys in the gallery, as it twanged out those heavy rumbling vibrations. Now at length the foundations for the pitch of tunes were laid deep and broad, and that full, prolonged sounding of the key-note by instruments and voices gave assurance that this was strongly secured.

But instruments like players would get out of tune amid the distractions of the busy week. So when the Sabbath came round again old heads with their prejudices still unconquered shook dubiously while the tuning of instruments was in progress. That was rather an incongruous performance at the opening of service. It required unusual powers of abstraction for the worshipper to keep in a devout frame while the wind and stringed instruments yonder were trying to reconcile their differences. To the wayward imagination it would suggest the howling of the "hulls of Bushan" or the wailings of lost spirits, until the solemn invocation from the pulpit cut short those wails and groans, dispelled the illusion. Yet they were devout men in those days, who played the viol in accompaniment to the choir, and though they have since "hung up the fiddle and the bow," they will ever cherish pleasant memories of those Sabbath days and evenings in the singers' gallery.

To every son of Jubal it is pleasant to note how the current of public sentiment has been eddying back to the organ. The need of full harmony in instrumental accompaniment and the inconvenience and uncertainty attending the introduction of a diversity of instruments has created a demand for such as would enable a single player on the key-board to sustain each part that was sung. So something approximating to the organ has found a welcome in the humblest church; and voluntaries, preludes and interludes are expected as regularly as "psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs." Prejudices still have to be encountered, but far less bitter and uncompromising than a century ago. Real merit is sooner or later appreciated, and what is wrong is very apt like the scorpion to sting itself to death. The descendant of the Pilgrims is not yet won over to Rome as his fathers feared by that noble instrument they sacrificed to Romish prejudice, but often does his soul soar on the wings of those majestic harmonies far above all cumbrous rites and ceremonies "quite in the verge of Heaven."

What church or choir that has an organ would do without it now? Larks and nightingales sing always without an instrument, and so the voice may warble and soar free as the birds. But the most independent of voices must lean on some attendant instrument as its stay and staff, and mounts on those accompanying strains to its highest achievements. Even the Swedish nightingale, that sung because she could not help singing, was dependent on her orchestra; though at times each player stood still, listening in mute admiration to that marvelous voice so far transcending all human mechanism. Let others do as they will, we mean ever to cherish with filial reverence the memory of Jubal. Some one has pictured him as he sits in primitive attire surrounded by a group of youth that he is showing how to play on his first instrument, the shepherd's pipe. The faithful dog is watching the performance eagerly as the rest, and the flock has stopped its grazing at a little distance to catch those novel strains. How the "father of all such as handle the harp and organ" must rejoice as he sees how that first little group of votaries has spread itself, until, by and by, every church is likely to have some sort of organ, and every village its brass band.

Well, this venerable pitch-pipe never sent forth so prolonged a "toot" before; and we have taken liberties with it, that may have betrayed irreverence for its age. It has come down to us with the old key-note unimpaired, and it sounds the pitch as faithfully as it did four-score years ago. But we keep it, like the old-fashioned tunes, more in memory of the past, than for use in the present. W. E. B.

The Statue of Flora in the Central Park.— Influence of Ideal Statuary.

(From the Crayon for August.)

Good intentions in respect to art matters generally obtain but little credence from us, preferring, as we do, to await their fulfilment before giving them currency. A rumor of one, however, comes to us that we are especially glad to chronicle, because it is of pioneer value. We allude to the report that Mr. R. K. Haight intends to present his beautiful statue of "Flora," by Crawford, to the Central Park. We are rejoiced to hear of such a prospective gift to the public, because it is the first instance here of a purely ideal statue being set up before the people.

The "Flora" is quite different from the public works of art our people are familiar with. It is not a statue of a hero, ancient or modern, exhibiting the usual absurdities of conventional costume, nor is it a statue symbolical of personal or national vanity; it is a statue embodying a sentiment common to all mankind—the love of flowers—one which the lowest extreme of democracy can appreciate equally with the highest. The subject is treated so as to be perfectly intelligible to the least cultivated fancy, and therefore well adapted to a public thoroughfare. There are many good reasons why we should have ideal statues on our highways, and we shall give one or two of them. The "great unwashed" who throng our streets and rule them, and who will inevitably throng and rule in the trim paths and intricate rambles of the Central Park, in spite of wealth, propriety and the police, may respect ideal statues and sentiment, when they will not respect either law, persons or places, and what we wish to lay most stress on, democracy will respect ideal statues when it will injure and deface the statues of common heroes.

The democrat loves to exercise his judgment, even in regard to a monument. If the monument be erected in honor of a national individual, the democrat views it as an infringement on his rights. He regards it as a rival. Before an object of beauty, however, the attributes of which are not constitutionally defined by any legislator he knows of, he will resign his pretensions, and yield to a natural sentiment. Politicians, from Mark Antony down to these days, well know that the Democracy possesses, and is ruled by sentiments; we contend that the artist has an "equal right" with the politician to use it for public utility. We have no precedent on our own soil to appeal to, but since Terpander did with music allay a sedition in Sparta, we do not know why artists here should not have a chance to try similar æsthetic experiments is an equally seditious community.

This brings us to the local and specific reasons for wishing to see the "Flora" in the Central Park. We will not dwell on the universal love of woman, even by impolitic democrats, except to suggest that a marble female form, pure in fancy and material, may greatly assist in preserving order. A fine ideal statue like the "Flora" would, wherever it could be seen, be more effective in any given area than twenty policemen. We would have one visible in the Park at every turn, and placed in the Park solely on account of order. The noblest ideas of the past, the ideas which have ever exercised positive control over the masses, have ever been associated with female forms, as is easily recognized by studying the worship of Minerva by the noblest people of antiquity, and of the Madonna by the millions of the middle ages. If these references are not sufficient, we can refer to the statue of Joan of Arc, so patriotically revered by the French masses of the present day.

We are quite prepared for the vulgar exclamation of "idolatry!" In reply to this we would rather see noble ideas symbolized in the quiet forms of beauty on our highways than intellectually mauled and polluted by politicians in our national assemblies. If we could have more statues and fewer statutes, the people would be better governed than they are now. Intelligible ideal statues, embodying ideas hallowed by conscience, we are confident, will preserve common conditions of order in public places better than any law the sharpest legislator can devise. We do not believe that the sacred influence of art is yet impaired by "progress," nor its utility drowned in the sea of American intelligence. We repeat our desire to have the Flora in the Central Park, and hope Mr. Haight will convert his intention into a fixed fact. The act will immortalize him. Now is the time, too, to carry out good ideas, while the Central Park is in good hands. How long it will be so, who can tell?

The people of Calais and Eastport have just been enjoying a rare musical treat. Mrs. C. Varian Jaunce, a native of Eastport, who has been eight years pursuing musical studies in Italy, has given concerts with great success. She sang in Rome, before His Holiness the Pope, at his special request, and is destined to make a profound impression on the mind of the musical world in our chief cities. With a person and countenance of remarkable beauty, and entire naturalness of manner, accompanying a voice of perfect purity and great compass and power, together with a culture equal to that of Biscacianti, she carried all hearts by storm.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 11, 1860.

Ball's Washington.

Music seems destined to undergo a temporary estivation during the dog days. Orchestras are disbanded, violins sleep in their green bags, and contra-bassi are laid up in ordinary. There are no concert posters at the street corners; serenades are unfrequent and lugubrious; even the learners have laid aside their dyspeptic flutes and moaning horns, and the neighboring attics are still. Miss Flora has left her piano for the beach, and listens now only to the music of the waves as they break upon "the whispering, shelly shore."

Decidedly there is nothing for the musical journalist to do. Necessity, therefore, led us to look about for some congenial topic, and we were not long in finding one in the studio of our friend, THOMAS BALL. The colossal statue of WASHINGTON upon which he is engaged, required a room specially adapted for the purpose, and a very commodious building has been erected for him in the rear of Chickering's pianoforte manufactory. A revolving platform, much like a locomotive "turn-table," with a large iron shaft in the centre, will serve for the support of the model; so that the effect can be studied from every angle as the work progresses. Little of the modelling has been done as yet, the preparations having taken much time and forethought. The head of the great commander is finished, however, and a very noble one it is; the countenance is serene, but not without the marks of a stern will, and not refined, after the manner of some artists, until all that is human is gone. We sincerely hope the sculptor will remember that Washington after all was only a man; and that the statue will be successful just in proportion to the humanity that is expressed in it. We do not want an Olympian Jupiter, with his head above the clouds. And though anger may not be the most agreeable mood in which a great man might appear, rather than endure the soulless inanities which have too often worn the name of Washington, we could far rather see our hero depicted in his noble rage, as he rode up with scintillating eyes and curved nostrils, swearing at the perfidy of General Lee.

Mr. Ball has just completed the model for a bust of the venerable Dr. Wayland, of Providence. The likeness is admirable, and in truth a sculptor could hardly desire a better subject. All who remember the massive head, the overhanging brows, the simple dignity, the mingled firmness and suavity of the original will acknowledge this as one of the very best of the artist's works.

The model of the "Minute-Man," designed for the Lexington monument, has been completed for some time, and has been every where admired for its striking attitude and earnest expression. The whole figure is instinct with life, and if the efforts of the Lexington committee are successful, we shall have in this one of the very finest statues of modern times.

A COURT CONCERT.

From Munich our route lay towards Stuttgart, where we had recommendations to the court. I handed these to the master of ceremonies and received a note from him the very next day, stating that we should be heard at court. But in the meanwhile I had been informed that it was the custom at court to play cards during the concerts and that but little attention was paid to the music. I carried with me from Brunswick a strong feeling against such profanation of the art, and took the liberty to tell the master of ceremonies that I and my wife would play before the court only on condition that His Majesty would condescend to suspend the game during our performance. The man got thoroughly frightened at such a bold demand, and cried, "What! You make conditions to my most gracious master? How dare I report this to him!" "Then I must renounce the honor of being heard by the court," was my simple reply, whereupon I took my leave. How the master of ceremonies managed to communicate to the king such an unheard-of demand, and how the king persuaded himself to accede to it, I have not learned. The result, however, was that I received word from the master of ceremonies that His Majesty had granted my wish, but with the condition that the pieces which we were to play should succeed each other, so as not to incommode His Majesty too often.

This was done accordingly. As soon as the king and company had taken their seats at the card-tables the concert began with an overture which was followed by an aria. During this time the lackeys ran ncially to and fro, offering refreshments, and the players cried out their "I play" and "I pass," so loud that most of the music and singing was lost. That over, the master of ceremonies came to me to say that I should get ready. He then informed the King that the strangers were about to begin, whereupon His Majesty rose, the rest following. Lackeys placed two rows of chairs behind the orchestra, upon which the company took their seats. Our playing was listened to very attentively and in silence; yet nobody dared applaud, as His Majesty did not set the example. The king's attention manifested itself only by an inclining of the head towards us at the conclusion. As soon as we had finished, everybody hurried back to the card-tables and presently there was the same noise as before.

During the rest of the concert I had leisure to look around. I directed my attention principally to the king's table, from which, to render His Majesty as comfortable as his complacency would permit, a segment had been cut out, into which the royal belly fitted precisely. The hugeness of the latter and the smallness of the kingdom gave rise to a smart caricature, representing the King in full, regal costume, a map of Wurtemberg suspended from the lowest button of his long waistcoat, exclaiming; "I cannot overlook my possessions."

As soon as the king had finished his game and moved his chair the concert was abruptly concluded in the midst of an aria sung by Madame Graff, so that the last notes of a cadence actually remained stuck in her throat. The musicians, used to such vandalism, packed their instruments away very unconcernedly; but I was deeply angry at such degradation of the art.

HOW THE DUKE OF GOTHA "COMPOSED."

At that time the duke, excited perhaps by my vocal compositions, showed a desire to set to music one of his larger poems, a kind of Cantata. He did me the honor to consult me about it. But as the Duke could not make up his mind to divulge to me his ignorance in music, he applied for assistance to his old music-teacher, the Concert-master Reinhard. The latter afterwards told me in hour of confidential chat we had together, how the Cantata was done into music. The Duke read to his teacher, who was sitting at the piano, a few lines of his libretto, and gave his ideas how the text should be set. The Duke having once read or heard something about the different character of the keys, Reinhard was next required to strike a few chords in each key, until the Duke had found the proper one for his text. If the words were lively and cheerful, the major mode was chosen, if mournful, the minor. It happened one day that the Duke thought the major mode too cheerful and the minor mode too gloomy for his text, and desired poor Reinhard to sound a mode between the two, half minor! When the key had been fixed on, the melody was the next thing. The Duke began to whistle all melodies that would come into his head. Reinhard, who listened attentively, would wait until a melody came up to which he thought the text might be fitted when he stopped the Duke and wrote it down. Two or three lines of the poem being disposed of in this manner the same proceeding was gone through with the next ones. The sketch of the Cantata, as it had been written down in such hours of inspiration was now handed to Backofen, one of the Duke's chamber-musicians, to write out the score, as Reinhard knew nothing of instrumentation. Backofen could of course make little use of the materials furnished him and had to compose almost the whole Cantata over again. As he had much talent for composition, his music was quite tolerable. The work thus finished was now written out, studied under my direction, and at last performed at a Court-concert. The Duke who must have been slightly astonished to find how well his music sounded, accepted the congratulations of the Court with a self-satisfied mien. He even complimented me that I had so well understood his intentions and secretly paid his two associates a handsome amount. In this manner everybody was pleased.

Musical Chit-Chat.

BENEVENTANO. — We find the following item in a Vienna letter of the "Signale" (Leipsic):

Sig. Beneventano is much better off with regard to voice than Varesi. He has a voice as big as a house, and lungs like a locomotive. It has been common to compare his singing to the roaring of a lion. I do not know whether the Signor will feel much flattered by this natural-historical comparison; but really, when he, slowly advancing from the background of the stage close to the footlights, prolongs a note to an awful crescendo, one must be excused for entertaining some fears not only for one's personal safety but also for the good taste of Sig. Beneventano. A duet (as for instance the one in I Puritani) sung by Signor B. and Mr. Beck (of the German Opera) would have a shaking power. It would be more than a treat; it would be a feast for the ears.

The Draytons are giving their pleasant parlor operas at Buffalo, and are meeting with well deserved success.

MONTREAL THEATRE ROYAL.—The French Opéra Comique from New Orleans are playing an engagement here. Mlle. D'Arcy, and Messrs. Philippe and Genibrel are the principals. Can they not visit us in Boston?

The Nationale of Brussels thus criticises the début of an American prima donna, Miss Hinckley, of Albany, at the Theatre du Cirque of that city, in "Lucia di Lammermoor":

"Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti's chef d'œuvre, is the most popular of all operas—the melodies are known to all; there is scarcely a note of it which may not be heard in the street; and yet the announcement of the representation of "Lucia" by the Italian troupe, drew to the Theatre du Cirque an immense crowd. It was not the first time they had been attracted there—"Ernani," "Le Barbier," "Don Pasquale," "Le Mariage Secret," "L'italienne à Alger," had already drawn crowded houses—but this time the concourse of people went beyond all precedent; stalls, balconies, boxes and pit, all were filled—the hall alone was a magnificent spectacle; how can all this be explained? All the world knows the opera: yes, but the Italian Lucia is a very different person from the French Lucie, and this Lucie was a new stager, this her first appearance in Brussels—Mlle. Hinckley—young and pretty, and from the first her beauty decided her success—at her entrance on the stage she was greeted by the applause of the delighted crowd. She realized the ideal one forms of the poetic creation of Walter Scott.

She has not the appearance of a Southerner, and it is easy to discover, not an Italian. She is an American, educated in Italy, and Mr. Merelli first brought out at the Opera in Amsterdam, this pearl of beauty—this perfect model of youth and freshness. Her whole person is graceful, her acting full of attraction; she renders perfectly the native tenderness of Lucia for Edguy, in the duet of the first act. Her terror and despair, in the finale of the second—in the scene of madness—produced a profound impression.

The voice of Mlle. H. is as fresh as herself; without being broken to the exercise of vocalization, she possesses fine talent.

The air of the third act was sung by this charming artist better than by any cantatrice ever heard in Brussels in this role, and in a manner which well merited the enthusiastic applause and recall which greeted her. The public might have overlooked much in this beautiful person, but Mlle. H. did nothing which required pardon. She unites with the attractions of woman a talent which reaches towards perfection.

The success of Mlle. H. is an immense success; one can never grow weary of seeing and hearing her.

Musical Correspondence.

—, MASS., JULY 30.—I have been here for some time recruiting my health. One of my most delectable amusements—really the most pleasing of all, has been the perusal of your paper every Saturday afternoon. In it, we learn the state of musical matters generally. Why should not the true state of music in this place be set forth? Now for it.

The piano music that most prevails here are simple operatic arrangements. Now and then, and by mere chance, we hear one of Wollenhaupt's or Lysberg's parlor pieces. At a reunion lately it was my good fortune to hear one of Clementi's diversions played in excellent style by a young lady of German parentage, who is undoubtedly the best pianist of her sex here.

It was charming and refreshing, after the common hum-drum, bumping and thumping, which good natured, but silly people style fine pianoforte playing, and which to say the least, is mortifying to those who possess any thing like taste or experience. At the close I whispered my delight to a gentleman standing near by. "I am pleased," he replied, that you esteem this, but look how indifferent the company seems, it was just so at a party some time ago, at which I happened to be present, and at the end of this same piece, no one said good, bad, or even thanks, but a lady stepped up to her and asked, "Can you play Hubner's March?" Provoking! What a lamentable state of things! All this, and more arises from the fact that those would-be teachers, are in a fit condition to enter a musical academy and study hard with the view of obtaining certificates of competency. One of your subscribers—knows personally eleven female teachers who have only received forty-eight lessons, and some, only twenty-four from different pianists in Boston, who are now teaching in this city at the rate of six, eight and ten dollars for twenty-four lessons. There are at the present time some females taking lessons from three pianists here, who assured me that these are giving lessons at the rate of twenty-five cents each, to beginners, so as to collect money to pay for their own lessons. I find no fault with people teaching for a low price, but I utterly condemn and so must all right-thinking people censure those who presume to teach what they do not understand.

Every man and woman who happens to play an organ or melodeon in some meeting-house, gives lessons on the piano. The common opinion is, that if Miss this, and Mr. that plays psalm tunes decently, and a few anti-Rinck organ interludes, improvised without any regard to rhythm, or the laws of simple composition, they can teach "my Julia and my Charley to play on the piano." And they do teach with a vengeance. People think that to strike the keys and produce sounds in time, so that the tune is lively and marked, is to play the piano. They know nothing about the various modifications of touch and tone, nor of the thousand and one conventionalities of legitimate piano playing. Talk to them of Æsthetics, Dynamics, &c., &c., in connection with the instrument! Why, these are foreign terms! To play the piano for them, it is sufficient to play lively tunes, and to help the voice. Almost every body can play a jig, or a "break down," ergo every body can play on the piano, or rather prostitute the piano. This being the case, it is not surprising that music is at so low an ebb here. There is a band here. It plays quicksteps and marches very well. These became popularized, so that when one sits to the piano, the inquiry comes, "can you play the 'Mohawk Vale,' which the band plays so nicely? On the other hand there are a few people—but very few among the élite especially, who have heard legitimate pianoforte, orchestral and vocal music abroad or in the metropolis. These are capable of appreciating good things, but as a general thing, people think more of Mason's and Bradbury's make-up of church tunes—of the countless numbers of psalm tunes concocted, metamorphosed, hashed and re-hashed from their simple, beautiful and original models, than they do of Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn and Beethoven's music. One reason perhaps, is, because they get a taste of these authors in those infamous books which are both a disgrace and a pest to the cause of true church music in this country. If the élite and those who lead matters of fashion in this place, would only initiate some step for the culture of good music, things would assume a better aspect. I see nothing to hinder us from engaging the Mendelssohn Quintette Club periodically during the coming fall, except that some people prefer to keep their money, or rather spend what they devote for amusement, in recreations of a far less refined nature than that of listening to music of an elevated character. Some time ago, when Mr. — played one of Beethoven's sonatas so admirably at a concert, the pervading stillness was said to be wonderful. Such a thing was not known before. The attention then given, did not arise from reverence for Beethoven, nor from common respect to the pianist, but chiefly because the élite—those who give a tone to society here, listened earnestly and approvingly.

In Germany the highest people patronize and take active parts in music, and the result is that the middle and lower classes become familiar with, and learn to esteem the great masters. Our "big folks" should do the same. As a young people in art and science, we must not, dare not reject great works because we cannot understand them. Rather let us seek to comprehend by association and constant intercourse—by listening to the voices that speak to us from the past in tones and sentiments that have thrilled maturer and more sympathetic souls than ours. As the German masters are most worthy of our attention as regards instrumental music, so are the Italians indisputably with reference to vocal. There are some people here who are fond of decrying Italian opera music, on the ground that they don't understand the Italian language. With equal consistency and for the better exhibition of their provoking ignorance, I would advise them to cry against Tasso and Dante. Singing to people, makes them wonderfully polite towards you, especially if you pronounce clearly. I have been to several parties where they listened to a pretty song which had no remarkable feature, but a recurrence of regular rhythm—the melody being of the most common kind, while they would talk loudly during a pianoforte piece which was certainly superior intrinsically to the former. Here the commencement of a piano solo is the signal for talk—not whispers, but talk with a vengeance, so as to drown the performer's efforts. *

VIENNA, JULY 6.—The "interregnum" is here—that is, all opera is suspended. Salvi and his Italian troop have finished their season; the Court opera is having its annual vacation, and the "men singers and women singers" are scattered from Hungary to England, resting or playing as stars. Concerts are to be heard only in public gardens or in "Beer-Lokals," and these are hardly topics for a correspondent. What shall I write? Wherewithal shall the necessary amount of space be filled? What do you say to a letter of chit-chat? Here goes.

Salvi gave during his season fifty performances, divided among eight operas, thus: Lucrezia Borgia and Traviata, eight times each; Norma, seven; Rigoletto, six; Rossini's Siege of Corinth, five; Donizetti's Elisir d'Amore, five; Barber of Seville, four, and Don Juan three times.

What with assistance from the Government, and pretty, often very full houses, the season has been a successful one and will no doubt be repeated in the autumn.

Madame La Grus has gone to Paris.

Here is a paragraph to the old point of how much even small concerts do for music in central Europe. Darmstadt is the capital of the Grand Duchy of Hesse, and has a population of some thirty-five thousand or forty thousand inhabitants. The theatrical year continued from September 4, 1859 to May 23, 1860, and of one hundred and forty-nine performances on the Court stage, one hundred and five were musical operas, operettas, comic pieces with vocal and instrumental music, ballets and concerts. Thirty-eight operas filled seventy-six evenings, of which new on that stage were, [Linda di Chamounix, Wagner's Rienzi and Meyerbeer's Dinorah. Operas newly put upon the stage, were Rossini's Cinderella, Auber's Fra Diavolo, Nicolai's Merry wives of Windsor, Meyerbeer's North Star, Bellini's Norma, Wagner's Tannhauser, and Mozart's Titus. Rienzi was given seven times, Verdi's Sicilian Vespers, five; others three or four times each, so that at least half that were given, were brought upon the stage for a single performance each. It is hardly necessary to add that all were given in the German language.

A few weeks since, a new opera in two acts, was given in the Kärnthner Theater, here in Vienna—text by Alexander Baumann, music by Joseph Dessauer. The "Fremdenblatt" says of it:

"It may be said of 'Dominga' in the words of the well known criticism slightly adapted, 'it contains nothing that is new, and still less that is beautiful. We do not mean to say that Herr Dessauer as plagiarist has simply copied from others; but the themes of the various numbers of his opera and their forms have been so thoroughly used up, and are so common, that all airs, duets, concerted pieces and choruses sound old and familiar. The opera 'Dominga' is a feeble work, quite without buoyancy, and with no trace of originality. Sentimentality alternates with tasteless bravours airs or would-be comic passages. This would-be comic element is wanting in humor, grace and freshness." There is more to the same effect. I have not heard however that Herr Dessauer has taken up either pen or pistol to prove that his opera is good, and that this writer is all in the wrong.

One of the papers publishes the following exquisite puff of Leopold von Meyer. The old fellow understands "how to do it."

"The Royal Imperial chamber virtuoso Herr Leopold von Meyer had the honor on the 21st of June to play in a Court concert of Queen Victoria, and rejoiced himself on that occasion with distinguished marks of honor, such as seldom are enjoyed by an artist. For when his turn came, and he was on the point of seating himself at the piano, the Duke of Coburg [think of this!] who was present advanced and presented his hand in the most hearty manner. When now the artist began to play, the Queen drew near in the most respectful manner, and placed herself behind the piano, in order carefully to observe his style of playing. Near the Queen found themselves standing [literal translation] the other high lordships present, the King of the Belgians, the Duke of Flanders, the Prince of Wales, the Duchess of Kent and the Duchess of Cambridge. As the Queen was standing, so therefore the entire company rose—as well as all the artists.

After Herr von Meyer had concluded his number upon the programme, the Queen called upon him, to play another piece, and the artist complied with this flattering demand, by performing a new polka which will immediately appear in London under the title "Victoria Polka."

Herr von Meyer is the lion of the concert season and he is already engaged by the director of the Royal Theatre in London for the months of October and November, with the Italian opera troupe, with a very high salary and the full payment of all his expenses. In the mean time Herr von Meyer will visit the baths of Kissingen for his health, and return for a short time to Vienna."

(For the history of Tom Thumb at court, see Barnum's Memoirs.)

Meyer's next concert in Vienna will be jammed full of people, who wish to see that execution, which the Queen of England stood up to observe! It is a fact, though, that in his peculiar manner he has no equal.

A new opera was given in Stuttgart on the 23d of June, "The Night of St. John," the first work for the stage, of a young composer named Gustav Presel. It met with great success. Its great richness in melody is the point which the critics urge in its favor. No new work since Flotow's "Martha," has taken the Stuttgart people so by storm. Please explain the fact that just as Wagner is "becoming known and appreciated" all over Germany, that the works of Offenbach and others, who write in the old school of Dittersdorf and Weigl, giving the public only simple, melodious, healthy music are having such success?

A funny fellow in Berlin has been printing some drolleries, which purport to be leaves cut from albums, containing the autographs of singers and actors of the Spree city. Perhaps the wit is too local; but possibly a specimen or two may be comprehensible out of Berlin.

"Actors in general are thinking thoughtful artists; i. e., they think themselves artists."

"The Prophet is without honor in his own land—unless I sing it. THEODORE FORMES."

Another is a hit at the old and ugly dancers in the ballet.

"Physicians say, dancing is injurious to the health. Nonsense; for we have grown old and gray in the business."

Here is a curious item from Italy.

Before Garibaldi left Turin a benefit concert was given him, at which the music was from the works of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Mayseder—all Germans.

Hoffmann's most delightful picture of life in the olden time, "Meister Martin and his journeymen" has been dramatized into an opera text, and Wilhelm Tschirch has composed the music. If the opera equals the story—that is enough.

I said above that Salvi's operatic season must have been successful. According to the "Wanderer" this is a mistake, that paper says Salvi lost some $15,000 by the enterprise! The fact is, that the public will not support an opera in a foreign tongue—nay, it is doubtful if any opera can exist without assistance from the government.

It is stated that in August, Salvi's troop of singers, is to be followed in the Theater au der Wien by a troop of American gymnasts! A. W. T.

Offenbach is the son of the former music director or Cantor of the Jewish congregation in Cologne. He is now engaged upon a three-act opera.

VIENNA, JUNE 16.—My packet to-day was already sealed to go into the mail-box, when the "Journal" of the 2d inst., came to hand, and the note from Leipzig caught my eye.

"Our Diarist too has evidently had his mind wrought upon unfavorably with regard to Leipzig," you say in the few editorial lines prefixed to the communication. These words have led me to hunt up the only "note" I have sent on the subject to the "Journal" from which the following sentence is copied:

"I can, of course record no ex parte statement of the questions at issue [between the instructors and the pupils, who had left the institution] cannot decide as to the wisdom and propriety of the step which they have taken; but, granting the facts as represented to me, without hearing what the directors have to reply, it is their wisest course."

I also espouse no side in the controversy and the entire paragraph was written under a sense of the duty, which a musical journal owes to its supporters, to do all in its power to aid them in their best possible musical developments. Many of your younger readers hope to come to Germany to study. With already advanced pupils, I have often given my reasons for preferring a private course in Berlin; and these, as every reader knows, were on grounds simply on the advantages of a great capital over a smaller provincial city for general culture.

Now came grave charges. I felt it my duty to call upon such as know the truth to substantiate them, or by their silence acknowledge them unfounded. Pupils are now coming abroad at the rate of ten or twelve a year, and it is for them all important, that their time and (in many cases) their hardly earned savings, should be spent to the greatest advantage.

As you very well know, it is a matter of perfect indifference to me, where young men and women study, if they in the end are only good musicians. The great wants of our students, with some exceptions, are two: proper early training, (in which most are sadly deficient) and general musical culture. Where they get those is of no importance if they do get them. As to the Conservatorium matter, why should we not have a plain statement of facts—if there are any to be told? A. W. T.

MR. THAYER.—Please correct a clause in your article of April 14th. The young lady of whom you speak as having left the Leipzig Conservatorium, had no reasons for leaving, otherwise than dissatisfaction with the method of teaching. If a lady is satisfied with her progress, I know of no reason why she should not remain. But if a young lady with a slender hand wishes to waste her time, lose her courage, and ruin her fingers, let her study under the Conservatorium teachers. At least this has been my own bitter experience. At the end of six months' study of this method, my hands had become so stiff that I could hardly play a scale. But I know nothing whatever against the respectability of the institution. I consider it quite as proper a place as any public institution of the kind can be for a lady. Payments in the Conservatorium are made quarterly, instead of a year in advance. No American who has left paid for any longer time than he was in, although two were requested to do so.

Instrumental Music.

Jullien's last Waltz. 50

This publication can hardly fail to excite universal interest. There is no doubt as to the genuineness of its authorship; and assuredly this last production in his especial line of one who wrote such a multitude of charming dance-pieces deserves the attention of all upon whom this genial and attractive form of music exercises a sway. This waltz is quite worthy of the pen that traced the Echo de Mont Blanc Polka, the Prima Donna Waltz, and a dozen more things as perfect in their way.

Schubert's Serenade, arranged for Cornet and Piano. J. S. Knight. 25

Elogy of tears and Adieu. " " 25
Arrangements suitable for amateurs on both instruments. They contain substantially nothing but the melodies transposed into a practical key. Even finished players will find them good handpieces for an occasional social musical entertainment.

Romance Italienne. Varied. Charles Mayer. 35

Among the amateurs of Germany this is perhaps the most widely known piece of the popular author, and well deserves its great popularity. It is somewhat difficult, but repays study.

La Fiorentina. Fantaisie élégante. Duvernoy. 40

One of Duvernoy's best instructive pieces for pupils of about a year's practice.

Les Filles du Ciel Waltzes. Camille Schubert. 60

A ball in Paris would be thought dull without a Quadrille of Musard's and a set of waltzes by Camille Schubert. The dancing public of Paris have voted the above set one of their special favorites. It certainly equals in brilliancy and freshness of melodies the "Dames de Seville" sets, so extensively known here.

Pupils' Grand March. W. Fisher. 25

Quitman Guards' March. " 25
Lively and striking; suitable for scholars.

Books.

THE TWIN SISTERS. By H. S. Saroni. 25

A new and very attractive Operetta, and one that will afford instruction and entertainment for public or private performance. It is well suited to Female Colleges and Schools and will prove a general favorite.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being about one cent on each piece. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at the rate of one cent per ounce. This applies to any distance under three thousand miles; beyond that it is double.

Richard Wagner.

(Translated from the French of Louis Lamcobe (Revue Germanique, for Feb. 1860), by ANNA M. H. BARWEN.)

(Concluded.)

We shall give our opinions of Wagner's theories before treating of the value of his compositions, or giving an account of the three representations which lately took place at the Theatre Italien. The genealogy of the Wagnerian system can be given without much trouble. It goes back in part, and in line direct to that of Chevalier Gluck, of which it is in some respect the extreme development. Gluck maintains in one of his prefaces that dramatic music ought to limit itself to the rather servile rôle of interpreting the situation and words, affirming that it goes out of its domain when it is not confined to this. He says expressly in his Italian dedication to "Alceste:"

"I seek to bring back music to its veritable function, that of seconding poetry by strengthening the expression of its sentiments, and its situations, without interrupting or chilling the action with superfluous ornaments. I believe that music should add to poetry that which the liveliness of colors and the harmonious agreement of light and shade add to a correct well executed drawing serving to animate the figures without altering the outlines."

Certainly if we do not take this in too literal a sense, this passage coming from the pen of an intelligent man firmly convinced, contains excellent views. But should dramatic music always conform absolutely to these principles, resign itself to being only the color wedded to the drawing? If so it would reduce the musical composer to a mere print colorer. Is he obliged to attach himself like a slave to the steps of a poet, contenting himself with the adorning of a verse or a word, and thus renouncing his liberty and independence, which in artistic order, as well as in moral order, are the creating causes of true power? We must be allowed to doubt this.

Such, however, is the theory which has served as a starting point to Richard Wagner. Like Gluck he wished to oblige the music to express, or describe, so to speak, the finest shades of sentiment in the words or situation of the poem. He explains in a preface dated 1852. ("Three Opera Librettos, with a Communication to my friend as Preface, by Richard Wagner.") Now after having searched the melody for itself, he finished by making it subordinate to the situation or better still, to the language of the characters.

Now let us quote from the text this other passage from the dedication to "Alceste":

"I attach no value to the discovery of a novelty," says Gluck, "unless it has arisen naturally from the situation and is wedded to the expression; in fine there is no rule I have not been willing to sacrifice freely for effect.*"

Then notice the following precept, by which * The effect here meant is that springing from a truthful expression of the passions, not that vulgar artificial effect which so large a number of composers have abused.

Weber, and after him Wagner, has, according to our opinion, too well profited.

"I have believed that we must above all avoid leaving in the dialogue too cutting a disparity between the air and the recitative, in order not to mutilate the period in a counter-sense, nor awkwardly to interrupt the warmth of the scene."

Now who will dare to sustain seriously in these days, that dramatic music ought to reject the new combinations of harmony with melody, or those which spring from their union with rhythm, under pretext that the situation furnished by the poet does not exact nor give rise to these combinations? Has not the musical art its own independent, intrinsic beauty which not only has the right but whose duty even it is to free itself in certain limits from the exigencies of the drama? Of course we have no intention of approving or excusing those composers, who have believed they were right in adapting any given subject to any music whatever, at the expense of good sense and the plainest elementary rules of good taste. We simply affirm that music of the theatre, the church, or the concert, should develop itself by itself, and live its own life.

If Gluck did not say this in his prefaces, he felt it none the less, for his works are full of grand musical developments, worthy of admiration, and several of his choruses and scores are as touching and effective in a concert as in an opera. Richard Wagner has felt the same marvellously well, although he subscribes to the sayings of Gluck, by declaring in the course of the work already quoted, that he has pruned with care, musically speaking, all that which did not attach itself to the essential element of his poems.

In order to finish these comparisons we will say in fine, that Richard Wagner in commencing passages frequently, with measured recitative, has had in view without doubt like Gluck, a wish to efface "too cutting a disparity between the air and recitative."

This means it is true, may find its application in exceptional cases, but would it not be better to lead to an air by a recitative, which increases gradually in animation, than to commence a passage by a measured one, thus losing the effect of that moment when the theme chosen by a musician ought like a jet of flame to lighten up suddenly all which surrounds it? And if it relates to a song that the composer proposes to develop, is he not wanting in logic in failing to put this first in evidence? These things we know are subject to many exceptions therefore we guard against deciding positively on either side.

Richard Wagner does not leave his friend Gluck without saluting Mozart. He remarks that this immortal master knew how to give an especial musical color to each one of the character types which were furnished to him in the Libretto of Don Juan. Then he admires in Weber this same faculty of translating into sounds the characters of his heroes, and he dreams then of the possibility of designing his own, by means of melodies so striking as to be recognized. The author of Lohengrin only saw first in the composition of an opera a succession of duos, trios and choruses. Little by little, other things became visible. He wished that the drama should develop itself according to conditions peculiar to the nature of the subject, and that the musical passages might be constantly suggested by the situation and submissive to the management of the scenes, which the principal and sovereign idea, according to him, required. He desired that his movements should take part in the action, and make one body with it, producing on the audience an impression perfectly analogous to that which the developments of the poem awakened.

"And this can take place very naturally" says Wagner, "by means of a tissue of principal themes which shall be characteristic in their form and which are to be heard, not only in such or such a scene, but in the entire drama, and have besides an intimate connection with the poetic design of the composer."

The germ of this idea is found in Don Juan, Robin des Bois, Robert le Diable, and the Huguenots. Mozart, as we said above, found peculiar accents for displaying the different physiognomies of the Commander, Zerlina, Don Juan, Donna Anna, Masetto, &c. Weber, in Der Freyschütz, his master piece, showed as much talent as Mozart in musical character painting and he contrived to circulate through the score, several movements bound to the dramatic action, which he managed more happily than has ever been done before. Meyerbeer confines himself to making the most of this discovery by his illustrious predecessors, but on a larger scale and with a weaker impression.

Richard Wagner caught sight of this already complex idea under a new aspect. Seeking to endow music with a faculty of which it is deprived, precision, he takes a circuitous path, and applies, as a sort of label to each of the principal characters of his drama, a characteristic melody. He believes in the possibility of creating a system on this childish notion, and it is only saved from triviality, by means of musical beauties of the first order. There is also a grave inconvenience in this settled purpose, that of fatiguing the audience by this continual repetition of the same songs, and has Wagner completely avoided this objection?

We saw "Tannhäuser" at Zurich. At that time we did not know any of the operas of Wagner, and we read it from one end to the other with as much interest as attention. We were immediately struck with the grand proportions of the overture, with the seal of dignity, superiority and exaltation stamped on the whole, and we experienced a real satisfaction in not encountering any of those superannuated formulas so well relished by the drawing-room public, nor any of those conventional forms which musicians, whose value lies with editors of music, have so awkwardly adopted for each one of their passages, whatever may be the nature or style, and which, for want of a better system, drag themselves along the beaten path at the heels of mankind. We admired freely the charming attractiveness of Wagner's proud young Muse, who like some beautiful creatures with radiant countenances and conquering smiles seem to say "The world is ours."

One evening during our stay at Zurich, we saw Wagner. His superb forehead was lighted up by a brilliant expression, full of vivacity and sympathetic geniality. There was in his whole person an animated, powerful, spiritual presence, which charmed us, and we remember yet, after ten long years, the impression made on us by his intelligent eye, in which there seemed to dwell a sunbeam.

Three or four years after, at Leipsic, we were present at the performance of "Lohengrin," and thus had an opportunity of appreciating Wagner's talent, which is so truly dramatic and a fair development of his individuality. We judge "Lohengrin" as we do "Tannhäuser" because these works being created on the same principle possess the same qualities and the same defects. Boldness, rich coloring, strength, originality, depth, sonorous instrumentation, superb orchestral effects, brilliant songs, true declamation, the power of seducing and bearing along — all this may be inscribed on the fair side of the medal. But we find on the reverse a want of decision in the melodic design, a vague profusion of musical ideas more occupied with rendering the words faithfully than binding themselves logically together, the abuse of sonorousness and the tremolo, also an extreme frequency of thematique returns with the monotony which results from this and changes of tone-coloring arising here and there too brusquely caused by enharmonic modulations not sought for, but accepted too thoughtlessly. Another reproach, unfortunately well founded, we have to make upon these aforesaid scores, if they commence bravely they do not finish the same. The first act enchants, the second interests but charms us less, the third, too exclusively consecrated to the recitative, drags in many places, and consequently weakens the impression made at the opening. Notwithstanding all this, it is impossible not to be captivated by the representation of Wagner's operas, and in spite of their length we never think of leaving the theatre until after we have heard the last stroke of the violin bow.

Our enemies would be very sorry, grievously affected, if they could know that their hatred sometimes affords us more efficacious service than all the praises of our friends united. Without the "musique de l'avenir" would Wagner's reputation have increased so promptly among us? Thanks to this phrase "music of the future," he has become very popular in Paris — "barbarous city," as Berlioz once called it. Thus when the three concerts at the "Italiens" were announced every one was prepared courageously to be present at them, decided on braving this "music of the future." The public, the artists, the critics, the jealous, the envious, the curious, the indifferent, everybody wished to go.

"We are going to laugh," said some. "We are going to shrug our shoulders," said others. As usual they had taken pains to spread reports unfavorable to the new comer; his music could not be sung, it was bad, devoid of melody, that was certain. Executants of established talent had abandoned the orchestra at the rehearsals, it was said, declaring that they could comprehend nothing of this jumble, that it was useless to break one's legs in endeavoring to clamber over the musical brushwood of this composer, who pretended to teach them to play true and in time.

It was with curiosity then and anxiety that we awaited the decisive moment. At nine o'clock precisely we were at our post. Little by little the hall filled up with literary persons, artists, fashionables and the Germans helping to make the crowd. At last Wagner appeared and was received with reiterated applause, — it was a tribute paid to his name. A wan smile trembled on his lips when he heard his reception. Then seizing the leader's bow, he prepared himself to conduct his little army without any desk before him, without any score under his eyes, from his heart, in a word! And this tour de force lasted three hours! During three hours, he pointed out to the instrumentalists and chorus singers, the openings and re-openings, the very shadows with an inconceivable exactitude and fidelity of memory.

The overture to the "Flying Dutchman" was a cause of gratification to the enemies of Wagner. The theme played by the horn, the pretty melody in F confided to the hautbois, the traits executed by the quartet imitating the rising of the waves, the shrill chords which placed themselves on these passages, recalling by their savage harmonies, the cries of birds of prey during the tempest, all this appeared confused, diffuse and dry.

At the second piece the impression changed. The "Solemn entrance of the invited guests to Wartburg" made these detractors lower their heads, for unanimous bravos burst out through the whole Hall, and there was a veritable trembling in the crowd when the violin melody, a little Weberish in its character, unfolded itself nobly over unexpected and soothing modulations, (except one), throwing off its joyous and vibrating notes like jets of flame into the air.

The instrumental fragment in which Wagner has wished to describe "The pilgrimage of Tannhäuser to Rome" opens with the "Song of the Pilgrims," and contains some fine passages, contrasts of remarkable sounds between the flutes, hautbois and clarionets of one part and the quartet of the other. This imposing dialogue enchanted us, and it must be admitted that it introduced marvellously well the "Pilgrim Chorus" whose majestic beauty was perfectly comprehended.

In regard to the symphonique programmes, printed in the little books, some persons, well-intentioned, without doubt, wish to have it believed that Richard Wagner is a musical materialist, a realist; they chafe him with being ambitious of describing facts and objects by means of musical language. Are they sure that it is the facts and objects the master wishes to represent? Might it not be rather the sentiments they awaken in him? Poets of all nations have sung "the golden arrows" of the sun, the moon's "silver rays," the "sublime voice" of the great waters, "the immaculate snow" of the mountains, "the virgin forests," "the threatening calm" of the desert. Were they accused for this of materialism and realism? Perhaps; but every one knows of what value such accusations are. On this head musicians have been abominably guilty, for since the days of Bach who wrote his fugues on the farewells of friends, up to Richard Wagner, passing by Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Berlioz, F. David, &c., there has not been one, who has not attempted at least once in his life to translate into sounds — What? Nature? No, assuredly not, but the emotions produced by Nature's radiance, when without comprehending her secrets we love and admire her in the very depths of our souls.

We shall not discuss that which has no need of being discussed, and shall limit ourselves to simply mentioning the overture to "Tannhäuser," already heard and applauded at the time when Mr. Segher directed the St. Cecilia society, and the excellence of which we have elsewhere noticed. We confess we do not like the introduction to "Tristan and Isolde." As to the fragment of "Lohengrin" entitled "The Holy Grail" we shall give an account of it, after having quoted Wagner's text.

"The Holy Grail was the cup in which the Saviour drank at the Last Supper, and in which Joseph of Arimathea received the blood of the Crucified One. Tradition relates that the sacred relic had been taken away from unworthy men, but that God had decided upon returning it to the hands of some favored ones who from purity of heart and sanctity of life, had merited his honor. It is the return of the Holy Grail on the mountain of the saintly Chevaliers, in the midst of a troop of angels, that the introduction to Lohengrin attempts to express.

"In the first measures, the soul of the pious Solitary who awaits the sacred Chalice, soars off into infinite space. Little by little, he sees a strange apparition, which takes form and shape. This apparition defines itself more clearly, and he sees passing before him the miraculous troop of angels, carrying in their midst the Sacred Cup. The holy procession approaches, the heart of God's elect becomes exalted, enlarged; he expands with the ineffable aspirations awakened in him, he gives himself up to an increasing beatitude as he sees the luminous apparition coming nearer, and when at last the Holy Grail itself appears in the middle of the sacred procession, he is wrapt in ecstatic adoration, as if the entire world had disappeared.

"Then the Holy Grail extends its benediction over the saint in prayer, and consecrates him its chevalier. The burning flames soften gradually their éclat; the troop of angels with smiles of holy joy abandon the earth, and regain the celestial heights. The Holy Grail has been left in the care of pure men, in whose hearts the divine liquor is spread, and the august troop disappear in the depths of space in the same manner it had appeared."

The musical phrase chosen by Wagner to express this, is beautiful but short. Written in four parts it is executed by divided violins à l'ugu. To these four parts others join; the wind instruments enter one by one; then in a slow movement, for one moment, the orchestral voices unite in a harmonious undulating concert. At this place we noticed an ascending base, above which formed and resolved alternately, some dissonances, which were striking from the manner in which they were approached. Then the violins mounted up; the contra bassi and violoncellos remaining quiet; silence reigned among the wind instruments, and the soft melody leading back to its point of departure, exhaled itself in aerial sounds of exquisite tenderness. We wish that this Adagio had a less fairy-like and a more religious expression. Setting aside this important reserve, we have only praises to bestow upon it.

Le Reveil du Matin and the Betrothal March, (above all the chorus which crowns this fragment,) produces an excellent effect. The final song, which is broad, noble and yet flexible in its character, is accompanied by a violin passage ending at an E flat, which carries you off in spite of its apparent calm. This succeeded admirably.

We do not forget the "Evening Star," a pretty romance from "Tannhäuser," sung at the two last soirées, and which, being executed charmingly by Jules Lefoot, was encored with loud applause.

We reach at last a piece destined by the author to close these interesting concerts, and entitled "Wedding Music an Epithalamium. Four words will suffice to give judgment on it,—it was dazzling, transporting. A prolonged viva seemed to dart forth like lightning from the bounding orchestra, and a song was heard in the trombones, united to the bass, which electrified and enchanted us. The chorus of men and women gave repose by interrupting very happily the noise of the festival. The melody of it is gracious, naïve and agreeable, and there are some notes of the hautbois whose charm is irresistible. The author, without your expecting it, takes the melody into A flat. You do not know where he is going, but in a happy return he enters unexpectedly into G, and comes back to the principal movement, adding to it a battery of trumpets, horns and clarinets, which give no chance of rest either to the hands of the executants or those of the audience. Richard Wagner should be content, his success was as merited as incontestible.

"Conduits par nous

And now if any one says to us, Does not Wagner make an immoderate use of sonorousness in general, and of trumpets in particular; does not imagination play a more important part in his works than sentiment; does he not write his violin passages too often in excessively high regions; does he not show himself in music to be more of a poet than a musician?

To all these questions we shall reply, Yea, without any hesitation; but we shall add, it pleases some persons to disparage the works of Wagner, we have wished to point out their beauties. The critic, according to our views, had better sin through an excess of benevolence, than by an undue severity, and besides we are not sufficiently blasé to control our enthusiasm and keep our hearts from throbbing when moved by creations of beauty.

In recognizing the merits of Wagner we believe we are performing an act of justice, an act of good fellowship, and we shall never repent having sustained, according to our best ability, the exile who has come with frank confidence to ask hospitality from France.

The name of Mr. Hans de Bulow places itself very naturally beside that of Wagner. We regret not being able to dilate as we wish on such remarkable talents as his. Mr. Bulow, at the last soirée which was given at Pleyel's, executed with rare perfection several ancient and modern compositions. A magnificent tone, lightness, power, a captivating execution, fingers broken in to all difficulties; such are the brilliant qualities which distinguish this skilful pianist. We admired him particularly in the "Solemn Entry of the invited guests at Wartburg," transcribed by Liszt, and also in a superb fugue of J. S. Bach, and we joined heartily in the warm bravas of the audience. Mr. de Bulow will give more concerts, we shall take care not to miss them, and we think the public will do likewise.

P. S. Some one has just this instant handed us what is ordinarily called a pamphlet, written against Richard Wagner and "Music of the Future."

"Well, pamphlet, what have you to say?"

"I? nothing. Cream tarts!"

The Diarist Abroad

UTILE ET DULCE.

[It may perhaps give a mournful satisfaction to the friends of the late Diarist (the late as he seems to have given up diarizing altogether) if we prefix to this, his last communication, a few prefatory notes, drawn from his note books and other original documents. We—the editor of the communication—can vouch for the facts being as represented, certainly in so far as the late D.'s own memoranda may be held trustworthy.

It appears then, that he returned from Gratz on the 11th of June, crossing the Semmering again upon a brilliant and beautiful day, which brought out its beauties, as the sunshine of a joyous spirit does those of a handsome face. He was received by the fine young watchmaker and wife where he lodged, with great exhibition of joy, and was the next day treated to a dinner of beef fried with rashers of bacon—which they hold to be an American dish—salad and wine at some eighteen cents the quart—all which may be looked upon as a substitute for a fatted calf, which they had not.

For some days he remained reasonably quiet, occupying himself with his books and papers, and in writing for Dwight's Journal of Music. But there was an uneasiness visible in all his actions, which boded no good. The worst anticipations of his friends were realized on the 19th of June; for on that morning, under pretence of researches to be made in Upper Austria, he packed his traveling bag, and hardly saying "good bye" to a soul, went off to the station of the western railroad, and was overheard calling for a ticket to Linz in the third class cars.

In Linz he occupied himself in the main in making enquiries in regard to a certain apothecary, who more than half a century ago had his shop in that town down by the Danube—the dark rolling Danube, says Campbell, which is a lie—and, also concerning a brother of the apothecary, who in time of our last war with England, is said to have been also in Linz on a visit. Many slight circumstances had given the friends of the late D., no little uneasiness in regard to his mental condition, and his increasing scepticism in regard to the most interesting anecdotes of Beethoven, which periodically go the rounds of the newspaper, and are held to be established facts, seemed to prove a screw loose some where in his intellectual machinery. This sceptical tendency was shown also in Linz in a noticeable manner: he would take nothing upon trust, but must needs waste his time and money in examining old registers of deeds, marriages and the like belonging to a generation long since past. Among the places to which he has been traced was the room of an old shoemaker, with whom he had a long and confidential conversation upon the character and history of the apothecary aforementioned. As though this could be of the slightest use to him or to any other human being!

From Linz on the 21st he continued his journeying, going by railway to Frankmarkot, where seeing others take "Stellwagen" tickets, he took one also;

and was cheated by the agent, a man named Stoecker, to the amount of twenty cents in uncurrent money. Late at night in rain and darkness the Stellwagen deposited him at a brewhouse—also tavern in Salzburg,—bearing the euphonious name of "Gabler-brea!"

We find among the papers and notes, left by the D., that he considers this entire country along the Danube to be one of the gardens of the world, rich, fertile, and abounding in scenery of exquisite beauty. The views from the hills near Linz awakened great enthusiasm; but those around Salzburg were quite beyond his powers of description. There are also notices of the great kindness shown him by divers gentlemen in Salzburg. Prof. Schnaubelt of the Mozarteum (vocal teacher), Prof. Hoefel, the celebrated engraver, and others who treated his weaknesses with indulgence, and gave him such aid as they could in his researches. And so we turn our readers over to the tender mercies of the D., and pray them to read with kind allowance this last communication (by us received) from his pen.]

What queer freaks rivers indulge in! They seem to know nothing of straight and narrow ways—not they. Straight enough sometimes, perhaps, but their tendency to indulge in crooked paths is inborn. With nothing in the world to hinder them from passing to their eternity, the ocean, or Watt's "flowery beds of ease"—"meandering through gentle meads and meadows gay,"—ten to one, they will with infinite pains, find some round about way and run their heads against obstacles of their own seeking; like knaves and the lazy, who take double the pains of the honest and industrious, to say nothing of risks and their lessened chances of drawing prizes in the lottery of life.

Now, what in the name of common sense and the fitness of things, could induce the river Salza, after having fairly escaped the mountains, to turn aside from the wide, and altogether lovely plain, which spreads away from the feet of the Staufen and the Untersburg, and through which lay her beautiful course, to attack the vast mass of rock, which is now cut through and divided into the Capuzinerberg on the right and the Mönchsberg on the left? I suspect her natural disposition is quarrelsome; for to this day she rushes madly along and frets and chafes and murmurs and leads anything but a quiet life.

Jammed into the gorge, which she has cut, is the city of Salzburg; just as though the Salza had torn the town from its anchoring place up among the mountains, and piled it up here against the rocks, afterward cutting a clear passage through it, as we sometimes see done in the lodged ice in spring time.

The Capuzinerberg is now the extremity of a mountain curtain, which sweeps out with a grand course into the plain country; but the Castle height and the Mönchsberg—in fact one double headed mass of rock joined by an isthmus—are completely isolated. On the former is a large park with cool walks in the woods, and magnificent prospects from the tops of precipices. On the latter the huge castle at one extremity, the other being a place of fields, pleasure grounds, guest houses, walks and drives. For it must cover a space a mile in length, and of curious breadth—from some three hundred feet at the isthmus, where it is tunnelled by a street into the country, to nearly a quarter of a mile in its widest part. Why don't some of you men of leisure and money, who have a taste for mountain scenery, come here and enjoy it? Could you but see the Staufen or the Untersberg with its crest of rock for one moment through my eyes! We are used to see mountains approached over a series of lesser elevations—but here, they rise, sheer from the plain six, eight thousand feet—their bases clothed in dark forests—their peaks in the sunbeams glittering masses of rock and snow. Moreover we are accustomed to approach mountains only through an uncultivated, or at most half cultivated country—through wild woods, over horrible ways, not to be called roads—with all sorts of discomforts attending. Here they rise directly from vallies and plains, smoothed and made beautiful by the culture of all the ages since the beginning of history; the most exquisite rural beauty, below, the sublimity of vast mountain masses rising up to the regions of eternal snow and silence, above. Think you, that it was not hard for me to turn my back on all this grandeur and beauty—to refuse the invitations, which the mountains gave me to come up among them—to stand upon the Mönchsberg and look away up those vales of transcendent beauty, which lead to the noblest scenery of the Tyrolean Alps, and turn away from them with the feeling, that now my last opportunity was unembraced? To go back to books and papers, to dusty streets and daily toil, refusing to obey Nature, who, in her sublimest dress, was opening her broad arms and inviting me with ten thousand gentle voices to come to her and rest and get new life and lay up new feeling and emotion for all the future? Ah me! but it is something to have been in Salzburg!

On the glorious morning of June 26th, like Paul Flemming and Berkely, I journeyed from the cloud capped hills of Salzburg, eastward to the lakes.

The landlord of the golden ship—das goldene Schiff—Inn, runs a daily "post-omnibus," as his bills have it—to Ischl, and to his house of entertainment I went to take my seat in the coach.

What a strange power books, which have once touched the heart and fixed the imagination, have over us! I had been duly impressed with thoughts of Mozart, as I looked at the simple four story house in which he was born, as I stood in the organ loft of the Cathedral, where in his youth and early manhood he had officiated as composer and director, had enjoyed my hours in the archives of the Mozarteum, over the manuscripts from his own hand, and those of his parents and intimate friends—the originals of the correspondence now so widely known in all the artistic world—and all this was real, historic—and yet the inn of the Golden Ship had an almost equal charm, because it was here that Flemming, the hero of the fair hair, in whose fancy all things were seen double, like Swan and shadow—had like somebody's wife's mother in the Gospel history lain sick of a fever! And truly, the clean, quiet inn must have been no bad place in which to be sick. As I awaited the coach I imagined the convalescent sitting at one of the windows above, and looking down into the square upon that splendid fountain with its four huge sea horses, each cut from a single stone, its athlete supporting the broad basin and the beautiful figures above. Beyond the square is the old cathedral in dark gray stone—a more imposing building, in its Italian style, within than without; high up and still beyond, the castle crowning the mount; on the right of the square a sometime palace of the Archbishop—perhaps of the one, who goes down to all posterity as the scoundrelly oppressor of Mozart, an object of contempt to all future generations; on the left, the long Government house, with its tower and sweet chimes, which play popular melodies. At the end of this latter building is another small place, on which since the visit of Longfellow's hero the colossal bronze Mozart has been placed—but this is not to be seen from the inn—one must go out into the street.
